SEVENTY-THIRD CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION

SENATE

THURSDAY, MARCH 15, 1934

The Chaplain, Rev. Z. Barney T. Phillips, D.D., offered the following prayer:

O God, the fountain of wisdom, whose statutes are good and gracious, and whose law is truth, redeem, we humbly beseech Thee, Thy promises of old, and put Thy law in our inward parts and write it in our hearts; for so shalt Thou be our God and we shall be Thy people. Pour out Thy spirit upon us, that our sons and our daughters may prophesy, our old men may dream dreams, our young men may see visions; and as the soul of our Nation becomes conscious of a will for creation, grant that this awakening may be manifest in a fragrant flowering of holiness in our lives, a perfect obedience to Thy will.

We dare not trust ourselves, for we are weakness; but, casting all our care upon Thee, do Thou bring us home at last, where Thy children shall be safe forever in their Father's house, the sheep gathered forever into the Shepherd's fold. We ask it in the name of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On motion of Mr. ASHURST, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal for the calendar day of Wednesday, March 14, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, and 23 to the bill (H.R. 6663) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. WOODRUM, Mr. BOYLAN, Mr. HASTINGS, Mr. GRANFIELD, Mr. WIGGLESWORTH, and Mr. GOSS were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference; and that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate numbered 14 and 22 to the said bill, each with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (H.R. 7808) to authorize annual appropriations to meet losses sustained by officers and employees of the United States in foreign countries due to appreciation of foreign currencies in their relation to the American dollar, and for other purposes, and it was signed by the Vice President.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a telegram in the nature of a petition from Max Adler, of Bridgeport, Conn., praying for the passage of legislation for the benefit of war veterans, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Women's Bar Association, of Brooklyn, N.Y., favoring the passage of legislation to permit the sending of birth-control information through the mails, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KEYES presented a resolution adopted by the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of East Manchester, N.H., favoring the holding of prompt hearings and favorable action on House bill 6097, the so-called "Patman motion-picture bill", providing higher moral standards for films entering interstate and foreign commerce, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. COPELAND presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of New York memorializing Congress to provide Federal funds to supplement the appropriations of the State of New York for the proper river regulation and flood control of waterways in the region of the Mohawk River and its various tributaries and in the area of the Hudson River Valley north of the Federal lock at Troy, N.Y., which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

(See resolution printed in full when laid before the Senate by the Vice President on the 12th instant, p. 4227, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

Mr. COPELAND also presented a resolution adopted by the Buffalo (N.Y.) Chamber of Commerce protesting against certain provisions in proposed legislation to regulate stock exchanges, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Associated Organizations of Ridgewood and vicinity, in the State of New York, favoring an extension of the term for the repayment of bonds and mortgages of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation to 18 years, and the enactment of legislation to guarantee the principal of said bonds, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Community Councils of the City of New York, Inc., remonstrating against high salaries paid to officials of banks, public utilities, and other semipublic institutions, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also presented resolutions adopted by sundry women's organizations in the State of New York, favoring the passage of House bill 6097, providing higher standards for films entering interstate and foreign commerce, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented resolutions adopted by various railroad employees' organizations in the State of New York, favoring the passage of legislation relating to hours of labor and service of railroad employees, length of trains, and disposition of disputes between carriers and their employees, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the United Irish-American Societies of New York, of New York City, remonstrating against the ratification of the World Court protocols and involvement of the United States in foreign entanglements, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a resolution adopted at Rome, N.Y., by the Interdenominational Council, favoring world peace, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Staten Island Lodge, No. 319, Independent Order B'rith Abraham, of Staten Island, N.Y., remonstrating against mistreatment of Jews in Germany, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom of New York City, favoring the enactment of antilynching legislation, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a resolution adopted by St. Lawrence County (N.Y.) Pomona Grange favoring the passage of House bill 6612, relative to the manufacture and sale of products made for butter substitutes, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented resolutions adopted by Lowville Grange, No. 71, of Lowville, and Lewis County Pomona Grange, of Deer River, in the State of New York, favoring a tax of 5 cents per pound on coconut, palm, sesame, sunflower, whale, and imported fish oils, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, of New York City, favoring an investigation of makers of munitions and shipbuilders, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Common Council of Buffalo, N.Y., favoring the erection of a suitable public building in that city for the housing of the activities of the Federal Government, which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the board of trustees of the First Church of Christ, Scientist, of Glens Falls, N.Y., and endorsed by members or friends of said church, remonstrating against the passage of House bill 5812, for the compulsory administering of a silver nitrate solution to the eyes of all new-born children in the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Orange County (N.Y.) Pomona Grange, favoring the ratification of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Deep Waterway Treaty with Canada, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, of New York City, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation providing for the building of the Navy to the strength permitted by the Washington and London Naval Treaties, which was ordered to lie on the table.

TREATMENT OF THE JEWS IN GERMANY

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I present resolutions adopted by the Workmen's Circle, Branch No. 908, of Holyoke; Pride of Brockton Lodge, No. 373, Independent Order of B'rith Abraham, of Brockton; South Boston Lodge, No. 210, Independent Order of B'rith Abraham, and City of Boston Lodge, No. 63, Independent Order of B'rith Abraham, both of Boston; and the Worcester Lodge, No. 118, Independent Order of B'rith Abraham, Worcester, all in the State of Massachusetts, urging favorable consideration of Senate Resolution 154, submitted by the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], opposing discriminations against the Jews in Germany.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be received and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

FEDERAL SUPERVISION OF MOTION PICTURES

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I present resolutions adopted by the Plymouth County Woman's Christian Temperance Union, the Abington Woman's Christian Temperance Union, the Everett Woman's Christian Temperance Union, the Reading Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and the Newton Woman's Christian Temperance Union, all in the State of Massachusetts, urging favorable consideration of House bill 6097, the so-called "Patman bill", for the Federal supervision of motion pictures.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be received and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

REPORT OF FOOD, DRUG, AND COSMETIC BILL

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, from the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably, with amendments, the bill (S. 2800) to prevent the manufacture, shipment, and sale of adulterated or misbranded food, drink, drugs, and cosmetics, and to regulate traffic therein; to prevent the false advertisement of food, drink, drugs, and cosmetics; and for other purposes.

I ask that the bill be printed in the RECORD, together with a statement regarding it which I have prepared. This is based on a radio address I gave recently and is formulated with a view to describing the bill and its purposes.

There being no objection, the bill as reported and statement were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows: [Omit the part in black brackets and insert the part printed in italic]

Be it enacted, etc., That this act may be cited as the "Federal Food and Drugs Act."

DEFINITION OF TERMS

SEC. 2. As used in this act, unless the context otherwise indicates—

(a) The term "food" includes all substances and preparations used for, or entering into the composition of, food, drink, confectionery, or condiment for man or other animals.

(b) The term "drug", for the purposes of this act and not to regulate the legalized practice of [medicine] the healing art, includes (1) all substances and preparations recognized in the United States Pharmacopœia, Homeopathic Pharmacopœia of the United States, or National Formulary or supplements thereto; and (2) all substances, preparations, and devices intended for use in the cure, mitigation, treatment, or prevention of disease in man or other animals; and (3) all substances and preparations, other than food, and all devices intended to affect the structure or any function of the body.

(c) The term "cosmetic" includes all substances and preparations intended for external or oral use in cleansing, or altering the appearance of, or promoting the attractiveness of, the person.

(d) The term "Territory" means any Territory or possession of the United States, including the District of Columbia.

(e) The term "interstate commerce" means (1) commerce between any State or Territory and any place outside thereof, [or between points within the same State or Territory but through any place outside thereof,] and (2) commerce or manufacture within the District of Columbia or within any other Territory not organized with a legislative body.

(f) The term "person" includes individual, partnership, corporation, and association.

(g) The term "Secretary" means the Secretary of Agriculture.

(h) The term "label" means the principal label or labels (1) upon the immediate container of any food, drug, or cosmetic, and (2) upon the outside container or wrapper, if any there be, of the retail package of any food, drug, or cosmetic.

(i) The term "labeling" includes all labels and other written, printed, and graphic matter, in any form whatsoever, accompanying any food, drug, or cosmetic.

(j) The term "advertisement" includes all representations of fact or opinion disseminated in any manner or by any means other than by the labeling.

(k) The term "medical profession" means the professions of [physicians, pharmacologists, dentists,] and [veterinarians] medicine, pharmacology, dentistry, veterinary medicine; and the term "medical opinion" means the opinion of [physicians, pharmacologists, dentists, or veterinarians] members of these professions relating to the fields of their respective professions.

(l) The term "official compendium" means the United States Pharmacopœia, Homeopathic Pharmacopœia of the United States, National Formulary, or any supplement thereto, official at the time any drug to which the provisions thereof relate is introduced into interstate commerce.

ADULTERATED FOOD

SEC. 3. A food shall be deemed to be adulterated—

(b) (1) If any valuable constituent has been in whole or in part abstracted therefrom; or (2) if any substance has been substituted wholly or in part therefor; or (3) if damage or inferiority has been concealed in any manner; or (4) if any substance has been added thereto or mixed or packed therewith so as to increase its bulk or weight [in a deceptive manner,] or reduce its quality or strength, or create a deceptive appearance.

(c) If it is confectionery and bears or contains any alcohol, resinous glaze, or nonnutritive substance except masticatory substances in chewing gum, coloring, and flavoring.

(d) If it contains a coal-tar color other than one from a batch that has been certified in accordance with regulations as provided by sections 10 and 22.

(e) Nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit the enhancement of the color of mature and wholesome citrus fruits to the varietal color thereof, by means harmless to the consumer of such fruits, nor to require any declaration of such enhancement, by labeling or otherwise.

ADULTERATED DRUGS

SEC. 4. A drug shall be deemed to be adulterated—

(a) If it is dangerous to health under the conditions of use prescribed in the labeling thereof.

(b) If its name is the same as or simulates a name recognized in an official compendium, or if it purports to be a drug the name of which is so recognized, and it (1) fails to meet the definition, manufacturing formula, and description set forth therein, or (2) differs from the standard of strength, quality, or purity as determined by the tests or methods of assay set forth therein; except that whenever tests or methods of assay have not been prescribed therein, or such tests or methods of assay as are prescribed are insufficient, for determining whether or not such drug complies with such standard, the Secretary is hereby authorized to bring such fact to the attention of the appropriate body charged with the revision of such compendium, and if such body fails within a reasonable time to prescribe tests or methods of assay which are sufficient, then the Secretary may prescribe for the purposes of this act such tests or methods of assay by regulations as provided by section 22. No drug shall be deemed to be adulterated under subdivision (2) of this paragraph if its label bears, in juxtaposition with the name of the drug, a statement indicating wherein its strength, quality, and purity differ from the standard of strength, quality, and purity set forth in the appropriate official compendium, as determined by the tests or methods of assay applicable under this paragraph. Whenever a drug is recognized in both the United States Pharmacopœia and the Homeopathic Pharmacopœia of the United States it shall be subject to the requirements of the United States Pharmacopœia unless it is labeled and offered for sale as a homeopathic drug, in which case it shall be subject to the provisions of the Homeopathic Pharmacopœia of the United States and not to those of the United States Pharmacopœia.

(c) If it is not subject to the provisions of paragraph (b) of this section and its identity or strength differs from, or its purity or quality falls below, that which it purports or is represented to possess.

(d) If any substance has been (1) mixed or packed therewith so as to reduce its quality or strength [in a deceptive manner,] or (2) substituted wholly or in part therefor.

ADULTERATED COSMETICS

SEC. 5. A cosmetic shall be deemed to be adulterated—

(a) If it bears or contains any poisonous or deleterious substance in such quantity as may render it injurious to the user under the conditions of use prescribed in the labeling thereof, or under such conditions of use as are customary or usual.

(b) If it bears or contains any poisonous or deleterious ingredient prohibited, or in excess of the limits of tolerance prescribed, by regulations as provided by sections 10 and 22.

MISBRANDED FOOD, DRUGS, AND COSMETICS—GENERAL

SEC. 6. A food, drug, or cosmetic shall be deemed to be misbranded—

(a) If its labeling is false or misleading in any particular. Any representation concerning any effect of a drug shall be deemed to be false under this paragraph if that representation is not supported by substantial medical opinion or by demonstrable scientific facts.

(b) If in package form it fails to bear a label containing:

(1) The name and place of business of the manufacturer, packer, seller, or distributor; and (2) an accurate statement of the quantity of the contents in terms of weight, measure, or numerical count: Provided, That under subdivision (2) of this paragraph reasonable variations shall be permitted, and exemptions as to small packages shall be established, by regulations prescribed by the Secretary.

(c) The Secretary is hereby authorized to promulgate regulations exempting from any labeling or packaging requirement of this act food, drugs, and cosmetics which are, in accordance with the practice of the trade, processed, labeled, or repacked in substantial quantities at establishments other than those where originally processed or packed, on condition that such articles are in conformity with the provisions of this act upon removal from such processing, labeling, or repacking establishment.

(d) If any word, statement, or other information required on the label to avoid adulteration or misbranding under any provision of this act is not prominently placed thereon in such a manner as to be easily seen and in such terms as to be readily intelligible to the purchasers and users of such articles under customary conditions of purchase and use.

MISBRANDED FOOD

Sec. 7. A food shall be deemed to be misbranded—

(a) (1) If its container is so made, formed, or filled as to mislead the purchaser, or (2) if its contents fall below the [minimum] standard of fill prescribed by regulations as provided by sections 11 and 22.

(b) If it is offered for sale under the name of another food.

(c) If it is an imitation of another food, except that no imitation shall be deemed to be misbranded under this paragraph if its label bears the word "imitation" in juxtaposition with and in type of the same size and prominence as the name of the food imitated.

(d) If it purports to be or is represented as a food for which a definition and standard of identity have been prescribed by regulations as provided by sections 11 and 22, and (1) its label fails to bear the name of the food prescribed in the definition and [minimum] standard, or (2) it fails to conform to such definition and [minimum] standard.

(f) If it purports to be or is represented as a food for which a standard of quality has been prescribed by regulations as provided by sections 11 and 22 and its quality falls below such standard, and its label fails to bear a statement in such terms as the regulations specify showing that it falls below such standard.

(g) If it is not subject to paragraph (d) of this section and its label fails to bear (1) the common or usual name of the food, if any there be, and (2) the common or usual name of each ingredient such food bears or contains in order of predominance by weight; except that spices, flavors, and colorings, other than those sold as such, may be designated as spices, flavors, and colorings without naming each: Provided, That, to the extent that compliance with the requirements of subdivision (2) of this paragraph is impracticable because of normal variations in ingredients or their quantities, usual to good manufacturing or packing practice, reasonable variations from the stated order of such ingredients shall be permitted, and exemptions as to packages of assorted food shall be established, by regulations promulgated by the Secretary.

(h) If it [is] purports to be or is represented for special dietary uses, such as by infants or invalids or for other special nutritional requirements, and its label fails to bear, if so required by regulations as provided by section 22, statements concerning its vitamin, mineral, and other dietary properties which fully inform the purchaser as to its nutritional value.

MISBRANDED DRUGS

Sec. 8. A drug shall be deemed to be misbranded—

(a) If its labeling bears the name of any disease for which the drug is not a specific cure but is a palliative, and fails to bear a plain and conspicuous statement, so placed as to be readily observable where such name occurs, indicating that the drug is a palliative and [how the palliation is effected] the nature of its palliative action.

(b) If it is for internal use by man and contains any quantity of any of the following narcotic or hypnotic substances: Alpha eucaine, barbital, beta eucaine, bromal, cannabis, carbomal, chloral, coca, cocaine, codeine, heroin, marihuana, morphine, opium, paraldehyde, peyote, sulphonmethane, or any narcotic or hypnotic substance chemically derived therefrom, or any other narcotic or hypnotic substance which is habit forming, and its label fails to bear the name and quantity or proportion of such substance or derivative in juxtaposition with the statement "Warning—May be habit forming."

or preparation thereof, or chemical compound, as the case may be: Provided, That no drug shall be deemed subject to the provisions of this paragraph by reason of its containing arsenic as arsenic trioxide in a quantity less than one five-hundredths grain per single maximum dose and such arsenic is derived solely from crude plant material in which such arsenic is a natural constituent.

(d) If it is not designated solely by a name recognized in an official compendium and its label fails to bear a common or usual name of the drug, if such there be.

(e) If its labeling fails to bear plainly and conspicuously (1) complete and explicit directions for use, and (2) such warnings in such manner and form as may be prescribed by regulations, as provided by section 22, against use in such pathological conditions or by children where its use contraindicated and may be dangerous to health, or against unsafe dosage or methods of administration or application: Provided, That where any requirement of subdivision (1) of this paragraph, as applied to any drug, is not necessary for the protection of the public health, the Secretary shall promulgate regulations, as provided by section 22, exempting such drug from such requirement.

(f) If its name is the same as, or simulates, a name recognized in an official compendium and it is not packaged and labeled as prescribed therein. Whenever a drug is recognized in both the United States Pharmacopoeia and the Homeopathic Pharmacopoeia of the United States it shall be subject to the requirements of the United States Pharmacopoeia with respect to packaging and labeling unless it is labeled and offered for sale as a homeopathic drug, in which case it shall be subject to the provisions of the Homeopathic Pharmacopoeia of the United States and not to those of the United States Pharmacopoeia.

(g) If it has been designated by regulations, as provided by section 22, as a drug liable to deterioration, and is not packaged in such form or manner, or its label fails to bear a statement of such precautions, as such regulations require for the protection of public health. No such regulation shall be established for any drug recognized in an official compendium until the Secretary shall have informed the appropriate body charged with the revision of such compendium of the need for such packaging or labeling requirements and such body shall have failed within a reasonable time to prescribe such requirements.

(h) (1) If its container is so made, formed, or filled as to mislead the purchaser; or (2) if it is an imitation of another drug; or (3) if it is offered for sale under the name of another drug.

(i) If it purports to be or is represented as a germicide, bactericide, disinfectant, or antiseptic for any use on or within the body and its labeling fails to bear a plain and conspicuous statement of such use, including the strength or dilution, manner, and duration of application, and when tested by methods simulating as nearly as practicable the conditions of such use, or in the absence of such methods, when tested by a standard method, it does not have the germicidal effect within the duration so prescribed of a 1 to 80 dilution of phenol used by a standard testing method for 10 minutes at 37° C. All testing methods for the purposes of this paragraph shall be prescribed by regulations as provided by section 22: Provided, That no drug shall be deemed to be misbranded under this paragraph by reason of failure of its labeling to bear a statement of any advertised use if such advertising is disseminated to members of the medical and pharmaceutical professions only, or appears in scientific publications of these professions.

(j) If it purports to be or is represented as an inhibitory antiseptic for any use as a wet dressing, ointment, dusting powder, or such other use as involves prolonged contact with the body and its labeling fails to bear a plain and conspicuous statement of such use, including strength or dilution and manner of application, and when tested by methods simulating as nearly as practicable the duration of application and other conditions of such use, or in the absence of such methods when tested by a standard method, it fails to prevent the growth of micro-organisms within the entire time of such duration. All testing methods for the purposes of this paragraph shall be prescribed by regulations as provided by section 22: Provided, That no drug shall be deemed to be misbranded under this paragraph by reason of failure of its labeling to bear a statement of any advertised use if such advertising is disseminated to members of the medical and pharmaceutical professions only, or appears in scientific publications of these professions.

FALSE ADVERTISEMENT

Sec. 9. (a) An advertisement of a food, drug, or cosmetic shall be deemed to be false if it is false or misleading in any particular relevant to the purposes of this act regarding such food, drug, or cosmetic. Any representation concerning any effect of a drug shall be deemed to be false under this paragraph if that representation is not supported by substantial medical opinion or by demonstrable scientific facts.

(b) An advertisement of a drug shall also be deemed to be false if it contains the name of any disease for which the drug is not a specific cure but is a palliative and fails to contain a plain and conspicuous statement, so placed as to be readily observable where such name occurs, indicating that the drug is a palliative [and how the palliation is effected] the nature of its palliative action.

(c) To discourage the public advertisement for sale in interstate commerce of drugs for diseases wherein self-medication may be especially dangerous, or patently contrary to the interests of public health, any advertisement of a drug representing it to have any effect in the treatment of any of the following diseases shall be deemed to be false: Albuminuria, appendicitis, arteriosclerosis, blood poison, bone diseases, cancer, carbuncle, cataract, cholecystitis, dental caries or erosion, diabetes, diphtheria, dropsy, encephalitis, epilepsy, erysipelas, gallstones, goiter, heart diseases, high blood pressure, mastoiditis, measles, meningitis, mumps, nephritis, otitis media, paralysis, periodontal diseases, pneumonia, poliomyelitis, prostrate gland disorders, pyelitis, scarlet fever, sexual impotence, sinus infections, smallpox, tuberculosis, tumors, typhoid, uremia, venereal diseases, and whooping cough; except that no advertisement not in violation of paragraph (a) or (b) of this section shall be deemed to be false under this paragraph if it is disseminated to members of the medical and pharmaceutical professions only or appears in the scientific periodicals of these professions, or if it is disseminated for the purpose of public health education by persons not commercially interested, directly or indirectly, in the sale of such drugs: Provided, That whenever the Secretary determines that an advance in medical science has made any type of self-medication safe as to any of the diseases enumerated above, he shall promulgate regulations, as provided by section 22, exempting the advertisement of drugs having curative or therapeutic effect for such disease from the operation of this paragraph, subject to such conditions and restrictions as may be necessary in the interests of public health.]

TOLERANCES FOR POISONOUS INGREDIENTS IN FOOD AND COSMETICS AND CERTIFICATION OF COAL-TAR COLORS FOR FOOD

SEC. 10. (a) If an added poisonous or added deleterious substance in or on food or cosmetics is or may be injurious to health, the Secretary is hereby authorized to promulgate regulations, as provided by section 22, prohibiting such added substance in or on any food or cosmetic, or establishing tolerances limiting the amount therein or thereon, for the protection of public health, taking into account the extent to which the use of such substance is required in the production of such food or cosmetic and the other ways in which the consumer may be affected by the same or other poisonous or deleterious substances.

(b) The Secretary is hereby authorized to promulgate regulations, as provided by section 22, for the certification of coal-tar colors which are harmless and suitable for use in food.

DEFINITIONS AND STANDARDS FOR FOOD

SEC. 11. For the effectuation of the purposes of this act the Secretary is hereby authorized to promulgate regulations, as provided by section 22, fixing and establishing for any food [(1)] a definition and standard of identity, and [(2)] one objectively determinable minimum [a reasonable standard of quality and fill of container: Provided, That no standards of quality shall be established for fresh fruits and fresh vegetables.

PERMIT FACTORIES

SEC. 12. (a) Whenever the Secretary finds that the distribution in interstate commerce of any class of food, drugs, or cosmetics may, by reason of conditions surrounding the manufacture, processing, or packing thereof be injurious to health, and such injurious nature cannot be adequately determined after such articles have entered interstate commerce, and in such case only, he is authorized to promulgate regulations, as provided by section 22, governing the conditions of manufacture, processing, or packing necessary to protect the public health, and requiring manufacturers, processors, and packers of such class of articles to hold permits conditioned on compliance with such regulations.

(b) The Secretary is authorized to issue such permits for such periods of time as he may by regulations prescribe and to make regulations governing the issuance and renewal thereof. The Secretary is authorized to suspend immediately upon notice any permit issued under authority of this section if it is found that any of the conditions of the permit have been violated. The Secretary shall reinstate the permit whenever, after hearing and an inspection of the establishment, it is found that adequate measures have been taken to comply with and maintain the conditions of the original permit.

(c) Any officer or employee duly designated by the Secretary shall have access to any factory or establishment, the operator of which holds a permit from the Secretary, for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not the conditions of the permit are being complied with, and denial of access for such inspection shall be ground for suspension of the permit until such access is freely given by the operator.

FACTORY INSPECTION

SEC. 13. (a) In order adequately to regulate interstate commerce in food, drugs, and cosmetics, and enforce the provisions of this act, officers or employees duly designated by the Secretary, after first making reasonable request and obtaining permission of the owner, operator, or custodian thereof, are authorized (1) to enter any factory, warehouse, or establishment in which food, drugs, or cosmetics are manufactured, processed, packed, or held for shipment in interstate commerce or are held after such shipment, or to enter any vehicle being used to transport such food, drugs, or cosmetics, in interstate commerce; and (2) to inspect such factory, warehouse, establishment, or vehicle and all equipment, finished and unfinished materials, containers, and labels there used or stored.

(b) The several district courts of the United States are hereby vested with jurisdiction to restrain by injunction, temporary or permanent, the shipment in interstate commerce or delivery after receipt in interstate commerce of any food, drug, or cosmetic from or by any factory, warehouse, establishment, or vehicle, designated in paragraph (a) of this section if the owner, operator, or custodian thereof has denied to officers or employees duly designated by the Secretary permission, after reasonable request, so to enter and inspect such factory, warehouse, establishment, or vehicle and equipment, finished and unfinished materials, containers, and labels there used or stored. Whenever such permission is granted, the injunction issued pursuant to this paragraph shall be dissolved, or may be continued in force subject to such conditions governing the inspection as the court may order. Violation of any injunction issued pursuant to this paragraph may be summarily tried and punished by the court as a contempt. Such contempt proceedings may be instituted by order of the court or by the filing of an information by the United States attorney.

RECORDS OF INTERSTATE SHIPMENT

SEC. 14. For the purpose of enforcing the provisions of this act, carriers subject to the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended (U.S.C., title 49), and other carriers engaged in interstate commerce, and persons receiving food, drugs, or cosmetics in interstate commerce, shall, upon the request of an officer or employee duly designated by the Secretary, permit such officer or employee to have access to and to copy all records showing the movement in interstate commerce of any food, drug, or cosmetic, and the quantity, shipper, and consignee thereof; and it shall be unlawful for any such carrier or person to fail to permit such access to and copying of any such record so requested when such request is accompanied by a definite statement in writing specifying the nature or kind of food, drug, or cosmetic to which such request relates: Provided, That evidence obtained under this section shall not be used in a criminal prosecution of the person from whom obtained: Provided further, That carriers hereinbefore designated shall not be subject to the provisions of this act by reason of their receipt, carriage, or delivery of food, drugs, cosmetics, or advertising matter in the usual course of business as carriers.

INVESTIGATIONS AND INSTITUTION OF PROCEEDINGS

SEC. 15. (a) The Secretary is authorized to conduct examinations and investigations for the purposes of this act through officers and employees of the Department of Agriculture or through any health, food, or drug officer or employee of any State, Territory, or political subdivision thereof, duly commissioned by the Secretary. For the purposes of consultation in formulating general administrative policies for the enforcement of this act, the Secretary is authorized to appoint an advisory committee from each of the following groups: The food industry, the drug industry, the cosmetic industry, disseminators of advertising, the public. To aid in securing compliance with the requirements of this act, the Secretary is further authorized to accept plans for such self-regulation of advertising [and commercial] practices as tend to effectuate the purposes of this act, when presented by associations or groups representative of their industries: Provided, That [such plans shall not restrict] nothing in this paragraph shall be construed as restricting the responsibilities and powers conferred upon the Secretary by this [act and shall not be] act, and no plans shall be accepted which are designed to promote monopolies or eliminate or oppress legitimate enterprise.

(b) It shall be the duty of each United States attorney to whom satisfactory evidence has been presented by the Secretary of any violation for institution of criminal, libel for condemnation, or other proceedings under this act, or to whom any health, food, or drug officer of any State or Territory, or political subdivision thereof, presents evidence satisfactory to the United States attorney of any such violation, to cause appropriate proceedings to be instituted in the proper courts of the United States without delay. All suits instituted under this act shall be by and in the name of the United States.

(c) The Secretary shall, before reporting any violation of this act to the United States attorney for institution of criminal proceedings thereunder, afford due notice and opportunity for hearing to interested persons in accordance with such regulations as the Secretary shall prescribe. The report of the Secretary to the United States attorney for the institution of criminal proceedings under this act shall be accompanied by findings of the appropriate officers and employees, duly authenticated under their oaths. Nothing in this act shall be construed as requiring the Secretary to report for prosecution or for the institution of libel or injunction proceedings minor violations of this act whenever he believes that the purposes of the act can best be accomplished by a suitable notice or warning.

SEIZURE

SEC. 16. (a) Any article of food, drug, or cosmetic in interstate commerce that is adulterated or misbranded or that has been manufactured, processed, or packed in a factory or establishment, the operator of which did not, at the time of manufacture, processing, or packing, hold [a] an unsuspended valid permit, if so required by regulations under section 12, shall be liable to be proceeded against while in interstate commerce or at any time thereafter on libel of information and condemned in any district court of the United States within the jurisdiction of which the article is found. The article shall be liable to seizure (1) by process pursuant to the libel, or (2) if a chief of station or other officer of the Food and Drug Administration, duly designated by the Secretary, has probable cause to believe that the article is so adulterated as to be imminently dangerous to health, then, and in such case only, by order of such officer, issued under his oath of office, particularly describing the article to be seized, the place where located, and the officer or employee to make the seizure. In case of seizure pursuant to any such order, the jurisdiction of the court shall attach upon such seizure. Any article seized pursuant to any such order shall thereupon be promptly placed in the custody of the court and a libel of information shall be promptly filed for condemnation thereof.

(b) When, upon the trial of any cause instituted pursuant to paragraph (a), subdivision (2), of this section, judgment is rendered for the claimant, but it appears to the court that there was reasonable cause for the seizure, the court shall cause a proper certificate thereof to be entered, and no officer or employee of the United States shall be liable to suit or judgment by reason of the seizure of the goods or the institution of such proceedings.

(c) The court [may] shall, by order at any time before trial, allow any party to a condemnation proceeding to obtain a representative sample of the article seized.

(e) The proceedings in cases under this section shall conform, as nearly as may be, to the proceedings in admiralty; except that either party may demand trial by jury of any issue of fact joined in any such case.

(f) When a decree of condemnation is entered against the article, court costs and fees, and storage and other proper expenses, shall be awarded against the person, if any, intervening as claimant of the article.

PENALTIES

SEC. 17. (a) The following acts are hereby prohibited:

(1) The introduction into interstate commerce of any food, drug, or cosmetic that is adulterated or misbranded.

(2) The adulteration or misbranding of any food, drug, or cosmetic in interstate commerce.

(3) The receipt in interstate commerce of any food, drug, or cosmetic that is adulterated or misbranded and the delivery or proffered delivery thereof in the original unbroken package for pay or otherwise.

(4) The dissemination of any false advertisement by radio broadcast, United States mails, or in interstate commerce for the purpose of inducing, directly or indirectly, the purchase of food, drugs, or cosmetics.

(5) The dissemination of a false advertisement by any means for the purpose of inducing, directly or indirectly, the purchase of food, drugs, or cosmetics in interstate commerce.

(6) The introduction into interstate commerce of any food, drug, or cosmetic if the manufacturer, processor, or packer does not hold [a] an unsuspended valid permit when so required by regulations under section 12.

(7) The refusal to permit access to or copying of any record as required by section 14.

(b) Any person who violates or causes to be violated any of the provisions of paragraph (a) of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall on conviction thereof be subject to imprisonment for not more than 1 year, or a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $1,000, or both such imprisonment and fine; and for a second or subsequent offense imprisonment for not more than 2 years, or a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $3,000, or both such imprisonment and fine.

(c) Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph (b) of this section, in case of a willful offense the penalty shall be imprisonment for not more than 3 years, or a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $10,000, or both such imprisonment and fine.

[(d) No person acting in the capacity of publisher, advertising agency, or radio broadcast licensee shall be deemed in violation of paragraphs (b) or (c) of this section by reason of the dissemination of any false advertisement. Any such person who, on reasonable request of an officer or employee duly designated by the Secretary, willfully refuses to furnish the name and post-office address of the person who caused him to disseminate such advertisement shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall on conviction thereof be subject to the penalties prescribed in paragraph (b) of this section.]

who caused him to disseminate such advertisement shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall on conviction thereof be subject to the penalties prescribed in paragraph (b) of this section.

[(e) No dealer shall be prosecuted under paragraph (b) of this section (1) because of commerce in any article he has purchased or received in good faith if he furnishes on request of an officer or employee duly designated by the Secretary the name and address of the person from whom he purchased or received such article, or (2)] (e) No dealer shall be prosecuted under paragraph (b) of this section (1) for having received in interstate commerce an article and in good faith sold it, unless he refuses to furnish on request of an officer or employee duly designated by the Secretary the name and address of the person from whom he purchased or received such article and all documents pertaining to the delivery of the article to him, or (2) if he establishes a guaranty or undertaking signed by the person residing in the United States from whom he received in good faith the article of food, drug, or cosmetic, or the advertising copy therefor, to the effect that such person assumes full responsibility for any violation of this act, designating it, which may be incurred by the introduction of such article into interstate commerce or by the dissemination of such advertising. To afford protection, such guaranty or undertaking shall contain the name and address of the person furnishing such guaranty or undertaking, and such person shall be amenable to the prosecution and penalties which would attach in due course to the dealer under the provisions of this act. No retail dealer shall be prosecuted under this section for the dissemination, other than by radio broadcast, of any advertisement offering for sale at his place of business any product which is not distributed or sold in interstate commerce.

(f) Any person who forges, counterfeits, simulates, or falsely represents, or without proper authority uses any mark, stamp, tag, label, or other identification device required by regulations promulgated for the enforcement of the provisions of section 12 shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall on conviction thereof be subject to imprisonment for not more than 1 year or a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000, or both such imprisonment and fine.

LIABILITY OF CORPORATIONS AND THEIR OFFICERS

SEC. 18. (a) When construing and enforcing the provisions of this act, the act, omission, or failure of any officer, employee, or agent acting for or employed by any person, within the scope of his employment or office, shall in every case be deemed to be the act, omission, or failure of such person, as well as that of the officer, employee, or agent.

(b) Whenever a corporation or association violates any of the provisions of this act, such violation shall also be deemed to be a violation of the individual directors, officers, or agents of such corporation or association who personally ordered, or did any of the acts constituting, in whole or in part, such violation.

INJUNCTION PROCEEDINGS

SEC. 19. (a) Each of the following acts is hereby declared to be a public nuisance:

(1) The repetitious introduction into interstate commerce of any adulterated or misbranded food, drug, or cosmetic.

(2) The repetitious dissemination of any false advertisement by radio broadcast, United States mails, or interstate commerce for the purpose of inducing, directly or indirectly, the purchase of food, drugs, or cosmetics.

(3) The repetitious dissemination of a false advertisement by any means for the purpose of inducing, directly or indirectly, the purchase of food, drugs, or cosmetics in interstate commerce.

(b) In order to avoid multiplicity of criminal prosecutions or libel for condemnation proceedings, the district courts of the United States are hereby vested with jurisdiction to restrain by injunction, temporary or permanent, any person from continuing any such nuisance. In such injunction proceedings it shall not be necessary to show on the part of such person an intent to continue such nuisance.

(c) Further to avoid multiplicity of libel for condemnation proceedings without impairing the protection of the public or the opportunity for the prompt trial on the merits of alleged violations, the district courts of the United States are hereby vested with jurisdiction to restrain by injunction, as hereinafter provided, the institution of more than one seizure action under section 16 against any product if (1) the alleged violation is one of misbranding only, (2) all current shipments of the article alleged to be misbranded bear the same labeling, (3) such alleged misbranding does not involve danger to health or gross deception, and (4) such misbranding has not been the basis of a prior judgment in favor of the United States in any criminal prosecutions or libel for condemnation proceeding under this act.

(d) Any injunction issued pursuant to paragraph (c) of this section shall be dissolved on motion of the United States attorney, (1) upon the presentation by him of a duly certified judgment of condemnation in a seizure case against such product, or (2) at the expiration of the term of court next ensuing after the term in which such injunction issued, unless the complainant files with the court a duly certified judgment rendered upon a determination of the issue of misbranding, and entered pursuant to section 16 after the issuance of such injunction, or evidence satisfactory to the court of his inability to secure such determination.

[(c)] (e) Violation of any [such] injunction issued pursuant to this section may be summarily tried and punished by the court as a contempt. Such contempt proceedings may be instituted by order of the court or by the filing of an information by the United States attorney; and process of the court for the arrest of the violator may be served at any place in the United States or subject to its jurisdiction.

IMPORTS AND EXPORTS

SEC. 20. (a) The Secretary of the Treasury shall deliver to the Secretary of Agriculture upon his request, from time to time, samples of food, drugs, and cosmetics which are being imported or offered for import into the United States, giving notice thereof to the owner or consignee, who may appear before the Secretary of Agriculture and have the right to introduce testimony. If it appears from the examination of such samples or otherwise that (1) any false advertisement of such food, drug, or cosmetic has been disseminated in the United States by the importer or exporter thereof, or any person in privity with him, within 3 months prior to the date such article is offered for import, or (2) such article has been manufactured, processed, or packed under insanitary conditions, or (3) such article is forbidden or restricted in sale in the country in which it was produced or from which it was exported, or (4) such article is adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this act, then such article shall be refused admission.

(b) The Secretary of the Treasury shall refuse delivery to the consignee and shall cause the destruction of any such article refused admission, unless such article is exported by the consignee within 3 months from the date of notice of such refusal, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury may deliver to the consignee any such article pending examination and decision in the matter on execution of a bond as liquidated damages for the amount of the full invoice value thereof, together with the duty thereon, and on refusal to return such article or any part thereof for any cause to the custody of the Secretary of the Treasury when demanded for the purpose of excluding it from the country or for any other purpose, said consignee shall forfeit the full amount of the bond as liquidated damages.

(c) All charges for storage, cartage, and labor on any article which is refused admission or delivery shall be paid by the owner or consignee and in default of such payment shall constitute a lien against any future importations made by such owner or consignee.

(d) A food, drug, or cosmetic intended for export [which is not adulterated within the meaning of section 3, paragraph (a); section 4, paragraph (a); or section 5] shall not be deemed to be adulterated or misbranded under this act if it (1) accords to the specifications of the foreign purchaser, (2) complies with the laws of the country to which it is intended for export, and (3) is labeled on the outside of the shipping package with the words "For Export." But if such article is sold or offered for sale in domestic commerce, this paragraph shall not exempt it from any of the provisions of this act.

PUBLICITY

SEC. 21. The Secretary shall cause to be published periodically a report summarizing all judgments, decrees, and court orders which have been rendered, including the nature of the charge and the disposition thereof. The Secretary shall also cause to be disseminated such information regarding food, drugs, or cosmetics as may be necessary to protect against danger to public health or fraud upon the consumer: Provided, That no such information shall be so disseminated regarding any brand of food, drug, or cosmetic before rendition of final judgment in proceedings against it except in cases involving imminent danger to health or gross deception of the consumer.

GENERAL ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS

SEC. 22. (a) The authority to make regulations for the efficient enforcement of this act, except as otherwise provided in this section, is hereby vested in the Secretary.

(b) To aid and advise the Secretary in promulgating regulations for the protection of public health, as contemplated by section 3, paragraphs (a) and (d); section 4, paragraph (b); section 5, paragraph (b); section 7, paragraph (g); section 8, paragraphs (e), (g), (i), and (j); section 9, paragraph (c); section 10; and section 12, paragraph (a), a Committee on Public Health is hereby provided which shall consist of five members designated by the President with a view to their distinguished scientific attainment and interest in public health and without regard to their political affiliation.

(c) To aid and advise the Secretary in the promulgation of regulations with respect to food as contemplated by section 7, paragraphs (a), (d), and (e); and section 11, a Committee on Food Standards is hereby provided which shall consist of seven members, three of whom shall be selected from the public, two from the food-producing, -processing, and -manufacturing industry, and two from the Food and Drug Administration. The members selected from the public and the food industry shall be appointed by the President without regard to political affiliation, and the members from the Food and Drug Administration shall be designated by the Secretary.

(d) Whenever the Secretary deems that any regulation contemplated by the provisions of this act enumerated in paragraphs (b) and (c) of this section should be established, he shall so advise the appropriate committee. With the approval of a majority of its members, the committee shall recommend to the Secretary a proposed regulation, and the Secretary shall give notice of the proposal and of the time and place of a public hearing to be held thereon not less than 30 days after the date of such notice. After such public hearing the Secretary is authorized to formulate and promulgate such regulation, but no such regulation shall be promulgated without the approval of a majority of the members of the committee. The regulation so promulgated shall become effective on a date fixed by the Secretary, which date shall not be prior to 90 days after its promulgation, and may be amended or repealed in the same manner as is provided for its adoption: Provided, That regulations setting up exemptions pursuant to section 8, paragraph (e), and section 9, paragraph (c) may be promulgated without notice or hearing and shall become effective at such time as the Secretary determines.

(e) The term of office of members of the committees provided by paragraphs (b) and (c) of this section, other than members from the Food and Drug Administration, shall be 5 years, but the terms of office of such members first appointed shall expire at the end of 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 years, as shall be designated by the President in their respective appointments. The President shall designate the chairmen of the committees. No person who is a member of the Department of Agriculture or who has a financial interest in the manufacture, advertising, or sale of any food, drug, or cosmetic shall be eligible to serve on the Committee on Public Health, or as a member from the public on the Committee on Food Standards.

(f) Each committee shall convene at least once each year in the city of Washington at a time to be designated by its chairman, but action by either committee under this section may be taken by the members thereof acting individually without convening in meeting. In each case in which approval by either committee of a regulation is required under this section, the Secretary shall transmit to each member of such committee a transcript of the record of the public hearing held by him. Members of the committees shall be given due notice of and may sit with the Secretary or his representatives at all such public hearings relating to the functions of their respective committees. Each committee on its own motion or at the request of the Secretary may advise him of its views on any question concerning the enforcement of this act.

(g) The Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of Agriculture shall jointly prescribe regulations for the efficient enforcement of the provisions of section 20. Such regulations shall be promulgated in such manner and take effect at such time as the Secretary of Agriculture shall determine.

(h) Hearings authorized or required by this act shall be conducted by the Secretary of such officer or employee as he may designate for the purpose. [In formulating regulations under paragraphs (b) and (c) of this section, the findings of fact by the Secretary shall be conclusive if in accordance with law.]

COURT REVIEW OF REGULATIONS

SEC. 23. The district courts of the United States are hereby vested with jurisdiction to restrain by injunction, temporary or permanent, the enforcement by any [officer] officer, representative, or employee of the Department of Agriculture of any regulation promulgated as provided in section 22 if it is shown that the regulation is unreasonable, arbitrary, or capricious, or not in accordance with law, and that the petitioner will suffer substantial damage by reason of its enforcement: Provided, That the foregoing shall not be deemed to abridge the right of any person against whom a criminal prosecution or suit for injunction shall have been brought under this act or who shall intervene as claimant in any proceeding of libel for condemnation to plead that the regulation whose violation is alleged as the ground for such prosecution, suit, or libel, is invalid.

SEPARABILITY CLAUSE

SEC. 24. If any provision of this act is declared unconstitutional, or the applicability thereof to any person or circumstances is held invalid, the constitutionality of the remainder of the act and the applicability thereof to other persons and circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

EFFECTIVE DATE AND REPEALS

SEC. 25. (a) This act shall take effect [six months after the date of approval] twelve months after the date of approval. The Federal Food and Drugs Act of June 30, 1906, as amended (U.S.C., title 21, secs. 1-15), shall remain in force until such effective date, and, except as otherwise provided in this paragraph, is hereby repealed effective upon such date: Provided, That upon the approval of this act and before its effective date the Secretary is authorized to (1) conduct hearings and to promulgate regulations under the provisions hereof which shall become effective on or after the effective date of this act as the Secretary shall direct and (2) designate upon the approval of this act foods having common or unusual names and exempt such food from the requirements of subdivision (2) of paragraph (f) of section 7 for a reasonable time to permit the formulation, promulgation, and effective application of definitions and standards of identity therefor as provided by sections 11 and 22: Provided further, That the act of March 4, 1932 (U.S.C., title 21, sec. 6; 42 Stat. 1500, ch. 268), defining butter and providing a standard therefor, and the act of July 24, 1919 (U.S.C., title 21, sec. 10; 41 Stat. 271, ch. 26), defining wrapped meats as in package form, shall remain in force and effect and be applicable to the provisions of this act.

(b) The provisions of this act shall not be held to modify or repeal any of the existing laws of the United States except as provided by paragraph (a) of this section.

The statement submitted by Mr. COPELAND is as follows:

THE PROPOSED FOOD, DRUG, AND COSMETIC LAW

It is a matter of great concern to every man what he shall put into his stomach. Every mother is anxious that the food and medicine given her baby shall be above suspicion. The welfare of every man, woman, and child is involved in the quality and preparation of the foods and drugs sold in America. In view of these facts, we can well understand the public interest attached to the proposed revision of the food and drug law.

The amount of money invested in the affected industries is tremendous. The revision goes to the heart of their manufacturing, chemical research, and advertising of every type. Legislators must deal wisely in solving a problem so important, because what they shall determine upon vitally affects the welfare of many industries and particularly of the American people.

Personally, I am more concerned over the public health than with anything else in the world. A lifetime of activity in this field has demonstrated to me that nothing within the purview of a legislator is more important to Americans than the protection against doubtful claims and actual fraud in the sale of products that may serve to undermine health.

One of my heroes is Dr. Harvey W. Wiley. The culmination of his work was the establishment of the Food and Drug Administration of the Department of Agriculture, as well as the passage of the present pure food law and the beginnings of its enforcement. Mr. Campbell, Dr. Wiley's able successor, and his aides, Mr. Crawford, Dr. Dunbar, and others, deserve public commendation for their loyal devotion to the public service and never-failing watch over the public welfare.

Under the original statute much has been accomplished. The purity and honesty of our national food and drug supply are measurably higher and measurably better than in 1906. But, able as its administrators are, I believe the Food and Drug Bureau is operating under serious legal handicaps. A law which permits the continued manufacture and sale of utterly worthless remedies for cancer, tuberculosis, diabetes, and other maladies considered incurable by such means, is certainly defective. Because their manufacturers cannot be shown to know that their products are worthless creates a legal situation which is unbearable. That actually poisonous cosmetics and injurious slenderizing compounds can be distributed without interference from the Federal Government is positively indecent. Something is seriously wrong with the present law, and a new and effective statute is needed. When this is provided, Dr. Wiley's fondest dream will be realized.

For years the Food and Drug Administration has been recommending modifications of our present law. But it is clear to most of us that something more comprehensive and useful than mere amendment is needed. On this account I gladly introduced the Department's bill, recognizing that the experience gained in enforcement activities for more than a quarter of a century, qualified the specialists in the Department of Agriculture to know what is necessary if the public is to be protected.

The original bill passed through a series of senatorial hearings and, by a process of evolution, has developed into the measure now known as "S. 2800." It has the approval of the President and of the Department of Agriculture, and will, I earnestly hope, receive favorable action by Congress at an early date.

I agree with statements that this bill is not perfect. Legislation seldom is. But I am convinced it will give the American consumer a large measure of protection which has been denied him under the operations of the present law. What is just as important is that it will maintain those other safeguards which the present law has so effectively guaranteed.

Efforts have been made to defeat this bill. Worse than that, ingenious methods have been used during the campaign to weaken the law as it now stands.

I ask you to bear in mind that the purpose of this legislation is not primarily to control industry. Its purpose is to protect the public, to protect the mothers and the children, to protect the consumers.

I would not have you believe regulation is needed because reputable concerns are unwilling to conform to high standards. They are willing and anxious to do this. But, I regret to say, there are those in this country who are exploiting the public and foisting unworthy products upon the public for gain.

It is proposed to enlarge the Food and Drug Act to cover cosmetics, outlawing those which are dangerous to health, and requiring all to be sold truthfully. At present there is no Federal law controlling cosmetics.

Advertising regulation is another new feature. At present there is no control over advertising, except what is printed right on the label or put inside the package. As to this, the present law says merely that that must be truthful. The new bill goes further than that. It says that all advertising of foods, drugs, and cosmetics must tell the truth—over the radio, in magazines, newspapers, handbills, and on billboards. As the bill was originally printed there were omissions here that made some believe the act might be construed as unconstitutional. They forgot there are a dozen lawyers, including several ex-judges, on the Commerce Committee. They promptly cured this and other legal defects. There need be no worry about the constitutionality of the measure when it is finally enacted.

It is our purpose to prohibit traffic in foods dangerous to health, whether the dangerous ingredient is normal or added. It forbids the use in food of uncertified and impure coal-tar colors, and it prohibits the use of poisonous containers. It says that confectionery containing metallic trinkets, which have been found to be a serious menace to the welfare and even the lives of children, simply cannot be sold at all. It compels the observance of reasonable standards of cleanliness in the preparation and handling of food products. It forbids slack-filling and the use of deceptive containers. It provides for the setting up of standards of identity and a standard of quality. For unstandardized foods it requires the disclosure of ingredients. In the case of dietary foods, it demands properly informative labeling.

What about drugs? First of all, the bill says there can be no traffic in drugs that are dangerous to health under the conditions of use prescribed on the label. Then it lays down requirements designed to insure as fully as possible the strength and quality and purity of drugs that are safe to use under proper conditions.

There is no more common or mistaken criticism of this bill than that it denies the right of self-medication, or, as the objector usually put it, "You can't take an aspirin tablet without a doctor's prescription." Nothing could be further from the truth. The proposed law simply contributes to the safety of self-medication by preventing medicines from being sold as "cures" unless they really are cures. It requires that drugs which have only palliative effect shall say as much on the label.

Habit-forming drugs must bear warning labels. There is a long list of dangerous drugs, each of which must be declared on the label if it is used as an ingredient in a medicine.

There must be plain and explicit directions for use, as well as warnings that in certain pathological conditions the use of drugs would not be safe. Antiseptics, disinfectants, and the like must possess definite germicidal power and fulfill their promises under the advertised conditions of use.

When public health cannot be protected otherwise, the bill authorizes control through licensing. It also authorizes executive seizure of imminently dangerous products.

The bill, I think, materially promotes the ease of administering the food and drug law. It imposes heavier penalties than the old law, and takes care of chronic offenses through legal injunctions. Perhaps I should point out, too, that it fixes responsibility in a practical way by exempting publishers from a charge of false advertising when they supply information identifying the advertiser.

A common misunderstanding as to the effects and purposes of the bill, at least if the daily mail of the President and of the Members of Congress is any indication, is that it will interfere with the practice of the various schools of healing, such as chiropractic, osteopathy, hydrotherapy, and the like. There is no ground whatever for this belief. It is just too bad that well-meaning persons make these protests and thereby actually interfere with their own best interests.

In no way will it interfere with the usual methods or the use of apparatus or devices employed in their regular practice by licensed healers of any school. No practitioner of the healing art can reasonably complain about the provisions of S. 2800.

Perhaps the most conspicuous difference between S. 2800 and the original Department draft lies in the provision for two expert and nonpolitical committees to be appointed by the President of the United States. As the bill now stands, one of these is a committee of public health; the second, a committee on food standards.

At this point our critics have argued at greatest length. There are those who believe that all the administrative acts of the Secretary of Agriculture should be subject to review by a committee of some sort. They swing far away from the original bill, where the Secretary was given final and conclusive power. For myself, I agree, and did from the first, that such power as was proposed by the first bill, S. 1944, was too great to repose in one man. My colleagues of the subcommittee, Senator McNARY and Senator CARAWAY, took the same view. It was on this account that the bill which we are now considering was modified to make it necessary for the Secretary to submit proposed regulations to one of these committees for final approval.

Having been an administrator of health laws myself, I should consider it a material weakening of the bill to have every administrative act of the Secretary subject to disapproval or modification by a reference committee. Of necessity, a committee of this sort would not be so well informed regarding the intricacies of administration as are the officials of the Food and Drug Bureau of the Department of Agriculture. It would be a mistake, as I see it, and would cause too serious a lag in the effectiveness of control to have this arrangement.

I do sympathize with the idea that advertising of foods, drugs, and cosmetics having been provided for, for the first time, there might well be an advisory committee to confer with the Secretary of Agriculture regarding problems in connection with advertising.

Likewise there should be a similar committee made up of food representatives if problems relating to that industry were under discussion; and of drug or cosmetic representatives if either of those industries were being considered. The modified bill provides for such committees.

In the making of regulations the public is fully protected, because it stands to reason that of the food standards committee the three appointed by the President to represent the consumer would be likely to vote with those from the Food and Drug Administration. At the same time, any technical matters of special interest would be properly represented by members from the industries.

I hope this plan, if it is adopted by the Senate, will satisfy the objections of some of our critics, except their desire to have every administrative act of the Secretary reviewed. The advisory committees are designed to offset what was regarded as arbitrary and unreasonable power to be given the Secretary of Agriculture. Since this particular matter has been the target of the original bill's opponents, it is hoped and believed that the appointment of advisory committees will answer all reasonable objection to the measure.

Effort was made to have the Senate committee do away with the demand for a disclosure of formulas upon the packages of proprietary foods. We did not feel free to do this because of the importance of giving the public knowledge of the ingredients. Knowing what the package contains, a person who is sensitive to a given article of food will be warned that it is included in the make-up of the product. In some instances, certainly, that is very important.

As regards drugs, the bill provides that particularly potent drugs are to be declared. The label must carry a warning against habit-forming drugs and overdosage. We believe these provisions insure adequate public protection without imposing unreasonable hardships on anybody. For the public safety everybody must make sacrifices if necessary.

I want to make it clear that in my opinion S. 2800 is the bill the women of this country should support. History repeats itself in that the opposition, just as in Dr. Wiley's day, has sought to confuse the issue by introducing a multitude of other food and drug bills.

The first of the red herrings to be dragged across the trail was a bill which was formulated by the patent-medicine interests. According to Department officials that measure is actually far weaker than the present inadequate law. Its passage would, in the main, give less protection than we have today.

Another bill, no matter what its author intended, quite obviously complicates procedure and minimizes penalties. Still another measure came to my attention. It is a curious combination of some of the provisions of S. 2800 and provides for an extremely complicated administrative set-up to enforce it—literally an army of inspectors and chemists would be demanded. The number of these, together with administrative officers, is conservatively estimated at not less than 25,000 persons, an impossible and unnecessary army to harass and embarrass everybody.

As I see it, S. 2800, as reported, is a sane, sensible, workable bill. My own experience in the administration of food and drug laws makes me believe that the measure can be applied in a way to give protection to the American people. Of course, there are those who continue in bitter opposition to the bill. But, in my opinion, they are largely those who would be in opposition to any attempt whatever at regulation. We cannot hope to please them, and of course, have no desire to please them.

The bill, S. 2800, is reported out of committee. I trust it will meet the favorable consideration of the Congress. With all the earnestness at my command, I ask support for this bill because I believe it is in the public interest. Enacted into law, it will add to the safety of the American family, and I hope serve to save many a life. Mother, father, and the babies—men, women, and children—all will be better guarded in health and pocketbook than ever before in American history.

BILLS INTRODUCED

The VICE PRESIDENT. The introduction of bills and joint resolutions is in order.

Mr. LONG. I send to the desk a bill which I ask unanimous consent may be immediately considered without being referred to a committee, which is not necessary. I have taken it up—

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I suggest that the Senator wait until morning business shall have been concluded.

Mr. LONG. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the Senator from Louisiana is now introducing a bill, which is the appropriate time for the introduction of bills.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well. I thought the Senator was asking unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, as I understand, the Senator is not introducing the bill. He wishes to ask unanimous consent that it be now considered. I suggest that it lie on the table until we reach that order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Louisiana announced he was introducing the bill at this time.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I understand he also desired to have it considered immediately.

Mr. LONG. I do.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have no objection to the consideration of the bill after the routine morning business shall have been disposed of.

Mr. LONG. Very well.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. VAN NUYS:

A bill (S. 3059) for the relief of Joseph M. Thomas; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 3060) granting a pension to Sarah C. Hackleman; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. DILL:

A bill (S. 3061) for the relief of Joseph W. Atkinson; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. REED:

A bill (S. 3062) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to convey certain land, together with building thereon, to the city of Altoona, Pa., for a public library; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. NEELY:

A bill (S. 3063) granting an increase of pension to Robert Blake; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CAPPER:

A bill (S. 3064) to amend the Packers and Stockyards Act, 1921; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. HASTINGS:

A bill (S. 3065) for the relief of the Mutual Savings & Loan Association, Wilmington, Del.; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. PATTERSON:

A bill (S. 3066) for the relief of John Evans; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. COPELAND, Mr. VANDENBERG, and Mr. MURPHY:

A bill (S. 3068) to provide deportation of aliens upon conviction of a felony; to the Committee on Immigration.

A bill (S. 3069) relative to coercing of witnesses;

A bill (S. 3070) making it a felony to willfully fail to appear after having been admitted to bail;

A bill (S. 3071) to prevent the promotion of frauds through interstate communication;

A bill (S. 3072) making it an offense against the United States to resist, assault, or kill an officer or employee of the United States in or on account of the execution of his duty;

A bill (S. 3073) to amend section 1015 of the Revised Statutes; and

A bill (S. 3074) to amend section 1016 of the Revised Statutes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. COPELAND:

A bill (S. 3075) to permit the appointment of special agents of the Division of Investigation as State officers; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (S. 3076) to prohibit the transportation in interstate or foreign commerce and carriage through the mails of certain gambling devices, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

By Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana:

A bill (S. 3078) granting a pension to Ernest Cooper (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. McKELLAR:

A bill (S. 3079) for the relief of N. N. Self (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Claims.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE, LOUISIANA

Mr. LONG introduced a bill (S. 3067) granting the consent of Congress to the Louisiana Highway Commission to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Baton Rouge, La., which was read twice by its title.

Mr. LONG subsequently said: Mr. President, this morning I introduced Senate bill 3067 to which I believe there can be no possible objection. I have taken it up with the members of the committee. It merely gives the State of Louisiana an extension of the right to construct a bridge over the Mississippi River. That right has already been granted by the Congress, but the time has expired and this is a renewal or extension of the time. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, this is a bill which was introduced this morning. I said to the Senator from Louisiana at the time that I had no objection to the consideration of the bill at the proper time. I think leave for its consideration should be granted in view of the fact that it involves merely an extension of time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

S. 3067

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Louisiana Highway Commission, an administrative body created and acting under the constitution and laws of the State of Louisiana, to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge, or a railway bridge in combination with a free highway bridge, and approaches thereto across the Mississippi River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Baton Rouge, La., in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters", approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

FRENCH SPOILIATION CLAIMS

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I introduce, by request, a bill to carry into effect the decisions of the Court of Claims in favor of claimants in French spoliation cases not heretofore paid.

In explanation thereof, I ask that a short memorandum be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 3077) to carry into effect the decisions of the Court of Claims in favor of claimants in French spoliation cases not heretofore paid was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Claims, and the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FRENCH SPOILIATION CLAIMS—MEMORANDUM

On January 20, 1885, in order to settle definitely the liability of the United States for these French spoliation claims, Congress passed an act referring them to the Court of Claims (23 Stat.L. 283), a court of its own creation.

Upon this reference by which the Government designated its own arbitrator, the court was directed to "examine and determine the validity and amount of all the claims * * * together with their present ownership. * * *"

After the passage of this act claimants filed their petitions in the court. The validity of the claims was contested by the Government attorneys. The argument was exhaustive, lasting more than a week, and the court unanimously decided that the claims were just and valid claims against our Government, the property of the claimants having been taken without just compensation to pay and cancel our national obligations against France (21 C.Cls., R. 340). A rehearing was had upon the request of the Government, who employed new counsel, and the court again decided that the claims were valid (22 C.Cls., R. 1).

Twenty-five years later, after the personnel of the court had entirely changed, the five new judges, on an independent reexamination of the questions, reaffirmed the decision of their predecessors, and held the United States liable to the citizens for all property lost by the illegal action of French cruisers and privateers. The court said:

"The spoliation claims as a class were valid obligations from France to the United States, and our Government surrendered them to France for a valuable consideration benefiting the Nation and this use of the claims raised an obligation founded upon right (46 Ct.Cls., R. 214, 224).

The main question, the liability of our Government to pay for the losses, having been decided, the Court of Claims thereupon proceeded with the trial of the individual cases, and from time to time duly certified to Congress its awards covering not only their validity but the ownership and amount of loss as well. In each case the court insisted upon strict proof of citizenship, ownership, value of property, and all other facts essential to show the validity of the claim against France, and consequently against the United States, upon its release to France of the claims of its citizens in exchange for the release by France of treaty obligations to it on the part of the United States. Most of the cases were dismissed for insufficient proof.

Congress has heretofore made four appropriations to pay the court's awards, as follows:

Mar. 3, 1891, 26 Stat.L. 897 (51st Cong.)	$1,304,095.37
Mar. 3, 1899, 30 Stat.L. 1161 (56th Cong.)	1,055,473.04
May 27, 1902, 32 Stat.L. 207 (57th Cong.)	798,631.27
Feb. 24, 1905, 33 Stat.L. 743 (58th Cong.)	752,660.93

Since 1905 the Court of Claims has disposed of all the remaining cases, so that every case filed under the Jurisdictional Act of 1885 has been passed on and certified to Congress; those in which favorable awards were made and those which were dismissed. This being so, all outstanding claims have now been decided and certified to Congress.

Those that are now before Congress and unpaid amount to approximately $3,250,000. Whatever opinion may still be entertained by anyone, it cannot fail to be recognized as violative of justice and good faith not to provide for these remaining awards, when the majority of them have been paid, especially so when we realize that their validity and justice have been ratified by the three coordinate branches of our Government—the judicial, legislative, and executive.

Whenever the court decided adversely to the claimants in any one case and certified its conclusion to Congress, such action was final. If that be so, an award in favor of the claimants should be as final and binding upon the Government.

On December 6, 1910 (61st Cong.), which was since the last appropriation of February 24, 1905, President Taft (later Chief Justice), in his annual message brought to the attention of Congress its delay in not making provision for the payment of these awards. He says:

"I invite the attention of Congress to the great number of claims which, at the instance of Congress, have been considered by the Court of Claims and decided to be valid claims against the Government. The delay that occurs in the payment of the money due under the claims injures the reputation of the Government as an honest debtor, and I earnestly recommend that those claims which come to Congress with the judgment and approval of the Court of Claims be promptly paid."

No action being taken in the Sixty-first Congress, President Taft on December 21, 1911, again referred to the question of the payment of the awards of the Court of Claims as follows:

"The findings and awards were obtained after a very bitter fight, the Government succeeding in about 75 percent of the cases. The amount of the awards ought, as a matter of good faith on the part of the Government, to be paid."

On April 7, 1924, Charles E. Hughes, Secretary of State (now Chief Justice), in reply to a request from the Chairman of the Committee on Claims in the Senate (Senator CAPPER) wrote:

"Inasmuch as these claims were referred to the Court of Claims by act of Congress and the Court of Claims, in proceedings in which the right of claimants to recover was contested by the Government of the United States, found and certified to the Congress that claimants were entitled to relief, it would seem that, as recommended by President Taft, provision should be made for their payment."

Since the judicial, legislative, and executive branches of our Government have all said that these claims are valid obligations of the Government, their payment should not be longer delayed.

AMENDMENT OF HOME OWNERS' LOAN ACT

Mr. TRAMMELL submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2999) to guarantee the bonds of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, to amend the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed, as follows:

On page 5, to strike out subsection (1), being lines 10 to 21, inclusive.

On page 6, line 13, after the word "section", add the following: "That not less than $500,000,000 of the proceeds derived from the sale of bonds of the corporation shall be used in making cash advances or loans to individual home owners."

IMPORTATION OF LOBSTERS AND LOBSTER MEAT

Mr. WALSH submitted a resolution (S.Res. 210), which was ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved, That the United States Tariff Commission be, and hereby is, requested to make an investigation, under its general powers, of the importation into the United States of lobsters and lobster meat and the effect of such importations on the domestic production of lobsters and on the enforcement of State laws relating to conservation and size limitations on lobsters landed by United States fishermen.

USE OF PULPWOOD, PULP, AND PAPER

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S.Res. 205), submitted by Mr. HALE on the 12th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, requested to submit to the Senate at his early convenience a report based on information already available covering—

(a) The extent to which the United States now depends upon imports of pulpwood, pulp, and paper to meet national requirements.

(b) Whether and the extent to which it is now possible with known pulp and paper processes to supply from the forest lands of the United States all of the pulpwood needed to meet the national pulp and paper requirements.

(c) What adjustments are feasible and necessary and what program of forest conservation is recommended for the immediate and more distant future by the Federal Government, the States, the pulp and paper industry, and private owners of forest lands to make the United States self-supporting in its pulpwood, pulp, and paper requirements.

(d) Whether it would advance or retard the program of forest conservation to make the United States self-supporting as to pulpwood, pulp, and paper requirements from American forests.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I suggest that the Senator from Maine explain the provisions of the resolution.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, recently much has been said about the pulpwood, pulp, and paper industries being failing industries, and it has frequently been stated that if we are to preserve our fast-vanishing soft-wood forests we have got to depend largely upon foreign production. In the State of Maine, where I live, the pulp, paper, and newsprint industries are the principal industries of the State, which supplies about one half the newsprint production in this country and about 20 percent of the woodpulp production. Through a careful system of cutting, our spruce, our fir, and our hemlock forests, instead of vanishing, are increasing, and our available supply of pulpwood, instead of diminishing, is increasing.

Through improvements and modern methods of manufacturing and using wood pulp, it is not improbable that through the development of this product in the Southern and Northwestern States, the business can be put on a basis where the entire supply for the United States can be produced in this country without sacrificing our forests.

The Bureau of Forestry has made an extensive survey of the whole question and has much valuable information in its possession already compiled. I believe that such information should be available for the Congress. All that the resolution seeks is to have the information furnished to the Congress. I cannot see why anyone should object to the resolution.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, it appears that the resolution, by subparagraph (c), calls upon the Secretary of Agriculture for the expression of an opinion as to what adjustments are feasible and necessary and what program of forest conservation is recommended for the immediate and more distant future by the Federal Government; and also, by subparagraph (d), for an expression of opinion as to whether it would advance or retard the program of forest conservation to make the United States self-supporting as to pulpwood, pulp, and paper requirements from American forests.

While the resolution is not, strictly speaking, a request for information, but does call for the expression of an opinion by the Secretary of Agriculture, I do not object to its consideration.

Mr. HALE. It simply requests the Department to give its idea about the proper steps to be taken for forest conservation as far as these various products are concerned.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE DEEP WATERWAY

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate another resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S.Res. 207) submitted by Mr. NYE on the 14th instant, as follows:

Whereas it has been publicly charged that the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Deep Waterway Treaty, now pending in the Senate, betrays American rights and interests to a foreign nation; and

Whereas this charge has repeatedly been made by the members of a political organization known as the "Republican Party" among others by the temporary chairman of the last Republican National Convention, and by a member of the Cabinets of Presidents Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover, under whom the treaty was negotiated; Be it

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed by the Chair to investigate these charges, said committee to consist of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS], and the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]; and be it further

Resolved, That a select committee forthwith summon the Secretaries of State by whom this treaty was negotiated, and by whom it is charged American rights and interests have been betrayed, namely, Charles Evans Hughes, of New York, Secretary of State from 1921 to 1925; Frank B. Kellogg, of Minnesota, Secretary of State from 1925 to 1929; and Henry L. Stimson, of New York, Secretary of State from 1929 to 1933.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I desire to have read, as a sort of preface to my remarks, the resolution which is now before the Senate. Since I am quite hoarse I will ask that the clerk read the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read, as requested. The Chief Clerk again read the resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, as a conservative Republican and as a believer in party regularity, I rise to oppose the resolution. [Laughter.] The objection to it, as I see it, is that it calls public attention to a very unfortunate incident and gives greater publicity to the dissension that has grown up in the ranks of the Republican Party. Why bring up this matter now? The less that is said about it the better. [Laughter.]

It is true that the Senators named in the resolution have been guilty of a very grave injustice to the Republican Party. They have insured against the platform adopted at the last Republican National Convention. [Laughter.] But they are Members of the Senate, and I believe, speaking as a regular, that we need them in the various activities and councils of the Republican Party. In a sense, this will have a tendency to anger them, calling public attention to their insurgency, and it may drive them out of the party. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I am opposed to any action on the part of the Senate that would drive these Senators out of the Republican Party. In some future contest we may need them. The results of the last election indicate that we ought to have had more members of the party. If we keep on with this kind of procedure we may drive everybody out of the regular organization except the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] and myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, it is a grave thing to insurge against a political party. I am not speaking from personal experience, of course. [Laughter.] As a general proposition we ought to be very careful lest we drive some of our members out of the organization. Some of the Senators whose names have been mentioned in the resolution have shown that they can become, and probably will become if we let them remain in the party, very useful members of the organization. The value of regularity has been, by some of these Members of the Senate, very clearly illustrated and demonstrated in the past. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] showed by his activities during the last campaign, particularly by an address that he made to the farmers of America, that he can take great credit and ask for great praise for the Republican candidate for doing a thing that he himself condemned and against which he later voted in the Senate. A man who can do that may in time become a very useful member of the regular organization. [Laughter.]

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield a little later.

Mr. DICKINSON. I think my position was made perfectly clear when I made the statement with reference to the St. Lawrence Treaty that there was no knowledge on my part, that we were absolutely locked at Chicago by lack of diversion rights so far as the benefits to the Mississippi Valley from the canal were concerned and as to the improvement of the Mississippi Valley and the improvement of the Missouri River.

I wish to suggest that my position is substantiated by some of the best engineering authorities and that the writing into the treaty of a Supreme Court decision which happened to be rendered just at that time is inexcusable on the part of those who were supporting the treaty, and that for that reason there was an absolutely different treaty before the Senate from that which was expected by the friends of the waterway in the Middle West.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator's interruption, which he has made without my consent, demonstrates the wonderful possibilities that he possesses to become a guiding star in the regular organization. In the great speech that he made at Chicago on the 30th day of July over the radio to the farmers of America, two weeks after the treaty was published, he praised highly—and it was the climax in his effort to convert the farmers to vote for Mr. Hoover—the wonderful work of Mr. Hoover in negotiating this treaty. For fear he has forgotten it, I will read again what he said.

After discussing in his address to the farmers the various appropriations that had been made for the farmers' benefit, the Senator from Iowa said:

Another subject of vast concern to American agriculture and particularly to this industry in the great Northwestern States is the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway. Favoring this route from the first, President Hoover has succeeded in negotiating a treaty with Canada by which this waterway will be built and a cheap transportation outlet to the Atlantic will be given to the farmers of the Middle Western and Northwestern States.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas and Mr. COUZENS addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield first to the Senator from Arkansas, who, I think, rose first.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, is it true that after making that speech and declaration the Senator from Iowa this morning said that he did not know what he was talking about then; that he did not understand what the treaty provided?

Mr. NORRIS. I am trying to convince the Senate against this resolution. One of the great assets of regularity is the ability to do that very thing—to talk about something and get somebody to start something that you do not know anything about yourself.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And then turn around and vote against it yourself.

Mr. NORRIS. Or, if you do know anything about it, your view and what you are trying to get to the farmers of America are absolutely contrary to each other.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Let me read the rest of the quotation. Then I will yield.

Here is what the Senator from Iowa said further:

Just where the Democratic Party stands on this seaway is questionable. It failed to make any mention of it in the party platform. The story goes that a declaration in favor of it was proposed and rejected. Upon learning this, Senator Walsh of Montana, permanent chairman of the Democratic Convention, raised a fog, but without success in having a declaration written into the platform.

That evening President Roosevelt, the Democratic candidate, made a speech over the radio and announced that he was for the treaty. He construed the Democratic platform to mean that he could, under that platform, be for the treaty. As I said the other day, the statement of the Democratic platform on the treaty would let you in or let you out, just as you preferred.

The next morning after Mr. Roosevelt made that speech, the Senator from Iowa wrote him an open letter, and gave it to the public. I shall not read all of it, but in that letter he said:

Can it be the intention of your managers—

He was writing this to Mr. Roosevelt—to foist this rewritten platform together with your comments thereon upon the American people as the original and genuine article? If so, it is significant that it will be done only after President Hoover had successfully concluded the St. Lawrence Seaway Treaty, and after you undoubtedly had learned of the immense popularity of that project with the farmers of the Middle West.

I have taken it upon myself—

Says the distinguished Senator whom this resolution would read out of the Republican Party—

I have taken it upon myself to direct this inquiry to you because only a few hours prior to your speech I addressed myself over the radio to the American farmer on this very subject. I stated:

"Just where the Democratic Party stands on this seaway is questionable. It failed to make any mention of it in the party platform."

Mr. President, I say from a long observation of regularity and some experience with it in the Republican Party that we are in danger of injuring the Republican Party if, on account of the insurgency of the Senator from Iowa, we read him out of the party. What he said there demonstrates that he can be a very valuable member of the party. He can try, at least, with a straight face to convince the farmers of America that this treaty is one of the greatest things that ever came down the pike, and that the man who negotiated it, Mr. Hoover, was one of the greatest statesmen who ever lived, when as a matter of fact, if we accept what he says now, he did not know what the treaty provided, although it had been published for 2 weeks.

A man who can work the farmers of America, or even try to, on that kind of a thing, ought never to be put out of the regular organization, because such tactics will be useful in many campaigns that are to come in the future.

Mr. HARRISON, Mr. NEELY, Mr. LEWIS, and Mr. DIETERICH addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield first to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator if this is the same acrobatic Senator who, as temporary chairman of the Republican National Convention in 1932 in Chicago, in making the keynote speech, employed this language, speaking of President Hoover and the waterways:

The President also has carried forward negotiations with Canada for the construction of the long-visualized deep waterway from the Great Lakes to the Atlantic to give the Middle West an outlet to the sea, as the waterway from the Great Lakes to the Gulf, construction of which has been in progress many years, now is coming into full operation.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President—

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will Senators let me proceed for just a little while? I shall yield the floor in a very few minutes.

It is true that the Senators mentioned in this resolution perhaps, technically, deserve expulsion from the regular Republican organization; but, as one of the regulars, I desire to advise against it. [Laughter.] I do not believe we ought to punish them in that way when we may need their services, especially when it is demonstrated that at least one of them can show such political acrobatic ability as to be on all sides of a question without ever knowing what the question was. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, it is true that the Senators mentioned in the resolution, under the leadership of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], strayed away from the fold and voted against a party platform pledge. That might be said as justification for their expulsion; but I desire at least to give them another chance to stay in the organization and see if they cannot be regular.

If we shall adopt this resolution, what will happen? My seat-mate, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], who is not here now, will be injured in his candidacy. It will be said in Pennsylvania, "Why, that man has violated a platform pledge of the Republican Party"; and while the Senator is trying to get a Republican nomination in Pennsylvania, the very action of the Senate may be used against him, and possibly may defeat him in that great State of regularity.

Then, Mr. President, we ought to have some regard for our own physical safety. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR], a man that we all look up to, is named in this resolution. If we should anger him by keeping on with this kind of work, I do not know what would happen. I think all the regulars who would remain would turn on their heels and run for shelter. I know I would. [Laughter.]

So we do not know what dangers we are going into if we pass a resolution of this kind. What we ought to do, it seems to me, is to put the brotherly arm of affection about these poor Senators who have temporarily gone astray, tell them how we love them, ask them never to sin any more, and tell them the past will be forgiven. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I have listened with something of commanding interest to the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. Of course, I am not informed as to the particular details which smoldered in his brain undisclosed, or the stimulus for this address he makes to his brother in the party, the Senator from Iowa. That the able Senator from Nebraska has some reason for this engagement in attractive satire, and no doubt great justification, may be conceded. I am not greatly interested, beyond an inclination to say that in this alluring controversy between the Montagues and the Capulets of the party, my response is, in the language of the philosopher of that particular event—

A plague on both your houses.

[Laughter.]

The Senator from Iowa has correctly noted a reference in the document called a "treaty," which assumed to cite the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, rendered in the Drainage District cases, wherein it is asserted that the Court made adverse declarations against the imperial city of Chicago, which I have the honor in part, with my distinguished colleague, Senator DIETERICH, to represent. I desire to say that truth must record that this recital in the treaty did not quote the Court's opinion. It proceeded to quote what it concluded was its construction of the opinion. Now we are informed by the papers this morning that our very distinguished President, eminent in capacity and elevated in the regard, without limitation of Senators on both sides of the Chamber, while deeply in the affection on this side, of the Democracy, has, if reported correctly, likewise fallen into the error, under the advice of someone. The President is reported as asserting that it is the common law, so-called, that declares that there is no right on the part of those insisting that Lake Michigan is an American lake within American territory, and that one body of land with water has no right to take other water from a watershed of another area. It is reported that our President said that such is the law of the United States.

It would be assumed, from that statement, if the honorable President is correctly quoted, that the Senate, made up of lawyers of very high standing, must have fallen into very great error. The information from the press states that the distinguished President said he was quoting an able lawyer, one who was eminent as a lawyer of international law. It is reported that such a one informed him that there is no authority whatever for those of America to take the water from another watershed, wherever located, for the necessities of any particular location.

I would like to respond by saying that I had alluded, in an address I made here a few days ago, to the fact that an officer of the University of Toronto, Canada, in writing letters to America, had assumed to convince certain persons in this community, and certain officials of America, that such a doctrine prevailed. He, in behalf of Canada and the British Empire, proceeded to enforce such doctrine by those communications.

I read now the letter that was omitted from the RECORD of my general address, I having stated I would record it in the report on the reservations. This letter written by this eminent representative of the law department of the University of Toronto declared in behalf of the position which I am sure the President must be misquoted as having affirmed. The writer says:

I agree that Michigan is an American lake in the sense that it is wholly surrounded by American territory.

So says this letter of this eminent representative of the law faculty of the University of Toronto, addressing an American whom he seeks to convert to the theory that the British Empire has a right to Lake Michigan. The letter continues:

I agree, too, that it has been placed on a different footing from the boundary waters and from the St. Lawrence in the treaties of 1871 and 1909. But the fact still remains that the natural flow of Lake Michigan is into Lake Huron and from there via the St. Lawrence to the Atlantic. In other words, it is part of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Watershed and the generally accepted principles of the common and civil law are that there are certain duties on the part of riparian owners toward other riparian owners in such cases.

This writer has been reading something of the law touching irrigation on the farms of the Western States of America, and upon that has sought to educate himself upon international law and international themes of international waters. He concludes:

One of these principles is that of refraining from interference with the natural and undiminished flow of waters of this kind. International law is not as definite in this and other matters as is the common law, but the general and growing opinion seems to be that diversions of this kind are an unjust interference with the rights of other riparian owners, in this case.

Meaning Canada.

Mr. President, the distinguished President of the United States is reported as one having fallen under the influence of some wise director who professes to be learned in ancient international law. This one is reported as informing the President that it is the law that there is no right to draw from one watershed to another; that such is the common law; therefore is the law governing as between States, and as international law between our country and other lands.

I take the liberty of bringing to the attention of those who informed the able President, who, had he not been removed from the active bar, where he stood in eminence—removed by the consuming activities as Governor of New York and as President of the United States—he would have recalled that the Supreme Court of the United States, the source to which they could go for their direct information, had decided the question opposed to the advice given the President, as quoted. Those opinions, beginning in a case that was cited here by the eminent Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] some time past, in Wyoming v. Colorado (259 U.S.Repts.). Here I add, from my own researches, that lately the Supreme Court of the United States has handed down a decision sustaining the views expressed by myself and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON], and that of those of us who sustain the doctrine that it is the right of these States to protect themselves in their necessity for water, or to enjoy the supply, through whatever cause the necessity may come and without regard to where the watershed is. So held the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of State of New Jersey against State of New York, in Two Hundred and Eighty-third United States Reports; and, sir, more fully will the reasoning of the Court be found in a case in Two Hundred and Eighty-third United States Reports, the case of Connecticut against Massachusetts, just lately decided.

I mention these cases that all may observe that somebody has fallen in error in assuming that United States Senators are ignorant of the law, that these who presented both sides of the contention as to this treaty are ignorant of the law, and that some form of stupendous ignorance has upset their minds, and that it is a form of irregularity to oppose any doctrine urged by those who in other lands wish to consume the rights and destroy the privileges of the United States in one form or another under the Constitution and the laws.

Mr. President, I conclude these observations by inviting the attention of my able friend from Nebraska to one of these very irregular Senators who, I would assume, is one of those whom my eminent friend feels have gone a little afield and become what has been called "irregular." I desire to read the utterance of one of the regular Senators:

The dead but sceptred sovereigns who still rule our spirits from their urns.

I refer to that distinguished leader, Senator Lodge, and I wish to read a few lines from his address, when this subject of surrendering to a partnership with Britain for Canadian ownership of American waterways was being discussed in this body. What I read appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 18, 1919, page 3845. Senator Lodge was speaking as the representative of that great party which my eminent friend from Nebraska feels has drifted from regularity, and wants it to be considered seriously as to whether they shall be brought back into the fold with forgiveness or dismissed with punishment. Said Senator Lodge:

We ought to think long before we join with another country to make a waterway which we cannot control. The people who control the mouth of a river control the river. If a waterway can be found through our own country, I think the canal should be built through that way. The route should be through American territory, which would give cheapness of transport to the products of the agricultural West, and yet at the same time keep it within our own boundaries. As long as a waterway is in our own territory there is no danger of any international discussion. One way of making our good relations with Canada as close as possible is to avoid subjects of disputes. We are taking some risk when we put control of a large portion of our most important commerce in the hands of another country.

Mr. President, I submit these views, not that I wish to engage in delayed posthumous obituaries after the funeral and burial of the subject; I only intrude to call attention to what is appropriate in the justification of the position taken by those who have advocated the defeat of this treaty upon greater and broader grounds of the preservation of American sovereignty, than upon the mere matter of the accommodation of transportation or interest in commercial power.

I appreciate the observations of the eminent Senator from Nebraska, and in many regards I approve their sentiment. I rose at this particular time, however, to correct an impression which the public press has indicated has been given by some eminent international lawyer to our distinguished President.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, how thoroughly thoughtless I was yesterday in offering the pending resolution is best evidenced by the eloquence with which the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] has presented the embarrassment which is his, occasioned by the resolution.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. DICKINSON. Would the Senator have any objection, on line 5, page 2, of the resolution, to adding the following Senators to the group already submitted: Senator ADAMS, of Colorado; Senator BAILEY, of North Carolina; Senator BYRD, of Virginia; Senator CLARK, of Missouri; Senator CONNALLY, of Texas; Senator COOLIDGE, of Massachusetts; Senator COPELAND, of New York; Senator DIETERICH, of Illinois; Senator GEORGE, of Georgia; Senator LEWIS, of Illinois; Senator LONERGAN, of Connecticut; Senator LONG, of Louisiana; Senator McCARRAN, of Nevada; Senator MCGILL, of Kansas; Senator NEELY, of West Virginia; Senator OVERTON, of Louisiana; Senator REYNOLDS, of North Carolina; Senator RUSSELL, of Georgia; Senator STEPHENS, of Mississippi; Senator TYDINGS, of Maryland; Senator WAGNER, of New York; and Senator WALSH, of Massachusetts?

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, after listening to the very eloquent appeal made by the Senator from Nebraska in behalf of regularity, I certainly do not want to disrupt the committee which had been originally in mind. What I wanted was a very select committee, and I would have to object to any such amendment as that proposed by the Senator from Iowa. Frankly, I am not desirous of continuing the embarrassment which seems to confront my friend from Nebraska, and I do not think that in all propriety I should press the consideration of the resolution. But what to do with it now is a question that is giving me more than a little concern.

I had thought that since there was no standing committee to which the resolution could be referred it might be referred to the Republican caucus, but the Senator from Nebraska objects to that and tells me that it would bob up there to embarrass him again, as it has already embarrassed him here in the Senate.

I have given consideration to the possibility of referring it to the code authority that is operating under the N.R.A. set-up, but I fail to recollect that there has been any authority named to deal with partisan campaign platforms. Someone has suggested that it be referred to the Federal Trade Commission, with a request that the Federal Trade Commission report to the Senate whether or not there have been unfair practices or inaccurate advertising involved in connection with this pending controversy.

So that, all in all, it seems that there is no place to which such a resolution might properly be referred. Therefore, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). The Senator from North Dakota has the right to withdraw the resolution.

Mr. BORAH. I object.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I do not desire to prevent the execution of the regular order, which is consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar. I ask that the resolution of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota withdrew his resolution, which he had a right to do under rule XXI.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota asked unanimous consent for the withdrawal of the resolution, and I objected.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes, Mr. President; the Senator from North Dakota asked unanimous consent to withdraw the resolution, and objection was made by the Senator from Idaho.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. But the Senator from North Dakota has an absolute right to withdraw his resolution if he wishes to do so.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. But, Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota did not announce that he withdrew his resolution. If he wishes to withdraw it, he has a right to do so.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] will not be overly angry if I insist upon the resolution being withdrawn at this time. We are torn to such shreds over on this side of the aisle that I am sure the Senator from Idaho will serve a real purpose if he withdraws his objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota has a right to withdraw his resolution if he wishes to do so.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, on the request for unanimous consent I object.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota can withdraw the resolution if he wishes to do so; but the Senator asked unanimous consent that the resolution might be withdrawn.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, do I understand that it is the ruling of the Chair that the resolution has been withdrawn?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota has the right to withdraw the resolution if he desires so to do. However, the Senator did not do so. He asked unanimous consent to withdraw his resolution, and objection was made by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I withdraw the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution of the Senator from North Dakota is withdrawn.

MARKETING OF GOVERNMENT SECURITIES

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the resolution.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S.Res. 209), as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is requested to furnish to the Senate, at the earliest practicable date, the following information:

(a) A list of all Government securities offered to the public during the present fiscal year, together with the terms of each such offering.

(b) The allotments made of each such offering, specifying in each case the amount allotted (1) to Federal Reserve banks, (2) to member banks of the Federal Reserve System, (3) to banks not members of the Federal Reserve System, (4) to insurance companies, (5) to corporations other than insurance companies, and (6) to private individuals, together with the market price of all outstanding Government securities at the time such allotments were made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Michigan a question? Has the resolution been exhibited to the Chairman of the Committee on Finance?

Mr. COUZENS. Yes; it has. The Chairman of the Committee on Finance thought it was in order. The primary purpose of the resolution is to secure information for the Committee on Finance, because that committee is considering taxing banks on the cost of handling nontaxable securities.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have no objection.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, is it the purpose of the resolution to secure information as to who were the purchasers of the securities?

Mr. COUZENS. The purpose of the resolution is to secure information as to who were the purchasers of the securities by groups, I will say to the Senator from Idaho, and not by names.

Mr. BORAH. What would be the objection to having the information as to the names of the purchasers of the securities?

Mr. COUZENS. It would take a long time to secure such information and would involve a considerable amount of work. I think if we could obtain a list of purchasers of nontaxable securities by groups, it would not be necessary to get the individual names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution offered by the Senator from Michigan?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 7513) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes; asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. OLIVER of Alabama, Mr. GRIFFIN, Mr. McMILLAN, Mr. WOODRUM, Mr. BACON, and Mrs. KAHN were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

ARTICLE FROM CHICAGO JOURNAL OF COMMERCE

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article by Phil S. Hanna, in the Chicago Journal of Commerce of March 12, 1934, entitled "A Blue Cat in Every Home for Depression Cure."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Chicago Journal of Commerce, Mar. 12, 1934]

ROUND TABLE OF BUSINESS—A BLUE CAT IN EVERY HOME FOR DEPRESSION CURE—MISCELLANY
By Phil S. Hanna

Government statistics show that in the 30,000,000 homes in this country there are only 3,000,000 cats. It is also well established that one cat will consume as much milk as the average human.

Hence, if the cat population was increased to 120,000,000, the consumption of milk would be increased fortyfold.

Since a sufficient number of consumer cats can be acquired by refraining from drowning them for a few months, there should be no necessity of increasing taxes or enlarging the P.W.A. to obtain the necessary cat inventory with which to start our cat recovery program. If the cat population was increased 4,000 percent, it would mean at least 1925 prices for milk and complete parity with industrial prices.

With milk demand increased fortyfold there would be required 40 times more cow feed, barns, milk pails, motor trucks, clerks, etc., than at present. This would furnish an immediate stimulus to the can-producing industry, which would in turn stimulate activities at the tin mines. This would cause a great increase in freight-car loadings, which would cause the railroads to hire more men, buy more cars and locomotives, and use more coal.

But more important than these the increased demand for cow feed would solve the farm-surplus problem. The demand for farm hands to milk cows and to drive milk delivery wagons would solve the farm unemployment problem and help the President in tapering off the C.W.A. in the country districts by May 1. Since the earnings of the railroads would increase as the cat population increased, there would be a great rise in the stock market. The combination of a rise in stocks, and a rise in grain prices, due to the enlarged demand for cow feed to come from the cat movement, would unfreeze billions of dollars of collateral loans and would bring the reopening of many closed banks. The market for farm lands would also open up nicely under these new conditions and there would be a cessation of foreclosures on farms and the reopening of many small country banks. It should not be long before the farmers would be paying off their new loans from the Farm Credit Administration and the Government would thus be enabled to reduce the income taxes.

As the business expansion continued, under our sell-more-milk-by-raising-cats program, the business of Sears, Roebuck and Montgomery Ward would greatly increase; in fact, if space permitted, it would be easy to show how the ramifications would improve all lines of business and the depression would be completely and satisfactorily solved.

But Dr. Moulton, whose story we are repeating from memory, goes further. He points out that the inevitable mortality of the cat population could be capitalized to create many new demands for labor and capital which would cure technocracy. There could be time-payment cat-financing institutions to help those late in getting into the game and who are without surplus cat-buying funds. This paper would be self-liquidating and would create a great amount of paper which the banks would be glad to buy in order to acquiesce in the demands of Jesse Jones to expand credit. And there could be created great financing companies to build cat-cemetery associations which would spend their money to see that these patriotic dead cats received respectable burials. These activities would help to revive the Indiana Limestone Co. and the marble quarries in Vermont. Since each cat has nine lives this corporation could incorporate for at least 99 years.

Those who may wish to particularly commemorate the special service which our felines would contribute to humanity might like to build cat crypts with bronze ornaments. This would help the industries of Connecticut.

And to minister to the cats that might be ill from time to time, public-spirited citizens could organize cat-benefit societies which would employ many veterinarians; to keep householders informed on how to care for the tabbies a number of cat-trade journals would be needed, which would aid unemployed newspapermen.

The cat radio hour would come along in due course and some enterprising Washington bureaucrat would organize a system of reporting on cat economics.

In order to make this enterprise understood quickly and to rally the people the first requisite would be a symbol. This should be a blue cat, which should hang in the front window of every home.

But someone would be sure to find fault with this program. Sooner or later would be great overproduction of cats, which would be accompanied, no doubt, by a great inflation in cat credits and cat stocks. Then a great deflation would ensue—cats would come raining from the skies and from under the beds. Dead cats would fill the air. Secretary Wallace would be called out of retirement to launch a cat-killing program at $5 a head in order to balance production and get a parity between farm and city cat prices. General Johnson would come on the scene demanding that each cat drink more milk, but live a shorter life, to share the work with the unemployed cats. Householders would be required to sign codes of fair cat competition, and a great bureaucracy of compliance officials would grow up.

Finally, the people would find that it took so much milk to feed the bureaucrats (sic) that there would not be enough to feed the recovery cats. Great numbers would decide to dispense with cats, as well as bureaucrats. The blue cats would come raining down out of the windows and after 4 or 5 years the country would be back to where it started, with the 3,000,000 cats for 30,000,000 families, and all would be resigned to go to work again.

Plenty of developments over the week-end; by a 39 to 38 vote the Senate approved the bill to make dairy and beef cattle basic commodities, which means that they will be subject to processing taxes, and if the experience with hogs is a criterion, will go down in price. The lowly peanut, along with flax, rye, barley, and grain sorghum, were added by the Senate to receive A.A.A. benefits.

Inventive business finds a way around the drastic securities act, and hungry bankers get remunerative loans, by converting what is in fact a long-term obligation of the American Metal Co. into short-term paper. With huge reserves, and under the wing of government guarantee, this is good banking now, but some look ahead and declare that some strong antifreeze mixture will be needed later on. Others reflect a bit and opine that these are exactly the kind of loans which the Comptroller told us not to make. It has been truly said that politics has no memory, no foresight, and no conscience.

WAGES AND SALARIES—EDITORIAL FROM WASHINGTON HERALD

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial in the Washington Herald of March 15, 1934, signed by William Randolph Hearst, entitled, "What Is Sauce for the Goose Is Applesauce for the Gander." Through the years Mr. Hearst has stood firmly for the increase of purchasing power through well-filled pay envelopes in the hands of the workers. He has upheld the right of collective bargaining and high wages at times when it was unpopular to do so until today it has become the accepted custom of the land. He has insisted on fair play between labor and management to the end that the interests of both might become one. He now asks that the Government practice in relation to its employees what it preaches to industry in the maintenance of living wages.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Herald, Thursday, Mar. 15, 1934]

WHAT IS SAUCE FOR THE GOOSE IS APPLESauce FOR THE GANDER

The Democratic administration and its representatives demand that industry increase the number of its employees whether needed or not, and that it increase wage scales and salaries by increasing the per diem compensation.

The administration has a right to urge this method of increasing employment and adding to the purchasing power of the community; and if industry has been able to absorb the very recent increases in pay and shortening of hours it should endeavor to comply with this governmental demand.

But the demand of the administration would come with much better grace and much greater force if the Government itself were adopting the principle embodied in this requisition upon private industry.

The administration, however, is not following its own preachment.

It has reduced the wages of Government employees at Washington.

It has cut some 26,000 wage earners from the rolls of the Post Office Department.

It has destroyed the Air Mail Service of the United States, and thrown many thousands of its pilots, mechanics, and other workers out of employment by the conditions it has compelled.

Must private industry not only bear its own burdens of relieving unemployment but also absorb the unemployment which the policies of the administration create?

If the administration is going to establish regulations for industry under the N.R.A., should it not show its sincerity by making those regulations equally applicable to the operations of the Government?

It is easy for the Government to find the money to pay salaries and to provide employment.

It is easy for the Government to find the money to increase salaries and expand employment.

All it has to do is to impose additional taxes on the already heavily burdened backs of the American people.

This the Government apparently does not hesitate to do with or without good reason and with or without beneficial purpose.

It is not so easy for private industry to find the income to bear additional burdens.

Private industry has no power to compel the public to support it.

Private industry cannot maintain a perpetual deficit and issue bonds to meet it, or print new money to meet it.

But there is nothing to prevent the Government from piling up huge indebtednesses, which the public must pay off eventually, whether it wishes to or not.

The Government, therefore, ought to be at least as strict in its adherence to the basic principles of the N.R.A. as it asks private industry to be.

Of course, in fairness to the Government it must be said that it is employing great numbers of people at vast expense on public works and civil works programs; but it also must frankly be said that a considerable part of the vast sums so expended are being wasted through misdirection, through incompetence, through outright crookedness, and through the inevitable waste inherent in the hasty expenditure of large appropriations.

Would it not be better, therefore, for the Government to reduce somewhat the expenditure in the direction where there is so much waste and dishonesty, and to retain on the public pay rolls at living wages the loyal workers who served the country faithfully and skillfully for many years?

The Hearst newspapers cannot be considered to oppose the Public Works programs.

In fact, it was the Hearst papers which first advocated a $5,000,000,000 fund with which to build needed public works and to provide needed relief for the unemployed.

And if this amount had been appropriated in the beginning and spent when and where it was most needed, the depths of the depression could have been avoided, and a larger and more reckless expenditure later could have been prevented.

It is a singular thing in this connection that when the Cosmopolitan Corporation's moving picture, Gabriel Over the White House, was produced it was sent on to Washington for the inspection of the administration and for the benefit of any suggestion the Government might have to make.

This was at the end of March 1933.

The only recommendation of importance made was that the amount of $5,000,000,000 for public works—which the President in the picture was made to demand of Congress—be reduced, as such a sum was excessive and unreasonable.

The amount, therefore, was reduced to $4,000,000,000 in the picture.

That was in the latter part of March. Six months later in the same year the administration was demanding of Congress $10,000,000,000 for public expenditure.

In such rather dangerous ways do extravagances grow.

What was considered excessive and unreasonable in the first months of the administration's term of office was considered inadequate by half before the first year of office had ended.

Government expenditure is definitely necessary in times of depression.

But that expenditure must be conservatively directed and distributed.

And what is more conservative, more legitimate, than for the Government to retain in its employment its own faithful and skillful employees, and to refrain from driving out of employment the faithful and skillful employees of private industry through drastic and ill-considered interference with private enterprise?

The policy of the N.R.A. is sound in many respects, and should be supported as far as it can be complied with; but that policy should be a cooperative policy, a harmonious, helpful policy, not a policy dictated by government to private industry and rejected by government itself.

WHERE DO WE GO FROM HERE?—ARTICLE BY MRS. GEORGE B. SIMMONS

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article appearing in this week's issue of the Saturday Evening Post, entitled "Where Do We Go From Here?" by Mrs. George B. Simmons, whose address is Arrow Rock star route, Marshall, Mo. This is a discussion of the new deal from the viewpoint of a Missouri housewife.

Mrs. Simmons is a Missouri farm woman who with her husband has lived on and operated their present farm for the past 21 years. She therefor has personal knowledge of farm problems. She has also been correspondent of a farm journal for a number of years. From Mrs. Simmons's article it will be gathered that both she and her forefathers have been of the same political faith as the present administration. Her article is unusually able and unusually interesting.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Saturday Evening Post, Mar. 17, 1934]

WHERE DO WE GO FROM HERE?

By Mrs. George B. Simmons

As I work here in our farm home in Missouri I try to think about what I hear and read. I want to see if I can find any hope of making the many pieces of our Nation's present schemes for recovery fit in with what I know about the practical facts of farming and farm life to complete any sort of picture that later can be hung upon the walls of history. I think of what our more than 20 years of working together here on our farm have taught me about simple business honesty and its safe expectations of reward, and try to see if I can find any parallel lines in governmental business and the results it can reasonably expect.

Day after day I listen to explanations of the corn-hog plan as put out over the radio. It seems strange that nobody ever questions its rightness or its success openly. I hear how the cotton-acreage-reduction plan with its attendant cash benefits has helped, and how many checks have gone out to wheat growers for sowing less fields to wheat. I hear occasional mention of the cost of all that is being done, but it seems that figures are so big they have lost any meaning. I hear what the farmers are reported to be thinking and saying, and my husband and I look at each other across the soup we are having for supper, and we say, "We don't think those things. Maybe we are not alone. Maybe we are not the only ones those talkers are mistaken about. Maybe there are others so busy trying to cram the days full of work they are too tired to write or say what they think; or who feel that it would be no use anyway."

WHEN THE RECOVERY POTTAGE IS GONE

I hear and read about gold, in chunks and in dollars, at home and in foreign countries. I cannot remember having ever had a gold dollar in my life, but if I had I reckon that I would not particularly thank anybody to take it from me and hand me back only three fifths of the gold it held before. But then I am doubtless a simple soul needing governmental salvation more than I am able to realize. I smile to myself about how I read years ago that the writer, Clarence Budington Kelland, said his favorite color was the shade of yellow used on gold certificates, and I presume he will have to find his color somewhere else. Maybe he can raise yellow roses. I look outside across the winter-dulled countryside and wonder if it will be any use for me to figure upon putting out any more roses in our back yard, what with taxes and present livestock prices and the crop failures that are inevitable about every so often.

I hear about surpluses and hunger and want, about corporation taxes and brotherly love and the valley of the shadow if we farm people do not cooperate with Government plans made for us, and Government bond issues, and regulation of utilities; and I look at our beloved electric lights that we waited more than 20 years to have, and wonder whether or not the power company will be able to keep on sending us current at any price we can pay. I read about graft and listen to cute conversations between experts put through the radio by various sponsors. I wonder what God thinks of it all, and I ask myself: Where do we go from here?

What of our children and our grandchildren? Can farmers hope for the security some of us knew as children? Can any business dare to hope to grow and profit? Will there be any incentive to work hard and try to get ahead when personal income from hard work must be turned over in such large amounts to the Government in income taxes? What will it do to the souls of people that they may find no encouragement to do their best, it appearing that a premium is set upon inefficiency and waste and idleness? We have grown children, married, and bewildered by the problems of achieving any decent existence. They were taught the strange old creed of trying to do all they could and expecting to profit better by doing so—better than those who did not choose to make their utmost effort. What can we teach our baby, now only 5 years of age? What hope can we hold out to her, as she grows up, in a nation that having gulped its recovery pottage must forego its heritage for taxpaying?

I consider these things as I wash dishes and cook three meals a day, and wash and iron and sew and mend and bake and clean, and wonder how we are to meet the next mortgage interest, and pray for fortitude to help me bear it if we cannot, and so have to join that long line of foreclosed farmers who have been carrying out with them from their lost homes the remains of what laid the foundation of our national progress in the years before the Government began hunting new ways to tax, so that it could spend and spend more money and take on more power.

DYNAMITING DEMOCRACY

I wonder about dictatorships which can be only because power has been bestowed or seized, and what may be the outcome of them. It seems to me that power in the hands of a dictator is like a rope—give him enough and he will hang himself sooner or later. And the despair or the lack of thinking or the indifference that allows dictatorship can carry a capacity for sudden change and vitriolic blame that is consistent with the feeling that it is the dictator's fault when things go wrong. For all concerned, I have to conclude that any kind of dictatorship is dynamite to democracy and to order and to progress. I look out across our land that we still hold by only such a narrow margin, and I know that if my husband cannot make it pay, nobody else can tell him how, and I know that the blood of generations of independent farm people rises within me to hate dictation, no matter how soft the velvet may be laid over its mailed fist, or how beautiful the bribery it offers us for our inalienable rights, which it is trying to deceive us into giving up.

I study and think and try to be fair, to make allowances for conditions; but reducing things the best I am able to, their lowest common denominators, I am forced to keep on believing that what is honesty for the individual is honesty for the group, and what is good business ethics and is reasonable business management for the man is good for the Nation. If I took my neighbor's gold and handed him back three fifths of it, I would be a thief and I would be prosecuted. I cannot see that it is any better for a government to take its citizens' property and appropriate nearly half of it for government use.

If my husband borrowed money and put up big barns he did not really need, and hired help he could get along without, and more help to run around and see what the others were doing, and left some of his fields idle, it would make him a sorry sight.

But then my husband is a farmer, and from what I can gather, while he may at present be in the king row, the farmer is only a checker in our political game, to be moved around and jumped across where the player in power can get the most good out of him.

I am not yet persuaded that it is anybody's unselfish love for the farmer that gives him his present place in the news and views of those who seek to find ways to get around reaping the whirlwind that was to be expected from what was sowed. The politicians need the farmer's vote and his buying power and the food he and his wife and children dig and drudge to produce, yet farmers themselves are too often lacking decent food and respectable clothing or adequate housing or any real pleasure in living, or time or strength soberly to figure out the whys and wherefores of their own overhead exploitation.

DOES LESS CORN MEAN MORE BROTHERLY LOVE?

I know that it would be difficult to find a farm family where dental work is not needed, where more could not be sanely spent for fresh fruit and green vegetables in winter, where self-denial and self-sacrifice are not the rule. But I do not think these conditions are due to overproduction as much as they have come from underconsumption. I still believe—and while I am not trying to represent others' beliefs, for we have far too much stuff put out by self-styled leaders who say they are speaking for other farmers, I must say that I have heard others express the same opinion—that if every man, woman, and child in our Nation could have all that would be required for three satisfying meals every day for 6 months there would be no surplus. I do not see how consumption can be increased by making prices still higher and taxing the poor on the food they eat, so that, afterward, the Government can make levies upon processors of foods to get money to pay some farmers to do less work, and also to pay a lot of Government employees we do not need, to see that the farmers specified do loaf as per agreement. Any who can read market reports must know the processing tax on hogs is being paid by us who produce hogs.

I try to see it all straightly, but the suspicion will not lie down that back of all of these strange schemes is the iron-clad determination of those in power to maintain their positions and to add unto themselves more officials who, within their walls of privilege, can help them hold and add to their personal authority. They are not willing to take their losses to amount to anything more than nice political gestures, and in order to justify themselves they build a fictitious stage scenery of prosperity on borrowed money, and tell us to look and see how pretty it is. But I keep imagining that when I wake up all I can find will be a debt for more money than there is in the entire world, and I look at our land that I love so well, in about the mood that the ancient Hebrew must have known when he built the fire to sacrifice his son. Only God can help me now.

I agree with an Australian visitor who has recently said that cutting production is only creating artificial shortage and artificial poverty. As I look back, I have to remember that here in the second richest county in Missouri, agriculturally speaking, we have had only one really good corn crop in 5 years, and I wonder if those who would cut production have made the necessary arrangements with the weather man.

I cannot help wondering if those who so gayly destroy pigs ever sat up through a zero night in January, cramped into a farrowing shed, trying to help save the babies, or thrilled later to their contending gruntings around the feed troughs, or watched growing children truck away juicy slices of ham, sure they could eat just all they wanted, for there would be plenty? I doubt if those who would advocate the farmer's working on a no-profit basis would be willing to milk twice a day with no shelter from a northwest winter gale but a barbed-wire fence, so be they even knew from which side of the cow to begin the task.

We are exhorted to let brotherly love grow in our hearts, and growing, make us willing to sign the various agreements that we are told will benefit us. I have no objection to brotherly love, but if it is to be my guiding star I do not want it to set in California or New York or on the Canadian line or the Mexican border. It can just shine right around the world, for I had far rather give our surplus pigs and corn and wheat and cotton, so be they demonstrate to my satisfaction that there are any real surpluses, to the blackest cannibal in any African jungle, or the yellow children of China, or the needy anywhere you may find them, than to destroy them, either by doing away with them after they have been produced or to destroy them by not producing them.

I believe in God and in prayer, but I cannot pray for blessings from Him unless I have made the most of my time and strength and opportunity. I cannot ask for further gifts when I have wasted, for any reason whatsoever, what I have already been given. The moral issue here is plain, and for me it must forever take its place in front of any economic expediency.

THE OTHER FACE OF CREDIT IS DEBT

It would be a great deal more comfortable if I could just believe all I am told, but I cannot get so much of it to make any sense. I think it would be just lovely to believe that we shall pay a debt running well above $30,000,000,000 and not notice it, so great will be our returns from the investment, but somehow I am afraid to believe it. The debt my husband and I made when we thought we should buy a farm home has proved a scourge that never lets us rest, and I have come to abominate debt as a curse. We can too easily forget that, as Garet Garrett once wrote, the other face of credit is debt. When I hear and read of all the ways the Government offers credit to farmers, provided they will do as dictated, I want to cry aloud, "Don't you know that credit that promises so enticingly is only debt that leers and mocks and ruins on its other face?" But now wouldn't I be just too unpopular if I did make mention of anything like that! I fear it might be a waste of breath, and, as stated, I do not admire waste.

It would, perhaps, give me the kind of fiendish glee it appears to give to some I have observed could I think of all rich people as greedy and selfish and cruel and needing only to be soaked with another tax, but I cannot so regard them, being, or having been, in my small way, when farming used to pay a little, a partner capitalist with my farmer husband, and having an obsolete respect for property owning and for the ability to be helpful and serviceable that money can give, and which it has given to many who have so used it in the history of our Nation. I realize that there are light-minded rich people who spend their days in pleasure seeking, but there are tramps on our highways who do not possess a dollar who are just as light-minded and just as pleasure seeking. We have this kind of folk in every stratum of human-kind. I once heard a woman say of another, "Well, she is ugly, but I'm sure she is good." Quite impolitely, I laughed aloud, as

I remember; but there is about the same validity in supposing, because a man has a bit of money, that he is bad and fit only for the taxgatherer.

Why is it that the Government can sell its bonds bearing interest rates as low as 1½ percent? Can it be because, having lost faith in using money for regular business undertakings, those who still have any money feel that to have their principal safe and free from taxes is about all they can expect, and so they must accept the low interest? And after the Government has successfully borrowed all the loose cash of its citizens, how is business ever to get to going again so that it can hire and produce, when the Government has its money? I just often wish I had a brain-truster head, so I could figure it all out as neatly as they do. You see, about all I can do is to ask questions.

I am not upholding the sins of past administrations or the dishonesty of certain individuals who cheated in business deals they represented to be safe and income producing. I am not regarding what I can see and hear and learn from any opposing partisan viewpoint. All my people for several generations have been southern, and it is no trouble to guess the party to which they have belonged and given their loyalty. But they were land-owning, land-working people, who saw in their country homes good business investments, an interesting life helping things grow and flourish, and security for leisurely old age, when they properly could enjoy the returns from the labor and thrift of their younger years. While using every honest means they had to increase their holdings, they believed in living as they could afford, and paying their debts and not spending faster than they could make.

If the only grandfather whom I can remember were living now, I can just see how he would get up out of his chair and stomp across the floor on his ninety-and-odd-year-old legs, and say, "Tut, tut, it won't work. It's too much debt", and how the little tuft of whiskers on his lower lip would stick straight out in the way they always did when he shut his mouth upon his honest beliefs, which usually were about exactly right.

PAYING THE PIPER

Of course, I hear how times and conditions have changed, and how now human nature must change, too, and how, since one thing is so, another has got to be, even though nothing in principle or history indicates that it ever has been that way; and I try to persuade myself that maybe the hayseed is in my hair too thick for thought, but I cannot quite succeed. I still believe that what we sow we reap—only more so—that debts must be paid or defaulted upon, and to default does things to character and self-respect that leave scars that are not good to look upon.

I hear that this is an emergency and presently we shall have borrowed ourselves out of it, and everything will be grand, but I cannot find any positive assurance that it will not be just as necessary to put out Government money next winter as this winter. If it was necessary to do all that has been done to avert revolution this winter, what will we do to avert it when the Government can no longer dish out the billions?

A man who tries to think said to me, "When even a part of the people are on the receiving end of ten billions of Government money, it can buy from them a lot of favor and votes; but when it is gone, and there isn't any more, the kick-back will be terrific. Then will come the test."

Where will it all lead? Is a Government-dictated agriculture, with acreage allotments for those who would plant and only so many head of livestock for those who would raise them, coming swiftly upon us? As Government reaches out farther all of the time to get into and control what has hitherto been private business, will we come to nothing better than serfdom made the more poisonous by our modern knowledge of transportation and of communication? Are we heading into State-controlled and enforced socialism? Is democracy, as we have known and loved it, doomed? Are private initiative and private enterprise and personal thrift and personal desire for ownership of property to be thrown useless away? Is the day passing when we can learn anything from history to help us with the present, and are we just naturally too smart to have to abide any longer by the old laws of supply and demand, and right and wrong?

It does no good to retort that these are silly questions. It will do no good to taunt me with the fact that I do not know how to answer some of them. I admit that I do not, and so took for my subject a question, and did not promise to answer it.

AS A FARM WOMAN THINKS

It may be that, as a farm woman, I really should think about the potatoes while I am peeling the potatoes, and not about somebody's unctuous promises or explanations to us farm people coming in over the radio. It may be that when I eat the potatoes I should still cogitate upon them instead of managing my fork with a kind of involuntary motion while I devour the news in the daily paper. The way we are being regulated, I probably should cut down mental production and put part of my brain out to permanent pasture, with a fence around it that wouldn't let an idea get through; but I was brought up in the days when, if a farmer worked and saved, he could send his children to college, and so my father almost ruined me for anything like that. In spite of how much I tell it that it is a futile waste of effort, my mind just will work. I reckon it got the habit, and you know how minds are—if they like to work, there is no stopping them.

And misery loving company, I find it hard not to be a little glad that there are others who also try to think. I know that some of them are today keeping still not because they agree with all these costly schemes for getting over our stomach ache without taking our medicine but because they have such sweet forbearance that they do not want to say a word that could hurt any possible chance of helping anybody. It may be that the administration is trying its best to do what it thinks is best, but human nature is still what it is, and it cannot be changed through any manipulation of the pocket nerve. Economic pills will not cure spiritual ills. It is going to have to be the other way around, and that means a long and arduous road over which only God can guide us. Politicians do not even always know how to read the signposts along the way.

It seems to me that we need to guard our rights as private citizens as never before in the history of our Nation, that we need to examine to see if we have not tacitly abrogated our precious privileges of doing our own thinking, in yielding so much, no matter how imperative may have seemed to be the emergency. It is easier, it takes less mental effort, to take directions from a boss than to figure out how to manage a job oneself. And if things go wrong, we can just sit back and blame the boss; but these are not the ways expectable of the children of our pioneer ancestors who fought to give us a land where there could be freedom of speech and of press and of religious belief, and where we were to perpetuate and make glorious the liberty they envisaged for us. It may be time that we see the shame we have allowed to be brought upon us and the danger that stalks through the very noonday of our national life, and save what we are able of the fragments that are left of the heritage we should have been able to pass on to our children.

For no matter how all-wise might be any dictatorship, it must reflect ignominiously upon any people that they suffer it. Swept by the gales of political clamor, our Congressmen rush too madly to add to the power of the few, and those who try to stop them, to set limits upon them, have little chance. It may be time for things thought out down on the farm to be voiced by somebody.

QUESTIONS WE SHOULD STUDY

I cannot answer all of the questions I am asking or that I have heard others asking. But I believe they are questions we need to study with all the concentration of which we are capable, and all the love of country, and all the loyalty we have to the work we have chosen as a profession. We know we are in the midst of change, but even change works according to rules and principles. It would pay us to hold this in mind.

I love the country and to do what I can to help things grow. I have always chosen to help anything that needed help, and not to let it suffer and die if I could do something to help to save it. I think that it is all wrong that a business as basic as agriculture in a nation such as ours should have to exist upon government subsidies, or deliberately cripple itself, like stepsisters cutting off pieces of their feet to try to make them fit Cinderella's slipper, to try to make itself fit the shoe somebody else says it ought to walk in, if it is to get along. It should stand upon its own strong feet, serving as only it can.

No man or woman should be limited from making any fortune that can be made honestly, and it is wrong that a government should have wasted until confiscatory taxation must be practiced. Such waste must not longer be tolerated.

No other business is as completely dependent upon private initiative and private personal devotion and labor as is farming. Take out of American farming the incentive to prosper, to own, to have, to hold, to improve, to enjoy, to be certain of keeping, and the Government had as well have the farms, for you cannot hire anything to take the place of the love of home that has carried so many of us through scorching days of summer and the exposure of winter weather, through sacrifice and losses and shabbiness and deprivation, and made us feel that none of these mattered if some day we could have a good farm home and a bit of time to rest in it.

THREE THINGS FARM PEOPLE NEED

Where do we go from here? Your answer may be far better than mine; but as sure as we live, or anybody lives, we shall go on to something, somewhere, from here, and now is the time to be having something to say about the direction to be taken. The daughter of debt is hate, a terrible thing wherever seen, and we need less of her and more of the contentment that can be the offspring only of thrift and good management and courage and faith.

I know that some of the beliefs I have set out here may look very different from those many have been reading, but I still believe in personal independence of thought and action, as long as one holds to law and order. I still believe in that individualism that some have lately held up to ridicule and scorn. God gives it to each of us and leaves no directions for later handing it over to scoffers. I believe that lower taxes, lower interest rates, and to have been let alone were all, and still are all, that we farm people need. I believe the same three suggestions would work for many another business now being crippled and maimed beyond recognition by Government interference and political dictatorship.

These simple means would have enabled much more help to have been used by private business and much more capital to have been invested in it. Of course, there would not have been as many Government jobs, but some of us could have endured that.

Experiments may be all very well, but the patient can die if they last too long. Sometimes, thinking from what we have come to what we have come, I cannot help it that tears fall into the dishwasher, or that a cold wind of fear makes me shiver when I consider whither we can be going. This is your country and mine, whether we live in country or in town, are poor or well to do, and it is your concern and mine that we assume the responsibility we shall never have any alibi for having shirked, and do what we are able, be it little or much, to see that there shall be no more jeopardizing of the rights of our Constitution set forth as ours to have and to cherish.

CARRIAGE OF AIR MAIL BY THE ARMY—LETTER FROM GENERAL MITCHELL

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD the text of a letter from Gen. William Mitchell, bearing date March 13, 1934, to Senator Hugo L. BLACK, of Alabama. This letter appeared in the Washington Herald of March 14.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

MARCH 13, 1934.—I believe the time has come when the air-mail situation should be presented to the people of the United States in its true light and dispel the distorted impression which has been created in their minds by the persistent and carefully planned malicious propaganda of the air-mail contractors and their affiliates.

I feel that the President and the Government should be justly proud of the position they have taken with respect to our aeronautics. The people of the United States had the right to expect that the Army Air Corps could fly the air mail with ease because conditions of war will be much more trying.

For years we were assured by the Republicans and by the civilian air contractors that we had the best air equipment in the world and it is only through the wise move of the President that we discovered the appalling state of the most important arm of our national defense.

INADEQUATE PLANES

The skill, courage, and the chivalry of our splendid Army fliers have been completely nullified by inadequate equipment and curtailment of the number of hours they could fly by the War Department. This did not give them an opportunity to perfect themselves in flying through storms and bad weather conditions.

It is only through continuing the present mail operations that the true facts can be found out and remedies applied. Our whole aircraft set-up must be reorganized and particularly our present aircraft industry, which is controlled and held down by holding companies who have little or no knowledge of aviation.

It is a fact that much the same groups that have obtained our air-mail contracts by collusion and fraud control the supply of aircraft and military equipment. It is they who are responsible for the poor equipment of our military fliers.

While it is very distressing that the lives of our brave pilots have been lost, think of what would have occurred to the lives of millions of our innocent population who would be mercilessly annihilated in the next conflict if these facts had not been uncovered. Our national defense, possibly our existence, are really at stake. We might have continued on in blissful ignorance if it had not been for the courageous move of our President.

51 DIE ON AIR LINES

I have before me a list of 51 people that have been killed as a result of aircraft accidents in civil aircraft in the last 3 months. Many of these have been killed in the regular air liners.

These air liners are not properly equipped for their work with the safety devices which can be put on airplanes today. They were not so equipped because these civilian lines either did not know what they should have or they considered it too expensive to install it. The public, through their propaganda, were led to believe that these planes were safe, and the lives of these innocent passengers were sacrificed through the greed for financial profits.

The air companies' stock was sold to widows and orphans as well as to people in high places and key positions, with the understanding that their aircraft and service were not only the best but would continue indefinitely to return them handsome dividends. Their stock has been manipulated so that in some cases it was boosted from $1 to $10,000, while their nonflying executives have given themselves enormous salaries really at the public expense.

Today Senator Fess, in a speech in the Senate, resumed his efforts to have the air mail restored immediately to the private contractors. He is the father of the man that was employed by the air-mail contractors as a lobbyist and paid three or five thousand dollars by the commercial air interests for 2 days' work here as a lobbyist for getting through air-mail legislation.

Senator Fess also stated that one of the air-line companies offered to turn over its aviators and ground facilities for use of the War Department. This was prohibited in the Executive order which was issued when the Army took over the air mail, that none of the facilities of the companies whose contracts had been canceled for collusion and fraud would be used.

HIRE MAIL PILOTS

The Army Air Corps has been attempting to hire or employ former pilots of the commercial companies and about 25 or 30 have been hired up to date. They, however, have to be trained on the Army equipment, which is different from the civil equipment. This, of course, should not be tolerated in any future arrangement.

The equipment of any of the air lines should be well known and understood both by the military fliers as should be the case with the military transport planes to the civilian fliers. What has really happened is that the commercial companies with their pilots have practically defied the Government. This might prove a very serious matter in case of war.

I believe that a thorough investigation should be made of the connection of some of our civilian contractors for aircraft equipment and aircraft accessories, bomb sights, and fire-control devices with foreign governments. It appears probable that foreign powers are able to get information from these factories which our Government has paid for, regards as confidential, and should remain secret.

The whole truth should be told to the American people, and the courageous attitude assumed by the President should be maintained by all who have the future of this country nearest their hearts.

Sincerely,

WILLIAM MITCHELL,
Brigadier General.

FEDERAL CONTROL OF NEWS-DISSEMINATING AGENCIES

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, one of the most brilliant Senators who ever sat in this body was James A. Reed, of Missouri, who also happened to be a distinguished member of the Democratic Party, and was one of the candidates for President of that party in 1928. Recently in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, ex-Senator Reed gave an interview to the press, which was published in the Chicago Daily Tribune on March 7. I quote the headlines:

Ex-Senator Reed sees Federal blow to press. Fears united control of news channels.

I will read only a portion of the language attributed to ex-Senator Reed. The article says:

"A good illustration", he continued, "is the radio, which is employed many hours each week in disseminating arguments in favor of what the Government is doing. I have no knowledge as to whether this propaganda is paid for or not, but if anyone would want to present the other side of the question and were to undertake to get as many hours for his side as is being used by Government agencies, the bill would speedily run into millions of dollars."

"The result is", Reed asserted, "that the American people—who might be called the 'great American jury'—are in the position of a jury in court which hears only the attorney for the plaintiff, who presents not only the arguments but all the statements of fact."

There is more in the interview, and I ask that it may all be printed in the RECORD, especially since ex-Senator Reed is not only a very distinguished Democrat but a prominent American citizen for whom everybody has the greatest respect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The newspaper article referred to is as follows:

[From Chicago Daily Tribune, Mar. 7, 1934]

EX-SENATOR REED SEES FEDERAL BLOW TO PRESS—FEARS UNIFIED CONTROL OF NEWS CHANNELS

CEDAR RAPIDS, IOWA, March 6.—Danger to the freedom of the American press if Federal control of communication lines, as advocated by President Roosevelt, is enacted by Congress was cited in an interview here today by former Senator James A. Reed, of Missouri. Mr. Reed is a Democrat leader.

The extent to which radio is controlled and influenced by the Government was pointed to by Reed as one of the hazards imminent to newspapers, if the Government is permitted to take control or possession of telegraph and telephone lines. Such a plan, he said, would enable an administration in control of such lines of communication largely to influence and circumscribe the dissemination of news.

SEES LESSON IN RADIO

"A good illustration", he continued, "is the radio, which is employed many hours each week in disseminating arguments in favor of what the Government is doing. I have no knowledge as to whether this propaganda is paid for or not; but if anyone would want to present the other side of the question and were to undertake to get as many hours for his side as is being used by Government agencies, the bill would speedily run into millions of dollars."

"The result is", Reed asserted, "that the American people—who might be called the 'great American jury'—are in the position of a jury in court which hears only the attorney for the plaintiff, who presents not only the arguments but all the statements of fact. I do not say that any misuse has been made, but it is easy to see how it could occur."

FOR OPEN NEWS CHANNELS

"There is nothing so important in a democracy as a free and fair dissemination of information. The telegraph, the telephone, and the radio have become almost as important as the press itself."

Reed, who was a candidate for the Democratic nomination for President in 1928, criticized the general principle of Government in business.

"In any business that can be conducted by private companies governmental management is almost invariably a mistake", he added. "Costs increase and inefficiency in management inevitably result."

RECOVERY IN ECONOMIC CONDITIONS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, before proceeding with the regular order I ask, as something of a counterstatement to the statement inserted in the RECORD by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON], to supply for the RECORD a statement by that great Republican leader, the Honorable Ogden Mills, who makes the very significant and, to me, highly gratifying announcement, in contradiction of the attitude taken by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON], that the United States is experiencing a recovery of economic conditions. I read into the RECORD an International News Service report from Chicago. The headline is:

Ogden Mills sees United States turning the corner.

Of course, that is a very significant headline. We were told during the last administration, the administration of President Hoover, that prosperity was just around the corner. Now the former Secretary of the Treasury, who, for this purpose, certainly is entitled to credence, announces that the United States is turning that corner. I read:

CHICAGO, March 10.—"Business conditions not only in the United States but throughout the world are improving." That was the declaration today of Ogden Mills, of New York, Secretary of the Treasury under President Hoover. Mr. Mills said: "Retail sales are picking up. Public expenditures are helping that pick-up. Conditions all over the world are improving, because public confidence is improving."

I ask for the regular order.

STATISTICAL STUDIES BY THE DEPARTMENT OF LABOR

The bill (S. 2689) to authorize the Department of Labor to make special statistical studies upon payment of the cost thereof, and for other purposes, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Department of Labor be, and hereby is, authorized, within the discretion of the Secretary of Labor, upon the written request of any person, to make special statistical studies within the general scope of the Department's activities; to prepare from its records special statistical compilations; and to furnish transcripts of its studies, tables, and other records, upon the payment of the actual cost of such work by the person requesting it.

Sec. 2. All moneys hereinafter received by the Department of Labor in payment of the cost of such work shall be deposited to the credit of the appropriation of that bureau, service, office, division, or other agency of the Department of Labor which supervised such work, and may be used, in the discretion of the Secretary of Labor, and notwithstanding any other provision of law, for the ordinary expenses of such agency and/or to secure the special services of persons who are neither officers nor employees of the United States.

Sec. 3. The Secretary of Labor shall prescribe rules and regulations for the enforcement of this act.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 2359) to provide for the disposition of unclaimed deposits in national banks was announced as next in order.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2500) to aid in relieving the existing national emergency through the free distribution to the needy of cotton and cotton products was announced as next in order.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1800) to provide for an investigation and report of losses resulting from the campaign for the eradication of the Mediterranean fruit fly by the Department of Agriculture was announced as next in order.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2835) to amend section 21 of the act approved June 5, 1920, entitled "An act to provide for the promotion and maintenance of the American merchant marine, to repeal certain emergency legislation, and to provide for the disposition, regulation, and use of property acquired thereunder, and for other purposes", as applied to the Virgin Islands of the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like some explanation of the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, in the absence of the chairman of the committee reporting the bill, I suggest that it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On objection, the bill will be passed over. The clerk will state the next bill on the calendar.

The bill (H.R. 1403) for the relief of David I. Brown was announced as next in order.

JOANNA A. SHEEHAN

The bill (S. 628) for the relief of Joanna A. Sheehan was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to redeem, in favor of Joanna A. Sheehan, of Haverhill, Mass., United States Liberty loan permanent coupon bond no. 321498 in the denomination of $1,000, of the third 4¼'s, issued May 9, 1918, matured September 15, 1928, with interest from the date of issue to the date of maturity, at the rate of 4¼ percent per annum, without presentation of said bond, the said bond, together with coupons due September 15, 1922, to September 15, 1928, inclusive, attached, having been lost, stolen, or destroyed: Provided, That the said bond shall not have been previously presented and paid, and that payment shall not be made hereunder for any coupons which shall have been previously presented and paid: And provided further, That the said Joanna A. Sheehan, shall first file in the Treasury Department a bond in the penal sum of double the amount of the principal of the said Liberty loan bond and the unpaid interest which had accrued thereon when the principal became due and payable, in such form and with such surety or sureties as may be acceptable to the Secretary of the Treasury, with condition to indemnify and save harmless the United States from any loss on account of the Liberty loan bond or the coupons thereof hereinbefore described: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

HARRY F. STERN

The bill (S. 1114) for the relief of the estate of Harry F. Stern was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to have the Senator from Pennsylvania explain the bill.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, this case is a matter of an overpayment of an inheritance tax to the State of Pennsylvania and the estate tax to the Federal Government. At the time Stern died there was pending in the Supreme Court the question of the constitutional right of Pennsylvania to collect 80 percent of the calculated Federal tax. The right of the State so to collect was finally sustained. The executors very promptly paid what they thought was due to the State of Pennsylvania and also to the Federal Government, but they overpaid the Federal Government by some $18,000. They did not learn of the act requiring the payment of 80 percent of the Federal tax to the State until 3 weeks after the time for filing a claim for refund had expired; but inasmuch as in a perfectly innocent way they have paid the Federal Treasury $18,000 more than is admittedly due from them, it seems to me that the bill is just.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I observe from a casual inspection of the record that an adverse report on the bill was made by former Acting Secretary of the Treasury Mr. A. A. Ballantine. The report was submitted under date of May 6, 1933.

Mr. REED. That is correct, Mr. President. The Treasury Department uniformly has reported against bills of this character, no matter what the equity is or the admitted justice. If the Senator will read the report of the Treasury Department, he will see that the Department admits that the Federal Government was not entitled to this money and was not entitled to keep it if a timely claim for refund had been made.

If there had been any excuse, then, I doubt whether the Committee on Claims would have reported the bill favorably, but the circumstance of this litigation, which held up the case so that no one knew how much should be paid, seemed to the committee, and it seems to me, to make a justifiable difference.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, in view of the state of the record, I shall ask that the bill go over. I will give consideration to the matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made, and the bill will be passed over.

NOANK SHIPYARD, INC.

The bill (S. 2324) for the relief of the Noank Shipyard, Inc., was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to the Noank Shipyard, Inc., of Noank, Conn., the sum of $1,700, with interest at 4 percent per annum from March 1, 1928, to complete the payment to the said Noank Shipyard, Inc., of a bill for repairs, which it completed under contract no. W-971-qm-247, dated January 7, 1928, of Quartermaster Department on Army mine planter Brigadier General Absalom Baird, which sum represents a penalty of $100 per day for 17 days' alleged delay in delivery of said steamship Baird after completion of repairs, said delay being due to causes partly attributable to acts of Government agents and wholly beyond the control of the contractor.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 2719) for the relief of A. Randolph Holladay was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On objection, the bill will be passed over.

ANSON H. PEASE

The bill (S. 838) for the relief of Anson H. Pease was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, there are on the calendar a number of measures reported by the Chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs. If any member of the committee is present, I should like to ask whether all these measures, some of them relating to the granting of patents to Indians, are in harmony with the new policy, as I understand that new policy to be, of restricting the right of alienation upon the part of the Indians—in view of the fact that so many of the lands to which they have received title have been obtained from them by methods that are scarcely ethical—to their great disadvantage. I do not like to object to any measure that is for the relief of the Indians, but there are a number of these measures, and I suggest that this one be passed over temporarily.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard, and the bill will be passed over.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 2870) to require the publication of reports of condition of State member banks of the Federal Reserve System, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. REED. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On objection, the bill will be passed over.

NEZ PERCE TRIBE OF INDIANS

The bill (S. 847) for the relief of the Nez Perce Tribe of Indians was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of Congress approved February 20, 1929 (45 Stat. 1249) entitled "An act for the relief of the Nez Perce Tribe of Indians", be amended by inserting the following provision at the end of section 4 thereof, namely: "Provided, That any necessary costs and expenses heretofore or hereafter incurred by the attorneys for the said Nez Perce Tribe of Indians in the prosecution of proceedings under this act, under the terms and provisions of the attorneys' contract approved by the Secretary of the Interior, shall be paid out of the funds of the said Indians in the Treasury of the United States upon proper vouchers, to be examined and approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs."

E. C. SAMPSON

The bill (S. 1498) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to pay E. C. Sampson, of Billings, Mont., for services rendered the Crow Tribe of Indians, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, upon proper vouchers, out of the tribal funds belonging to the Crow Tribe of Indians of Montana in the Treasury of the United States, a sum not exceeding $600 to E. C. Sampson, irrigation engineer, of Billings, Mont., employed by the Crow Tribe to investigate, report, and testify in the manner of the claims pending in the Court of Claims entitled "The Crow Tribe of Indians against the United States", arising out of construction of irrigation project within the Crow Reservation with tribal funds: Provided, That the said E. C. Sampson shall submit with his vouchers satisfactory evidence of services rendered the said tribe.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 1882) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue patents for lots to Indians within the Indian village of Taholah on the Quinault Indian Reservation, Wash., was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that bill go over, for reasons indicated a few moments ago.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the bill will be passed over.

HOMESTEAD DESIGNATIONS ON ALLOTTED INDIAN LANDS

The bill (S. 1887) to authorize the change of homestead designations on allotted Indian lands, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That where any Indian who now has or may hereafter acquire an allotment designated as a homestead and such Indian owns other restricted allotted lands acquired by inheritance or otherwise, the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to allow such Indian owner to change the designation of his or her homestead to other restricted lands owned by the said Indian. Upon acceptance by the Secretary of the Interior of relinquishments and the designation of lieu homestead lands, appropriate patents or other evidence of title as may now or hereafter be provided for by law shall be issued to the Indian owner for the lands so redesignated: Provided, however, That this act shall not apply to the Indians of the Five Civilized Tribes, nor to the Osage and the Kaw Indians in Oklahoma.

GRAZING RESOURCES OF CEDED INDIAN LANDS

The bill (S. 1888) to provide for the protection and conservation of the grazing resources of the undisposed-of ceded Indian lands, the tribal title to which remains unextinguished, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized in his discretion to withdraw from settlement, location, sale, or entry any ceded Indian lands containing springs or living waters, or lands deemed to be valuable for stock-watering purposes, tribal Indian title to which has not been extinguished, together with lands necessary for access thereto, and to conserve said lands for the benefit of the particular tribe of Indians whose undisposed-of ceded lands may be affected pursuant to this act.

FOREST AND GRAZING LANDS ON INDIAN RESERVATIONS

The bill (S. 1889) to facilitate a more economical administration of forest and grazing lands on Indian reservations, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, with the consent of the Indians occupying a reservation, expressed in general council, the Secretary of the Interior may use such tribal funds as may be appropriated therefor by Congress, which appropriations are hereby authorized, for the purchase of alienated lands or lands allotted to individual Indians which are needed for the effective administration of forest or grazing lands held for the benefit of the tribe as community property.

RESERVOIR SITES ON INDIAN IRRIGATION PROJECTS

The bill (S. 1890) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to grant concessions on reservoir sites and other lands in connection with Indian irrigation projects and to lease the lands in such reserves for agriculture, grazing, or for other purposes, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to grant concessions on reservoir sites, reserves for canals or flowage areas, and other lands under his jurisdiction in connection with irrigation projects constructed or being constructed or operated and maintained for the benefit of Indians, and to lease such lands for agricultural, grazing, or other purposes: Provided, That such concessions may be granted or lands leased by the Secretary of the Interior under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, for such considerations and for such periods of time as he may deem proper, the term of no concession to exceed a period of 10 years: Provided further, That the funds derived from such concessions or leases, except funds so derived from Indian tribal property for which the tribe has not been compensated, shall be available for use in accordance with the existing laws in the operation and maintenance of the irrigation projects with which they are connected. The funds so derived from Indian tribal property shall be deposited to the credit of the proper tribe.

SHOALWATER INDIAN RESERVATION, WASH.

The bill (S. 1881) to authorize the creation of an Indian village within the Shoalwater Indian Reservation, Wash., and for other purposes, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to reserve and set aside for Indian-village purposes, and to survey and plat into village blocks, lots, streets, and alleys a suitable area of land within the Shoalwater (Georgetown) Reservation, and thereafter dispose of the village lots in accordance with section 10 of the act of June 25, 1910 (36 Stat.L. 855-858).

Sec. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to expend so much of the $15,150 derived from the sale of timber on the reservation and now carried in "Special deposits" to the credit of the Superintendent of the Taholah Agency, as may be needed to carry out the provisions of section 1 of this act and to assist the Indians who receive lots in developing the village and building homes therein, including the construction of such water, sewer, and fire-protection facilities as may be practicable: Provided, That the balance of said funds remaining unexpended after development of the village may be used in promoting the health and the educational and industrial welfare of the Indians living therein.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 2754) to add certain public-domain land in Montana to the Rocky Boy Indian Reservation was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, that appears to be a bill ceding in the aggregate a large area of public lands to the Indian reservation. In the absence of the Chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, I think the bill had better go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the bill will go over. The clerk will state the next bill on the calendar.

UNSOLICITED MERCHANDISE IN THE MAILS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2101) to prohibit the sending of unsolicited merchandise through the mails, which had been reported from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads with amendments, in section 2, page 1, line 9, after the word "mails", to strike out "it shall not be delivered to the addressee, but," and insert "and the addressee thereof refuses to accept the same, then,"; and, on page 2, line 2, after the word "prescribe", to insert "such unsolicited merchandise", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter unsolicited merchandise which any person desires to send for the purpose of sale to the addressee shall not be accepted for mailing. The term "person", when used in this act, means an individual, partnership, corporation, or association.

SEC. 2. If such unsolicited merchandise is deposited in the mails and the addressee thereof refuses to accept the same, then, under such regulations as the Postmaster General may prescribe, such unsolicited merchandise shall be returned to the sender charged with postage due at double the regular rates to be collected from him upon delivery. On failure of the sender to pay such return postage, the matter shall be disposed of as other dead matter.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INTERNATIONAL TECHNICAL COMMITTEE OF AERIAL LEGAL EXPERTS

The joint resolution (S.J.Res. 83) amending Public Resolution No. 118, Seventy-first Congress, approved February 14, 1931, providing for an annual appropriation to meet the quota of the United States toward the expenses of the International Technical Committee of Aerial Legal Experts, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That Public Resolution No. 118, Seventy-first Congress, approved February 14, 1931, providing for an annual appropriation to meet the quota of the United States toward the expenses of the International Technical Committee of Aerial Legal Experts, be amended to read as follows:

"That a sum not to exceed $250 is hereby authorized to be appropriated annually to meet the share of the United States of the expenses of the International Technical Committee of Aerial Legal Experts, beginning with the year 1930.

"SEC. 2. An annual appropriation in the sum of $3,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State, is hereby authorized for the expenses of participation by the Government of the United States in the meetings of the International Technical Committee of Aerial Legal Experts and/or of the commissions established by that committee, including traveling expenses; personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere without reference to the Classification Act of 1923, as amended; stenographic and other services, by contract if deemed necessary, without regard to the provisions of section 3709 of the Revised Statutes (U.S.C., title 41, sec. 5); rent; purchase of necessary books and documents; printing and binding; official cards; entertainment; and such other expenses as may be authorized by the Secretary of State."

RUFUS J. DAVIS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1072) for the relief of Rufus J. Davis, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments, on page 1, line 6, after the words "sum of", to strike out "$5,000" and insert "$1,223.50"; and on line 11, after the date "1928", to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Rufus J. Davis, Hope Mills, N.C., the sum of $1,223.50, in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States arising out of personal injuries sustained by him as the result of an accident involving a United States Army truck on North Carolina State Highway No. 22, on March 13, 1928: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE VOELTZ

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1232) for the relief of George Voeltz, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments, on page 1, line 6, after the numerals "$5,000", to insert "in full settlement of all claims against the Government", and in line 9, after the word "service", to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. And person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to George Voeltz the sum of $5,000 in full settlement of all claims against the Government for damages suffered by reason of being struck by a Government motor truck which was driven by a clerk in the United States Mail Service: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TAMPA MARINE CO.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 826) for the relief of the Tampa Marine Co., a corporation, of Tampa, Fla., which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the Tampa Marine Co., a corporation, of Tampa, Fla., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,130, representing a penalty imposed upon said company in connection with a contract made between said company and the Government, dated August 15, 1928, for certain work and repairs on the United States lightship tender Ivy.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 2018) relative to Members of Congress acting as attorneys in matters where the United States has an interest was announced as next in order.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1874) relative to leasing restricted lands of Indians to the Five Civilized Tribes of Oklahoma, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, let that bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1657) to amend section 3 of the act entitled "An act to extend the period of restriction in lands of certain members of the Five Civilized Tribes, and for other purposes", approved May 10, 1928 (45 Stat.L. 496), as amended by the act of February 14, 1931 (46 Stat.L. 1108), was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I inquire if any Senator is present who is willing to explain this measure? I do not like to object, but in the absence of any member of the committee I will ask that the bill be laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made, and the bill will be passed over.

BOUNDARY LINE BETWEEN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA AND VIRGINIA

The bill (H.R. 6223) to provide for the appointment of a commission to establish the boundary line between the District of Columbia and the Commonwealth of Virginia was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to determine the boundary line between the District of Columbia and the State of Virginia, and to provide for settlement of claims to property along or affected by said boundary line, the President of the United States is hereby requested to designate and appoint one commissioner, who is hereby directed, authorized, and empowered to act in conjunction with a like commissioner to be appointed pursuant to an act of the Legislature of Virginia. The said two commissioners so appointed and a third person to be selected by them are hereby constituted a commission for the purpose of surveying and ascertaining the boundary line between the District of Columbia and the State of Virginia, and are hereby directed, authorized, and empowered to survey and fix said boundary line and to mark the said line when so determined by suitable monuments, acting within the limits of their authority and guided by the provisions herein set forth. The said commissioners so selected shall serve until the completion of their report or not later than March 1, 1935.

SEC. 2. In determining the location of said boundary said commissioners shall take into consideration, amongst other things, the several decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in relation thereto, the findings and reports of the Maryland and Virginia Boundary Commission of 1877, the compact of 1785 between the State of Maryland and the Commonwealth of Virginia, the claims of ownership of the United States and all private persons and corporations along the Virginia shore line, and the equitable and prescriptive rights, if any, of the United States and private claimants growing out of long, continued, and uninterrupted possession; and shall mark such line as they may recommend as the boundary line and shall report their findings and recommendations to Congress and to the Legislature of Virginia for action to finally ratify and establish said boundary line.

SEC. 3. To provide for the settlement of titles to the property adjoining or affected by the determination of said boundary line, the said commissioners are further authorized and instructed to investigate all questions of title as between the United States and private citizens over such lands, all questions of equitable and prescriptive rights arising from long and continued possession and occupancy either on the part of the United States or private citizens, and all improvements of said lands either by the United States or private citizens made in good faith and upon belief of good title, and said commissioners shall report their findings and recommendations in this respect for the equitable settlement of all such disputed titles, including proposed payments to and from the United States, and such other recommendations as in their opinion may promote a just and reasonable settlement of the title to said property. Nothing contained in said recommendation with respect to title shall be binding upon either the United States or private claimants.

SEC. 4. Said commissioners shall receive compensation for such days as they may actually work at the rate of $15 per day, plus travel and subsistence expenses, and shall have authority to employ such assistants at such rates of pay as they may deem appropriate without regard for the Classification Act of 1923. The said commissioners may call upon all officers and agencies of the Federal Government and the District of Columbia for information and advice, and said officers are hereby authorized and directed to supply such information on request. Said commission shall make such surveys, hold such hearings, and conduct such other investigations as it may deem necessary and advisable to carry out the purposes of this act.

SEC. 5. For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act and the payment of salaries and compensation herein provided for, the sum of $10,000, or as much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized to be appropriated from any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

CLAIMS FOR LAND ALONG POTOMAC RIVER

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2508) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior, with the approval of the National Capital Park and Planning Commission and the Attorney General of the United States, to make equitable adjustments of conflicting claims between the United States and other claimants of lands along the shores of the Potomac River, Anacostia River, and Rock Creek in the District of Columbia, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment, on page 1, line 5, after the word "water", to strike out the words "in the District of Columbia", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purpose of establishing and making clear the title of the United States in and to any part or parcel of land or water in, under, and adjacent to the Potomac River, the Anacostia River, or Eastern Branch, and Rock Creek, including the shores and submerged or partly submerged land, as well as the banks of said waterways, and also the upland immediately adjacent thereto, including made land, flat lands, and marsh lands, in which persons and corporations and others may have or pretend to have any right, title, claim, or interest adverse to the complete title of the United States as set forth in an act entitled "An act providing for the protection of the interest of the United States in lands and water comprising any part of the Potomac River, the Anacostia River, Eastern Branch, and Rock Creek, and adjacent lands thereto", approved April 27, 1912 (37 Stat. 93), and in order to facilitate the same, by making equitable adjustments of such claims and controversies between the United States of America and such adverse claimants, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to make and accept, on behalf of the United States, by way of compromise when deemed to be in the public interest such conveyances, including deeds of quitclaim and restrictive and collateral covenants, of the lands in dispute as shall be also approved by the National Capital Park and Planning Commission and the Attorney General of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REGULATION OF INDUSTRIAL LIFE INSURANCE

The bill (S. 195) respecting contracts of industrial life insurance in the District of Columbia was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That policies of industrial weekly payment life insurance hereafter issued or delivered in the District of Columbia shall be subject to the following conditions, in addition to any others prescribed by law and not inconsistent with the provisions of this act.

GOOD FAITH

SEC. 2. If payment of such a policy shall be refused because of unsound health at or prior to the date of the policy, the good faith of both applicant and insured shall constitute a material element in determining the validity of the policy; and it shall not be held invalid because of unsound health unless the insurer shall prove that, at or before the date of issue of the policy, the insured or applicant had knowledge of, or reason to know, the facts on which the defense is based, or shall prove that the insurance was procured by the insured or applicant in bad faith or with intent to defraud the company, any provision, agreement, condition, warranty, or clause contained in said policy, or endorsed thereon, or added or attached thereto, to the contrary notwithstanding. Proof by the insurer of fraud, intent to deceive, unsound health, bad faith, breach or warranty or condition precedent, or other matter of defense, shall be subject to the provisions of section 657 of the act entitled "An act to establish a Code of Law for the District of Columbia", approved March 3, 1901, as amended (D.C. Code, title 5, sec. 183).

INCONTESTABILITY

SEC. 3. Every such policy shall be incontestable upon any ground relating to health after 2 years from its date of issue (notwithstanding a longer period may be named therein), provided the insured shall be alive at the end of said period. If the policy by its terms shall be incontestable after a shorter period than herein provided, the terms of the policy with regard to such period of limitation shall govern.

ASSIGNMENT

SEC. 4. Nothing contained in the terms of any such policy shall operate to prevent its valid assignment by the insured; but the company issuing the policy so assigned shall be discharged of all liability thereon by payment of its proceeds in accordance with its terms, unless before such payment the company shall have written notice of such assignment.

BENEFICIARY

SEC. 5. Any individual designated with the consent of the insurer, evidenced by the signature of its president or secretary, or designated upon a form furnished by and filed with the insurer, as beneficiary of such a policy shall be entitled to the proceeds of such policy after the death of the insured in priority to all other claimants, and may sue in his own name for such proceeds if payment is refused by the insurer: Provided, That upon the expiration of 15 days after the death of the insured, unless proof of claim in the manner and form required by the policy, accompanied by the policy for surrender, has theretofore been made by or on behalf of such designated beneficiary, the insurer may pay to any other claimant permitted by the policy. A person specified as one to whom the insured desires payment made, but not formally designated as beneficiary, shall be deemed a beneficiary for the purposes of this section, provided such designation be made in writing and filed with the company during the lifetime of the insured.

PINKIE OSBORNE

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2153) for the relief of Pinkie Osborne, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 6, after the words "sum of", to strike out "$5,000" and insert "$2,500", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Pinkie Osborne, of Elizabethtown, Hardin County, Ky., the sum of $2,500 in full settlement of all claims against the United States for injuries arising out of a gunshot wound inflicted by the discharge of a machine gun in Elizabethtown on April 6, 1918: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FIDELITY TRUST CO. OF BALTIMORE

The bill (S. 1461) for the relief of the Fidelity Trust Co., of Baltimore, Md., was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before giving consent to the consideration of the bill I should like to have an explanation of it.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, a few years ago a bill was passed by the Congress providing for a bankers' special tax, and many of the banks paid that special tax. Then the Supreme Court held the act unconstitutional, and the banks, of course, were entitled to have their money refunded. That tax applied to only a part of the capital of the Fidelity Trust Co. of Baltimore. A number of similar bills have been passed since that time, and several are still pending. Instead of writing each one separately the committee have simply provided that any such claim may be filed with the Treasury, and the bank may have its tax money refunded. That is the real purpose.

Mr. KING. The Senator will observe that Mr. Ballantine, when he was Acting Secretary of the Treasury, submitted a report and stated:

For the reasons stated, the Department is opposed to the enactment of the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. But that did not apply to this bill. There have been a number of these bills passed. There is no reason why they should not all be passed. The money was illegally collected and the Treasury should refund it.

Mr. KING. I think the Senator is in error. I find an adverse report accompanying the bill, and in that adverse report submitted by Mr. Ballantine he refers to the Fidelity Trust Co. of Baltimore and others, so the adverse report relates apparently to the bill under consideration.

Mr. LOGAN. There were quite a number of these bills, probably several dozen of them. One case involved had been tried in the district court, and the court had decided against the bank. They had not appealed from the decision involving that particular claim, and that gave us some difficulty. But the fact is that in all these cases the Congress has paid every claim that has been presented, except those which are still on the calendar.

In the Fidelity Trust Co. cases which we have under consideration there was a question involved in that a part of the capital was used for banking and a part of it for the surety business. The company had paid the tax only upon that portion used in the banking business. They had to pay the tax, and there is no reason why the Government should illegally collect the tax and then keep it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Duffy in the chair). Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to receive, consider, and adjudicate claims for refund of the bankers' special tax paid under the acts of June 13, 1898, and October 22, 1914, in view of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Fidelity and Deposit Co. v. United States (259 U.S. 296) and United States v. Fidelity and Deposit Co. (266 U.S. 587), and in accordance with the agreement made March 3, 1925, between the Attorney General and the Secretary of the Treasury as a basis for settlement of such claims: Provided, That no claim shall be considered which is filed later than 6 months after the passage of this act.

Sec. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to such claimants any amount due and allowed in the determination of any such claims which shall have been presented in accordance with this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the payment of the claims of the Fidelity Trust Co. of Baltimore, Md., and others."

LEONARD L. DILGER

The bill (H.R. 1413) for the relief of Leonard L. Dilger was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers Leonard L. Dilger, who was a member of Company L, Third Regiment United States Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of that organization on the 25th day of September 1899: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

JAMES WALLACE

The bill (H.R. 2670) for the relief of James Wallace was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws, conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers James Wallace, who was a member of Troop K, Sixth Regiment United States Cavalry, and who was honorably discharged therefrom on January 17, 1902, and reenlisted April 8, 1902, in Troop K, Fourth Regiment United States Cavalry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private of that organization on June 22, 1902, and notwithstanding any provisions to the contrary in the act relating to pensions approved April 26, 1898, as amended by the act approved May 11, 1908: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (H.R. 3997) for the relief of Erney S. Blazer was announced as next in order.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (H.R. 3985) for the relief of Charles T. Moll was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

LANDS FOR USE OF UNIVERSITY OF ARIZONA

The bill (S. 2379) to provide for the selection of certain lands in the State of Arizona for the use of the University of Arizona was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, subject to lawful claims initiated by settlement or otherwise prior to August 2, 1932, and maintained in the manner required by law, the State of Arizona may select for the use of the University of Arizona by legal subdivisions all or any portions of sections 11, 14, 22, and 28 and the east half section 21, township 14 south, range 16 east, Gila and Salt River meridian, Arizona, and upon the submission of satisfactory proof that the land selected contains saguaro groves or growths of giant cacti or are necessary for the care, protection, and conservation of such groves or growths, the Secretary of the Interior shall cause patents to issue therefor: Provided, That there shall be reserved to the United States all coal, oil, gas, or other mineral contained in such lands, together with the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same at such times and under such conditions as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe.

LIMITATION OF OPERATION OF STATUTES OF LIMITATIONS

The Senate considered the bill (S. 2460) to limit the operation of statutes of limitations in certain cases, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, on page 1, line 7, after the word "following", to strike out "the expiration of said period of limitations" and insert "such findings", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever an indictment is found defective or insufficient for any cause, after the period prescribed by the applicable statute of limitations has expired, a new indictment may be returned at any time during the next succeeding term of court following such finding, during which a grand jury thereof shall be in session.

SEC. 2. Whenever an indictment is found defective or insufficient for any cause, before the period prescribed by the applicable statute of limitations has expired, and such period will expire before the end of the next regular term of the court to which such indictment was returned, a new indictment may be returned not later than the end of the next succeeding term of such court, regular or special, following the term at which such indictment was found defective or insufficient, during which a grand jury thereof shall be in session.

SEC. 3. In the event of reindictment under the provisions of this act the defense of the statute of limitations shall not prevail against the new indictment, any provision of law to the contrary notwithstanding.

SEC. 4. The provisions of this act shall not apply to any indictment against which the statute of limitations has run at the date of approval hereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 822) to amend the act entitled "An act to amend section 217, as amended, of the act entitled 'An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States' approved March 4, 1909", approved January 11, 1929, with respect to the use of the mails for the shipment of certain drugs and medicines to cosmetologists and barbers was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of the bill? If not, let it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (H.R. 5950) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto was announced as next in order.

Mr. HASTINGS. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1891) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to cancel restricted fee patents and issue trust patents in lieu thereof, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (H.R. 1015) for the relief of Frank D. Whitfield was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2425) to repeal the act entitled "An act to grant to the State of New York and the Seneca Nation of Indians jurisdiction over the taking of fish and game within the Allegany, Cattaraugus, and Oil Spring Indian Reservations", approved January 5, 1927, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like an explanation of the measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER], who introduced and reported the bill, is not present.

Mr. KING. Very well; let it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1135) to amend section 1 of the act entitled "An act to provide for determining the heirs of deceased Indians, for the disposition and sale of allotments of deceased Indians, for the leasing of allotments, and for other purposes", approved June 25, 1910, as amended, was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

RELIEF OF ALBERT N. EICHENLAUB

The bill (H.R. 891) for the relief of Albert N. Eichenlaub, alias Albert N. Oakleaf, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE] explain the bill?

Mr. COOLIDGE. Mr. President, two enlistments in the Army by this man are involved. He had a nominal discharge in both cases. At the time he enlisted he was using the short name of Oakleaf, which was not his real name. He wanted his record in the Army clear and in his second enlistment used the name Eichenlaub, which his father was using. He wants his record clear so that the same name will appear in the record of both enlistments. There is no money involved.

Mr. KING. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers Albert N. Eichenlaub, alias Albert N. Oakleaf, who was a member of Company G, Seventh Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and Company K, Seventeenth Regiment United States Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of that organization on the 22d day of October 1900: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

FRANK D. WHITFIELD

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President, when I was in the chair as presiding officer a few moments ago objection was made to the consideration of the bill (H.R. 1015) for the relief of Frank D. Whitfield, being calendar 438. I ask unanimous consent that we may return to that order of business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin? The Chair hears none.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to have the Senator make an explanation of the purpose of the bill.

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President, this is a case where the House has passed the bill involving a situation where there was inducted into the service a man who had a very severe physical disability, the fingers of his hand being curled inward, and it was known that he would have to be discharged sooner or later. His brother died and the commanding officer of the camp not only gave permission to him to attend the funeral of his brother, but told him it would not be necessary for him to return, that his discharge was on the way. In addition to that, his commanding officer loaned $6 with which to pay his car fare to enable him to go to the funeral.

The young man expected the discharge to be sent to him, but shortly after that he was arrested by the civil authorities. Upon communicating with the military authorities, they decided that he was not to be held. He was, however, listed on the rolls as a deserter, but knew nothing of that fact until he applied for compensation in 1921. Both the House committee and the Senate Committee on Military Affairs feel that this was an injustice to him and that his record should be cleared. There is the usual provision that no back pay of any kind shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers Frank D. Whitfield, who served as a private in Company F, One Hundred and Twenty-third Regiment United States Infantry, Army serial no. 1348550, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States on March 14, 1921: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, allowance, or any payment provided under the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, the World War Adjusted

Compensation Act, 1924, as amended, or other benefit whatsoever to which said person may be or become entitled to by law, shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

JOHN ERNST

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next bill in order on the calendar will be stated.

The bill (S. 557) for the relief of John Ernst was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws and laws conferring rights and privileges upon honorably discharged soldiers, their widows and dependent relatives, John Ernst, late of Company F, Twenty-eighth Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, Civil War, shall be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of said organization on May 7, 1864: Provided, That no back pay, pension, bounty, or other emolument shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

CONSTRUCTION OF BRIDGES OVER NAVIGABLE WATERS

The bill (S. 1194) to amend section 4 of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters", approved March 23, 1906, as amended, was announced as next in order.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I should like to ask what changes are made in the bridge law by this bill.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, the bill merely makes inapplicable regulation by the Federal Government where a bridge is wholly within a State.

Mr. FESS. I have no objection.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the last sentence of section 4 of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters", approved March 23, 1906, as amended, is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof a colon and the following: "Provided, That the foregoing provisions of this sentence shall not apply with respect to any bridge constructed under the provisions of this act which is wholly within the limits of a single State and which is operated by the State or any of its political subdivisions or by any public body organized under the laws of such State."

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 236) to provide funds for cooperation with the school board of Queets, Wash., in the construction of a public-school building to be available to Indian children of the village of Queets, Jefferson County, Wash., was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). Let that go over.

USE BY INDIAN SERVICE OF VEHICLES, ETC., SEIZED FOR VIOLATION OF LIQUOR LAWS

The bill (S. 2891) to authorize turning over to the Indian Service vehicles, vessels, and supplies seized and forfeited for violation of liquor laws was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. May we have an explanation of this bill?

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, a bill similar to this one was passed by the Senate in the previous Congress. The bill simply provides for turning over to the Indian Service, for use on Indian reservations, some of the automobiles and other paraphernalia seized under the old prohibition act. The Indian Affairs Committee thought the bill was a good one, and should be passed. It will give some assistance in furnishing automobiles to the Indian agencies, instead of their having to be purchased out of public funds.

Be it enacted, etc., That any vehicle, vessel, or other conveyance used in the transportation of intoxicating liquors, unlawfully, into the Indian country or other restricted area within or adjoining an Indian reservation, and which under proper proceedings by the Federal court is authorized to be sold or destroyed, may upon order of the court be transferred to the Indian Service for its use in the enforcement of the law or other official purposes; said property, when so transferred to the Indian Service, to be accounted for as is all other property of a similar nature.

Sec. 2. Any articles of supplies seized and ordered sold or destroyed, under similar conditions by the Federal court, may be transferred to the Indian Service for use in its activities and when so transferred shall be accounted for by the bonded superintendent or other official.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 1826) for expenditure of funds for cooperation with the public-school board at Poplar, Mont., in the construction or improvement of public-school building to be available to Indian children of the Fort Peck Indian Reservation, Mont., was announced as next in order.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (H.R. 2632) for the relief of Wilson G. Bingham was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let us have an explanation of that bill. [A pause.] Let it go over.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let it go over for another reason. I see that this soldier is now receiving $888 per annum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

GEORGE A. CARDEN AND ANDERSON T. HERD

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2898) conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims of the United States to hear, consider, and render judgment on certain claims of George A. Carden and Anderson T. Herd against the United States, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I move to strike out all after the enacting clause and substitute the language of a bill on this subject which has been reported by the House committee and is now on the House Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Texas will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the Court of Claims of the United States, notwithstanding lapse of time or any statute of limitations, or other limitations upon the jurisdiction of such court, to hear, consider, and render judgment upon any claims, legal or equitable, of George A. Carden and Anderson T. Herd, or their legal representatives, against the United States, involving the steamships Erny, Lucia, Anna, Teresa, Clara, Ida, Dora, Himalaia, Franconia, and Campania: Provided, That in determining the amount of any judgment on any such claim, allowance shall be made for any amount heretofore awarded the claimants on account of such claim: Provided further, That separate suits may be maintained (by or on behalf of the claimants or their legal representatives) with respect to any such claims, but no suit shall be brought after the expiration of 1 year from the date of the enactment of this act: And provided further, That the record of the proceedings before the War Department heretofore had with respect to certain of such ships and the evidence there taken may be introduced, together with the exhibits therein offered, before the Court of Claims, with the full force of depositions, subject to objections as to competency and relevancy: Provided further, That if the Court of Claims shall upon the evidence reach the conclusion that the contract of sale included any right to the operation of the ships and that such right was not satisfied by the subsequent payment by the Secretary of War as an accord and satisfaction, then the recovery shall be limited to the duration of the World War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHARLES C. FLOYD

The bill (S. 841) for the relief of Charles C. Floyd was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers Charles C. Floyd, who was a member of Company A, Eighth Regiment United States Field Artillery, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of that organization on the 10th day of December 1930: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

CLAYTON M. THOMAS

The bill (S. 2661) for the relief of Clayton M. Thomas was considered by the Senate, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers Clayton M. Thomas, who was a member of Company F, Thirty-first Regiment United States Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter he held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of that organization on the 15th day of July 1900: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. KING. Let us have an explanation of this bill.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, this is a case where a soldier enlisted in 1838 and remained in the service for a year and was honorably discharged. Shortly afterward he reenlisted and was called to respond to hospital duty and failed to answer. On his way, accompanied by a corporal, it was necessary for him to delay his response to the call, and he was then court-martialed and imprisoned for a whole year and dishonorably discharged. He had been absent from two or three roll calls prior to that. This happened a great many years ago. He has been leading the life of a very straightforward and honorable citizen since then.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. OVERTON. Yes.

Mr. KING. The record indicates that he was dishonorably discharged twice.

Mr. OVERTON. No; he was honorably discharged from his first enlistment, and dishonorably discharged from the second.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS SALLENG

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 610) for the relief of Thomas Salleng, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, on page 1, line 8, after the words "on the", to strike out "13th day of July 1903" and insert "5th day of September 1905", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers Thomas Salleng, who was a member of Company D, Ninth Regiment United States Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States on the 5th day of September 1905: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I think there are too many of these measures restoring to pensionable status or seeking pensionable status for men who have been dishonorably discharged. Some of them have been imprisoned for 1 or 2 years. I think further consideration ought to be given to these measures; and I object to the consideration of this one.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I assume that the Senator has objected without studying the bill.

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. LOGAN. The record in this case shows that this soldier served in the Philippines during the insurrection, and saw much battle service. It is the policy of the Military Affairs Committee at this time, where a man has a very good excuse, to correct the records of those who deserted, or did things of that kind, if they had battle service.

This particular man served through all the Philippine insurrection. He came home, and then went to see his old mother, as has been explained by affidavit. He is a very conscientious fellow, so later he went back and hunted up the authorities and told them he wanted to serve his term, and they sent him over to Fort Thomas, Ky., and kept him in prison for a year.

This was 28 years ago. There is printed in the report the affidavit of a State senator down there who knows this man very well, and a number of others, stating that since then he has been a most excellent citizen, and always was, and he had this battle service. His offense was not in time of war; it was after he came back home, and in peace time, that he went home to see his old mother. He did not go back until about 2 years later, when, as I have stated, he was imprisoned.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM HEROD

The bill (H.R. 3780) for the relief of William Herod was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to William Herod the sum of $4,000 in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States for injuries sustained by being injured by an automobile truck owned and operated by the Post Office Department: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

JOHN L. SUMMERS

The bill (S. 1857) for the relief of John L. Summers, disbursing clerk, Treasury Department, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. VANDENBERG and Mr. McKELLAR. Let that go over.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his objection to the bill for a moment? I should like to explain it very briefly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan withhold his objection?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota is recognized.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, this is a bill to correct some errors that were made during two or three terms of office by different Treasurers under different administrations. It seems that they are errors that have been made through no fault of anyone in the Treasury Department at the time. One of these periods was during the service of former Gov. Frank White, of North Dakota, as Treasurer of the United States. Some of these shortages are due to dealings with certain national banks where bondsmen were involved. Governor White is well up in years now, and in poor health, and is anxious to have these matters straightened out. The former administration of the Treasury Department, and the present administration of the Treasury Department, recommended the bill, as I understand. It is simply to clarify the records of the Treasury Department.

Mr. VANDENBERG. What is the attitude of the Comptroller General?

Mr. FRAZIER. I understand it is favorable.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I understood it was unfavorable. I will stand on the objection for the time being, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan objects, and the bill will be passed over.

LOWER SALEM COMMERCIAL BANK, LOWER SALEM, OHIO

The bill (S. 1993) for the relief of the Lower Salem Commercial Bank, Lower Salem, Ohio, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to redeem in favor of the Lower Salem Commercial Bank, Lower Salem, Ohio, 4¼-percent United States Treasury notes, series B-1927, nos. 99886, 99891, 99892, 99893, 99894, 99895 in the denomination of $100 each, and 61646, in the denomination of $500, dated May 15, 1923, matured March 15, 1927, without interest and without presentation of the said notes which are alleged to have been lost or destroyed: Provided, That the said notes shall not have been previously presented and paid: And provided further, That the said the Lower Salem Commercial Bank shall first file in the Treasury Department a bond in the penal sum of double the amount of the principal of the said notes in such form and with such corporate surety as may be acceptable to the Secretary of the Treasury to indemnify and save harmless the United States from any loss on account of the Treasury notes hereinbefore described.

ROY LEE GROSECLOSE

The bill (S. 2141) for the relief of Roy Lee Groseclose was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Roy Lee Groseclose, of Alderson, W. Va., the sum of $37.50, in full satisfaction of his claim against the United States for damages to his automobile resulting from a collision on May 26, 1933, on State Highway No. 3, 3½ miles west of Alderson, W. Va., when such automobile was struck by a cow owned by the Federal Industrial Institution for Women, Alderson, W. Va.

MRS. CHARLES L. REED

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2142) for the relief of Mrs. Charles L. Reed, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments.

The first amendment was, on page 1, line 6, after the words "sum of", to strike out "$15,000" and insert "$4,000", so as to read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Mrs. Charles L. Reed, of Huntington, W. Va., the sum of $4,000 in full satisfaction of her claim against the United States for injuries suffered when struck by a United States mail truck at Huntington, W. Va., on October 16, 1929:

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I move to amend the amendment by striking out "$4,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$3,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah offers an amendment to the committee amendment, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, line 7, in the committee amendment, it is proposed to strike out "$4,000" and insert "$3,000."

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, in behalf of justice I beseech the able Senator from Utah to withdraw his amendment.

The material facts in the case are as follows: Mrs. Reed, the claimant, who is more than 57 years of age, was, without fault on her part, run over by a United States mail truck in the city of Huntington. The Post Office Department admits that the accident was caused by the negligence of a Government employee. Mrs. Reed suffered two compound fractures of the left jaw and a simple fracture of the right jaw. As the result of her injuries she was confined in the hospital for 2 weeks. Although the accident occurred more than 3 years ago, Mrs. Reed still suffers occasionally from the fractures which she sustained. In the circumstances, I contend that the sum of $4,000, which the committee has recommended that the Government pay to Mrs. Reed, is by no means excessive.

Mr. KING. I was induced to offer the amendment by the reason that the report indicates that the claimant was in the hospital just 2 weeks, and I thought $3,000 was rather liberal compensation under the circumstances.

Mr. NEELY. She was in the hospital only 2 weeks, but she suffered intensely for more than a year after the accident. She never has fully recovered her former good health.

Mr. KING. On the statement of the Senator I will withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Utah is withdrawn. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 1, line 10, after "1929", to insert:

Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

I. T. McREE

The bill (S. 2342) for the relief of I. T. McRee, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let us have an explanation of that bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, this is a bill for the relief of I. T. McRee, providing for the payment of $2,500 in full settlement of damages sustained April 11, 1922, in a prohibition raid in Lewis County, Tenn.

The claimant, now 53 years of age, was a posseman engaged by two prohibition agents to help raid a distillery in Lewis County, Tenn., on April 11, 1922. Five minutes after arriving at the distillery two men, Andrew Chenault and Frank Hines, arrived on the scene and upon seeing the Federal officers began shooting. The fire was returned and Chenault was shot in the leg, the other party at the time making his escape. Mr. McRee and Richard Wiley were asked by the prohibition agents to go to the house of Esquire Hicks, who lived a few miles away, and get a horse and buggy to take the wounded man to a doctor or a hospital. After they had gone about one half mile, one or more parties shot them from ambush. McRee was shot in the back, the slug entering his back 2½ inches from his spine. The other man, Wiley, was seriously wounded and later died. McRee was confined at his home for 6 or 8 weeks, and for 6 or 8 months was unable to work, and has not been able to do much hard work since being shot.

The papers in the case contain an affidavit from the claimant's physician, dated February 8, 1933, in which he states that Mr. McRee suffers with pain in back and right hip; that pain is particularly noted in the right lumbar region, the right sacroiliac region, and region immediately posterior to the right hip joint; that there is slight limitation of motion in all directions with pain in extreme motion in any direction; that there is tenderness alongside lumbar spine on the right; that X-ray examination shows foreign body (bullet) embedded in the right side of the body of the fourth lumbar vertebra; and that there is no evidence of arthritis. Another physician submits a sworn statement that claimant suffers in back and right hip much when he does manual labor and that he is greatly incapacitated on account of his injury to do manual labor. Claimant is uneducated and unable to make a living except by manual labor.

It is just a case of where a man was shot in enforcing the prohibition law, and it seems to me it is just that he should be paid.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have no objection.

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to I. T. McRee, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,500 in full settlement of damages sustained April 11, 1922, in a prohibition raid in Lewis County, Tenn., when he was shot from ambush: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

ISIDOR GREENSPAN

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2373) for the relief of Isidor Greenspan.

Mr. KING. I should like to have an explanation of that bill.

Mr. COOLIDGE. Mr. President, this is a claim similar to others which have been passed upon by the Congress. It has to do with a fine paid by certain people under the Lever Act, which was later held by the Supreme Court to be unconstitutional. This bill seeks to refund the amount this man paid. Other bills of similar nature have been previously settled, since the Court found that the payments made were unconstitutional. The bill has the approval of the Attorney General.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I notice that the sum sought to be appropriated represents the amount of a fine paid by Mr. Greenspan.

Mr. COOLIDGE. Yes; all the bills of a similar nature related to fines.

Mr. KING. For violating the prohibition law?

Mr. COOLIDGE. Yes.

Mr. KING. Why should there be a reimbursement if the people broke the law, paid the fines assessed, and took no appeals?

Mr. COOLIDGE. There is ample ground. In every case where they were said to have broken the law as covered by the Lever Act, the Supreme Court said they were not liable, that they did not break the law, and the fines which have been imposed in every other case have been returned. Bills of this kind have had the unanimous approval of the Committee on Claims.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, it seems a most remarkable situation, that when the law is violated and a fine has been paid and no appeal taken there should be a reimbursement. But I shall not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Isidor Greenspan the sum of $1,500. Such sum represents the amount of a fine paid by Isidor Greenspan pursuant to a conviction for violating certain provisions of the Lever Act of August 10, 1917, as amended, prior to the declaration by the Supreme Court of the United States of the unconstitutionality of such provisions.

ARVIN C. SANDS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2627) for the relief of Arvin C. Sands.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, in order to cure a typographical error, I move to amend by inserting the word "General" after the "Comptroller" in line 3.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to allow and credit to the accounts of Arvin C. Sands, postmaster at Mallard, Iowa, the sum of $78.21, being the amount due the United States on account of loss resulting from the closing in 1927 of the First National Bank of Mallard, Iowa.

JAMES SLEVIN

The bill (S. 2636) for the relief of James Slevin was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to James Slevin, Island Park, Long Island, N.Y., $1,425, being the amount found due him as damages to his property at Island Park, N.Y., by reason of an Army airplane crash on September 8, 1933.

NEPHEW K. CLARK

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2798) for the relief of Nephew K. Clark.

Mr. KING. What is the purpose of that bill?

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I will say, for the benefit of the Senator from Utah, that the beneficiary in this case, Mr. Clark, was a United States commissioner for the southern district of Georgia. By inadvertence, his commission was not renewed on the date specified in the bill, but he continued to render services, and this bill seeks to enable him to collect his legal fees for services rendered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to allow to Nephew K. Clark, United States commissioner for the southern district of Georgia, Savannah division, the fees earned by him from March 29, 1933, to July 3, 1933, both dates inclusive, in performing the duties incident to the office of commissioner. The commission of the said Nephew K. Clark as United States commissioner expired on March 28, 1933, and, through inadvertence, he was not reappointed until July 4, 1933.

GERMANIA CATERING CO., INC.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2807) for the relief of the Germania Catering Co., Inc.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of that bill?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, this is similar to a bill we have just passed, where the Lever Act was held to be unconstitutional.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the Germania Catering Co., Inc., the sum of $5,000. Such sum represents the amount of fine paid by the Germania Catering Co., Inc., pursuant to a conviction for violating certain provisions of the Lever Act of August 10, 1917, as amended, prior to the declaration by the Supreme Court of the United States of the unconstitutionality of such provisions.

NANCY ABBEY WILLIAMS

The bill (S. 2398) for the relief of Nancy Abbey Williams was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to redeem in favor of Nancy Abbey Williams 3½-percent United States Treasury note, series C-1930-32, no. 5182 B, in the denomination of $100, issued January 16, 1928, called for redemption December 15, 1931, without interest and without presentation of said note, which is alleged to have been lost, stolen, or destroyed: Provided, That the said note shall not have been previously presented: And provided further, That the said Nancy Abbey Williams shall first file in the Treasury Department a bond in the penal sum of double the amount of the principal of said note in such form and with such corporate surety as may be acceptable to the Secretary of the Treasury to indemnify and save harmless the United States from any loss on account of the note hereinbefore described.

WILLIAM J. COCKE

The bill (S. 2558) for the relief of William J. Cocke was announced as next in order.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let that bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

SANFORD & BROOKS CO.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2879) for the relief of the Sanford & Brooks Co., which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let us have an explanation of the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, the report is rather lengthy, but the facts are very simple.

This case grows out of a contract by the Government. A suit was brought in the Court of Claims to recover a considerable amount of money. After some years the company recovered something over $200,000. Thereupon the Income Tax Division of the Treasury Department assessed taxes against that as profits. Of course, the company contended that it was not profits; that it was part of the return for the work which had been done.

The matter dragged on for some time, until the Treasury Department appears to have conceded that $72,000 in taxes had been paid that was improper, but there was certain interest that had accumulated, which they charged against the company, amounting to about $16,000, so the Treasury Department said that $56,000 was due.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, did this case go to the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. LOGAN. The case went to the Supreme Court. The money was recovered by the company; then the Treasury charged that it was profits and sought to collect an income tax on it. So they had to get that adjusted. The Treasury Department recommends that the bill be paid.

Mr. McKELLAR. I see that the Secretary recommends the payment of the bill on account of the unusual character of the claim. Offhand, it would look to be a very peculiar thing for the Supreme Court of the United States finally to pass upon a case, and then for the Congress to remit a portion of the money.

Mr. LOGAN. To a certain extent the Senator is right, but afterward the Treasury Department figured the matter out and said they had received too much.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. At the end of the bill it is proposed to insert a proviso, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the Sanford & Brooks Co., a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Maryland, the sum of $53,208.49, in full satisfaction of its claim against the United States for refund of income taxes assessed and collected for the year 1920 on amounts paid by the United States to such corporation during such year to compensate the said Sanford & Brooks Co. for the cost to it of certain work done in dredging the Delaware River for the Government of the United States, of which work the said Government got the benefit, said work having been done during the years 1913 to 1916, both inclusive, under contract with the United States: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INTERNATIONAL MANUFACTURERS SALES CO. OF AMERICA, INC.

The bill (S. 411) for the relief of the International Manufacturers Sales Co. of America, Inc., was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I will have to ask the Senator from Kentucky to explain that bill.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, let me suggest that the facts are particularly involved and it would not be possible to explain the measure in detail in the time we have. So I myself will ask that the bill go over, with the understanding that the Senator from Tennessee, and particularly the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] will read the report. This is a just claim and ought to have been paid years ago, but any Senator will have to read the report and consider the facts before he can make up his mind about it. So I will ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

STATISTICAL STUDIES IN THE DEPARTMENT OF LABOR

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that we return to Calendar 357, Senate bill 2689, to authorize the Department of Labor to make special statistical studies upon payment of the cost thereof, and for other purposes, and that the votes by which the bill was ordered to a third reading and passed be reconsidered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the votes are reconsidered.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, this is a bill which was introduced at the request of the Madam Secretary of Labor. Many requests have been made of the Department of Labor to provide statistical information for private groups. The Department has no funds with which to obtain such information and make special studies.

The Secretary of Labor sets forth the reasons in a letter, which states:

There is a great need for the passage of this bill. From time to time persons request the Department of Labor to make special statistical studies within the general scope of the Department's activities and in relation to labor matters and offer to pay the full cost of this work. This has been particularly true since the passage of the National Industrial Recovery Act. Various code authorities, including, for example, the planning and coordination committee of the petroleum industry, have asked the Department to collect data relating to hours of work, wages, and similar working conditions. These statistics would have been of great value not only to the person or authority requesting the survey but also to the Department of Labor and to the Government generally since they would have served not only to show the existing state of facts but to help formulate policies for future action. Moreover, if the Department of Labor had made the studies which it was asked to undertake, a closer cooperation between business and Government would have resulted, and if the work had been satisfactorily performed, there is no doubt that business would have had an increased confidence in the accuracy, efficiency, and thoroughness of this Department.

Unfortunately at the present time the Department of Labor cannot undertake this work even though the person requesting the statistical or other information is willing to pay the full costs of the enterprise. The reason is that the act of March 3, 1918 (39 Stat. 1106, 5 U.S.C. 66), provides that no Government official or employee shall receive any salary in connection with his services as such an official or employee from any source other than the Government of the United States. This statute as interpreted by the courts and administrative officers makes it impossible for the Department of Labor to accept from outsiders the cost of special services even though rendered for their exclusive benefit. (See International Railway Co. v. Davidson, 257 U.S. 506, 515 (1922); 31 Op. Atty. Gen. 1919; 16 Comp. Dec. 43.)

To overcome this bar, other departments have from time to time asked Congress for permission to enter into arrangements to perform compensated services for private persons. Thus, for example, section 18 of the act of June 18, 1929 (46 Stat. 25, 26; 13 U.S.C. 218), authorizes the Bureau of the Census to make statistical compilations at cost for private individuals; and the appropriation act for the Department of Agriculture for 1920 (act of July 24, 1919, 41 Stat. 270; 5 U.S.C. 513), and section 14 of the Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act (act of June 10, 1930, 46 Stat. 577; 7 U.S.C. 564) authorize the Department of Agriculture to enter into cooperative arrangements with States and private agencies as a result of which these non-Federal agencies contribute in part to expenses incurred by the Federal Government.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
February 13, 1934.

HON. DAVID I. WALSH,

United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR: Your letter of February 12, relating to Senate bill 2689, has had my careful consideration.

When I first began my work as Secretary of Labor, there were numerous appeals directed to the Office asking the Department to make certain surveys at the expense of those desiring the surveys. The work was not a part of the regular program and would have necessitated additional personnel. We considered it thoroughly. For a time I was inclined to look with favor upon a plan which would have enabled the Department of Labor to extend this service. However, as I gained experience in the work, I came to believe that it would be unwise for the Government to take on this work of a temporary nature—the product of men and women working under a temporary responsibility. In other words, all of the employees of the Bureau of Labor Statistics are civil service, and under the proposed act it would mean that the Secretary of Labor would select those who were supposed to be competent to make the survey.

As you know, reports of this kind will be given out with the sanction of the Government and generally accepted as Government documents. The intentions of the Secretary of Labor would be the very best, but under these circumstances I fear trouble would arise—reports not closely related to the Department of Labor might come under hostile fire in the Halls of Congress; hence, although I was favorably disposed to the idea when I first began my work in the Department, I gradually began to believe that it was best for the Department to undertake only those research projects which grew up out of regular departmental needs. Under the present plan, Congress is notified when a certain particular survey is needed; if money is appropriated for that work, and it is necessary to get the appropriation to carry on the work, that puts these particular surveys in the hands of Congress to be passed on by Congress. With the passing of years, I was glad that the Department followed the course of submitting the project for survey to Congress to be passed on by Congress. With the passing of years, I was glad that the Department followed the course of submitting the project for survey to Congress for its approval and appropriation.

We have in the city and throughout the country, research establishments such as the Brookings Institute which are well qualified to make these special investigations. The stamp of approval which they give to reports issued under their auspices is quite sufficient to carry them wherever they should go, and yet obviously they are not Government documents nor official in any sense.

Most cordially yours,

JAMES J. DAVIS.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR,
February 14, 1934.

HON. DAVID I. WALSH,

United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR: I wrote you yesterday concerning Senate bill 2689, and by way of suggestion, I should like to say that the Bureau of Labor Statistics is most important and the best statistical bureau in the United States.

It is thoroughly reliable, and I would suggest in place of seeking appropriations to make surveys and investigations that we unite in asking for an appropriation from the Congress of at least a half million dollars for that Bureau to make its staff permanent, which will meet the needs of the country in this connection. Right now, I presume there is a great demand for the services of the statistical Bureau from those who come under the codes of fair competition.

Assuring you of my hearty support of any appropriation for the Bureau of Labor Statistics, I am,
Most cordially yours,

JAMES J. DAVIS.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I think no Member of this body is more interested than am I in improving and enlarging the statistical and economic services of the Federal Government. I wish the Senator would direct his attention to the question of the policy which is involved in the bill. I have serious doubt of the wisdom, as a matter of public policy, of permitting private corporations and individuals to pay for services rendered by departments or by bureaus of the Federal Government in carrying on particular types of research or other activities. I would join with the Senator at any time in support of any properly drawn legislation which sought to improve our statistical services, which sought to fill up the gaps, the glaring inadequacies, in our statistical material, which exist, but I wish the Senator would give consideration to the broader aspects of policy which are involved in this legislation.

In that regard I should like to remind the Senator of the rather severe and, I think, somewhat justified criticism under the last administration of permitting the private financing of activities carried on officially by the Government, the reports and the information of which naturally bear the impress of the Government when the results are given to the public.

Mr. WALSH. The observations of the Senator from Wisconsin are very appropriately made. We must first of all agree that there are many demands made on the Department of Labor for useful statistical information. A good deal of the information is information which would be useful to the Department of Labor, and which industry or labor organizations also desire. The bill, realizing the objection made, carefully limits the character of the statistical information which they can obtain to matters within the scope of the Labor Department.

The committee has authorized me to offer an amendment to the bill which restricts the character of the information that can be obtained. The amendment proposes to strike out the words "within the general scope of the Department's activities" and to insert "relating to employment, hours of work, wages, and other conditions of employment."

This amendment would limit the inquiry for the statistical information to the purposes enumerated in the bill. No money is available from the public funds for this information. It is information helpful to private industry, helpful to labor, and also helpful to the Department of Labor. The bill permits the Department of Labor to undertake this work on condition that the private parties asking for the information pay the expense of the study requested.

Mr. President, there was also an amendment authorized to be offered by the committee to the bill that the Secretary of Labor shall report to the Congress just what agreements are entered into, the parties for whom statistical information is given, and the amount of money paid.

I should agree with the Senator from Wisconsin if it were possible to get an appropriation for these studies. The Secretary of Labor informs me that the information requested, which private parties are willing to pay for, is desirable, is in the public interest, and will be helpful in working out some of the problems under the N.R.A. and be most useful to the Labor Department.

While I agree that it would be preferable to have an appropriation from the Public Treasury to do this work, yet it seems to me that if private individuals are ready and willing to pay, and desire the specific information, that we should let the Secretary of Labor arrange for the obtaining of the information and make a report to Congress of the amounts of money received and the amounts of money paid out or distributed and the kind and character of the information obtained.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, what would be the Senator's attitude toward an amendment to the measure which would provide a limitation on time, so that we might experiment with it and see how it works?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I would be agreeable to that suggestion. Would the Senator suggest a limitation of 1 year?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I should think it should be not less than 1 year, because a shorter period would not give time to work out any exhaustive or long statistical study.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I now send to the desk the committee amendment referred to, which I ask may be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts offers a committee amendment, which the Clerk will state.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, line 6, after the word "studies", it is proposed to strike out "within the general scope of the Department's activities" and insert in lieu thereof "relating to employment, hours of work, wages, and other conditions of employment."

Mr. WALSH. That is a perfecting amendment already explained and which limits the scope of the original bill. I think it ought to be agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Massachusetts now to explain the amendment.

Mr. WALSH. The bill provides that within the discretion of the Secretary of Labor special statistical studies may be made within the general scope of the Department's activities. That language seemed to be too general, so this amendment strikes out "within the general scope of the Department's activities" and defines just what statistical studies she can make. They are enumerated in the amendment and relate to employment, hours of work, wages, and other conditions of employment. So it is a perfecting amendment.

Mr. KING. May I ask the Senator what the additional cost will be?

Mr. WALSH. There will be no cost at all. This bill is a permissive bill. It seeks to give the Department of Labor the right, if private parties will pay the money, to make statistical studies dealing with the problems of industry and of labor. The money will be paid by these private parties seeking information, and reports must be made to the Congress of what moneys are received and what contracts are entered into for this purpose.

Mr. KING. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether he regards it as wise to have departments of the Government made vehicles to be set into operation or motion by private persons?

Mr. WALSH. I should not think it advisable if the Department of Labor did not consider the information, which private parties were willing to pay for, valuable to the Government. If it was simply to give information to private parties for their own use and benefit, and beneficial to them alone, I would agree with the Senator; but the Department of Labor says this is information they ought to have. They would like to have the Congress appropriate the funds to furnish this information, but, in the absence of public funds, private parties are willing to pay for the expense. I hope the Senator will approve the amendment, it being a perfecting amendment.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, how long are Senators allowed to speak on bills that are not objected to? Is this bill objected to or not? If the discussion of the bill is going to continue up until 2 o'clock, it is going to take up all the time we have for the consideration of unobjected bills, and there is a bill which I am particularly anxious to have considered before the time is up. How long a time is allowed Senators in which to discuss a bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the rule 5 minutes.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, this bill has been under discussion for at least 15 minutes. If there will be only another minute or so consumed in the further discussion of the bill, I have no objection.

Mr. KING. A parliamentary inquiry. Does the Chair rule that each bill can only be considered for 5 minutes?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That no Senator can speak on any bill for more than 5 minutes.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I offer the committee amendment to which I have heretofore referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 2, line 11, after the word "act", it is proposed to insert:

; and the Secretary of Labor shall make a report to Congress at the beginning of each regular session, giving a detailed statement showing (1) the name of every person for whom work has been performed under the authority of this statute, (2) the nature of the services rendered to him, (3) the price charged for these services by the Department of Labor, and (4) the manner in which the moneys received were deposited or used.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the bill it is proposed to add a new section, as follows:

SEC. 4. This act shall cease to be effective 1 year after the date of its enactment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXTENSION OF LABOR PROVISIONS OF TRANSPORTATION ACT

The bill (S. 2411) to amend the Emergency Railroad Transportation Act, 1933, was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of that bill?

Mr. DILL. This is a bill to apply the labor provision of the Railroad Emergency Act to the employees who work on Pullman cars and refrigerator cars, as well as express-company employees. The labor provision prohibits the dropping of more than 5 percent of the employees as the result of consolidation or elimination made by the coordinator and also applies the provision prohibiting company unions from being supported by the railroads. It simply extends the labor provision of the Emergency Railroad Transportation Act to these three classes of employees that were not covered by the original act.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I see no objection to this bill. I voted to report it from the committee. But a Senator on this side of the aisle has requested that it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator object?

Mr. FESS. Yes; on behalf of another Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over on objection.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 411) for the relief of the International Manufacturers Sales Co. of America, Inc., was announced as next in order.

Mr. FESS. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

TAXATION OF CERTAIN INTERSTATE SALES

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2897) to regulate interstate commerce by granting the consent of Congress to taxation by the several States of certain interstate sales, which had been reported from the Committee on Interstate Commerce with an amendment on page 2, line 1, after the word "commerce", to insert "no such property shall be exempt from taxation by reason of being introduced into any State or Territory in original packages, or containers, or otherwise", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That all taxes or excises levied by any State upon sales of tangible personal property, or measured by sales of tangible personal property, may be levied upon, or measured by, sales of like property in interstate commerce, by the State into which the property is moved for use or consumption therein, in the same manner, and to the same extent, that said taxes of excises are levied upon or measured by sales of like property not in interstate commerce and no such property shall be exempt from such taxation by reason of being introduced into any State or Territory in original packages, or containers, or otherwise: Provided, That no State shall discriminate against sales of tangible personal property in interstate commerce, nor shall any State discriminate against the sale of products of any other States: Provided further, That no State shall levy any tax or excise upon, or measured by, the sales in interstate commerce of tangible personal property transported for the purpose of resale by the consignee: Provided further, That no political subdivision of any State shall levy a tax or excise upon, or measured by, sales of tangible personal property in interstate commerce. For the purposes of this act a sale of tangible personal property transported, or to be transported, in interstate commerce shall be considered as made within the State into which such property is to be transported for use or consumption therein, whenever such sale is made, solicited, or negotiated in whole or in part within that State.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut explain the bill?

Mr. LONERGAN. This bill, Mr. President, relates to the payment of the sales tax in connection with the shipment of goods for sales purposes in original packages from one State to another; that is, from a State that does not levy such a tax into a State that imposes such a tax. In the case of gasoline there are instances where stations are set up on the border lines of States, and people who reside in a State where the sales tax prevails go over into the State where the tax does not prevail in order to get gasoline and thus to save money. The time is short, and the Senator from Louisiana desires to make a statement with reference to the bill.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the only purpose of this bill is to prevent interstate commerce from being used as a cloak for depriving States of taxes. In other words, those who ship goods in interstate commerce cannot only avoid payment of taxes in States where sales taxes are levied, but also in States to which they are shipped. All the supervisors and revenue collectors of the 48 States of America have asked for this bill. The bill makes provision for nothing except shipment in interstate commerce, and its purpose is to prevent shipments in interstate commerce to avoid the collection of a sales tax.

Mr. McKELLAR. In the event of goods being shipped to any city in the United States and there warehoused for distribution, would the goods be liable to taxation in the State wherein that city is located?

Mr. LONG. The goods would be liable to taxation in the State where they were sold.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment; and if there shall be no objection to it, I ask that it may be added to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, after line 19, at the end of the bill, it is proposed to add a new section, as follows:

SEC. —. Receivers, liquidators, referees, and other officers of any court of the United States, are required to pay all taxes and licenses levied by any State or subdivision thereof the same as corporations, partnerships, concerns, persons, or association of persons are required to pay the same.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I should like to have an explanation of the amendment.

Mr. LONG. I shall be glad to state what the amendment proposes. The only purpose of the amendment is this: A very unique and, I might say, almost unheard-of ruling has recently been made by two United States district judges, in which by some reasoning they have reached the conclusion that the receiver of a corporation does not have to pay the tax that the corporation itself would have to pay. So the Standard Oil Co. would have to pay a tax; but if the Texas Co. were in receivership, it could sell its gasoline and not pay the 5 cents a gallon gasoline tax. That simply means that every concern will have to go into the hands of receivers. In order that there may be no doubt about the law, I have simply offered a little amendment to this bill to provide that receivers of corporations shall pay whatever tax the corporation itself would have to pay; in other words, that a receiver cannot operate a gasoline business and not pay a sales tax if the corporation itself has to pay such a tax. That is all there is to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. President, in connection with the bill which has just been passed I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a letter written to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

BATON ROUGE, March 9, 1934.

Senator HUEY P. LONG,

United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: In a recent case in the United States Court for the Western District of Missouri, entitled Howe v. Atlantic, Pacific & Gulf Oil Co., the court held that the Missouri gasoline tax could not be enforced against a receiver who was conducting a business, and was, in fact, a distributor and dealer in gasoline, for the reason that the statute provided, in substance, that distributors and dealers shall pay to the State treasury an amount equal to 2 cents for each gallon of motor-vehicle fuel sold or distributed by such dealer in the State. The court holding that a privilege tax of this character cannot be enforced against a Federal receiver for the reason that a receiver is not a person or corporation engaged in business within the purview of this statute. It was held in another case in Missouri that a similar tax levied by the city of Kansas City could not be enforced against a Federal receiver.

A suit has been filed by Federal receivers in Oklahoma to recover tax paid under protest, alleging that the Oklahoma tax cannot be enforced against a Federal receiver. If the Federal court in Oklahoma should take the same view as the Missouri court, it would create a serious condition. Some State statutes may be so worded that the courts will uphold them against receivers, but until the matter is finally adjudicated in each State it creates a doubt as to each State statute and will result in much annoying litigation.

The State gasoline tax throughout the United States now averages over 4 cents per gallon. If Federal receivers can operate free from this tax, they would have this great margin over their competitors, and the receivers would drive their taxpaying competitors out of business, forcing them into the hands of receivers, and all of the business would then be done by receivers and the States would lose the revenue. At this time I consider it very serious to imperil the revenue of the States. I also believe that it would be injustice unspeakable to permit the solvent to be driven out of business by the insolvent who are operating in receivership.

It is impossible for me to see why a receiver authorized by the court to conduct a business is not a distributor or dealer engaged in business within a State. While I am unable to believe that the appellate courts will sustain these decisions of the inferior courts, it creates a condition of uncertainty as to the solvent dealer. He is afraid that a condition will arise from a court decision which will immediately destroy him. It creates an uncertainty as to the States' revenue and makes it impossible for the States to plan with certainty to meet their obligations, for if these decisions are upheld with reference to the gasoline tax it will likewise make doubtful the enforcement against receivers of State levies of sales taxes, beer taxes, etc.

It is nothing but just that a receiver who is actually conducting a business, and is authorized to conduct that business by the court, should pay the same taxes that his competitor, a private individual or corporation, must pay, and to the end that the question may forever be set at rest, I believe that Congress should immediately pass an act looking to that end. There is prepared and submitted herewith for your consideration a proposed bill which I believe will accomplish this purpose. I urge that you support the bill, or if such a bill has already been introduced in Congress that you give it support and do everything you can to see it enacted into law at the earliest possible date. I would not make this request of you if I did not believe it was manifest justice and was necessary to prevent possible decisions which would work the greatest injustice and hardship upon those who are not in such a favored position and at the same time embarrass the State. All forms of sales taxes are competitive. Those who pay the tax cannot compete with those who can escape such taxes. The States must, therefore, be as diligent to see that no one actually engaged in business can legally avoid the tax as it is to see that no one illegally evades the tax. The highest duty rests on the State to protect the taxpayer from this class of unfair competition.

Yours very truly,

ALICE LEE GROSJEAN,
Supervisor of Public Accounts.

BONDS OF HOME OWNERS' LOAN CORPORATION

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2999) to guarantee the bonds of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, to amend the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, and for other purposes.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR STATE, JUSTICE, ETC., DEPARTMENTS

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 7513) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice, and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. MCKELLAR, Mr. RUSSELL, Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. HALE, and Mr. NYE conferees on the part of the Senate.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. BYRNES. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the action of the House in connection with House bill 6663, being the independent offices appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, and 23 to the bill (H.R. 6663) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes, agreeing to the conference requested by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appointing conferees; also agreeing to the amendment of the Senate numbered 14, with an amendment as follows:

SEC. 21. (a) Title II of the act entitled "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government", approved March 20, 1933, is amended as follows:

(1) Section 2 is amended by inserting after "1934" the following: "and the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935"; and

(2) Section 3 (b) is amended by striking out "15 percent" and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "10 percent during the portion of the fiscal year 1934 beginning February 1, 1934, and ending June 30, 1934, and shall not exceed 5 percent during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935."

(b) Section 105 (relating to the salaries of the Vice President, Speaker of the House, Senators, Representatives, Delegates, Resident Commissioners, and persons on the rolls of the Senate or House of Representatives) of the Legislative Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1933 (except subsections (d) and (e) thereof), as continued and amended by section 4 of title II of such act of March 20, 1933, is hereby continued in full force and effect for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for the purpose of continuing such section, in the application of such section with respect to the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, the figures "1933" shall be read as "1935"; except that in the application of such section with respect to the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, subsection (a) is amended by striking out "15 percent" wherever it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "the percentage of reduction applicable to officers and employees of the Federal Government generally." In the application of such section with respect to the portion of the fiscal year 1934 beginning February 1, 1934, and ending June 30, 1934, the percentage of reduction shall be the percentage applicable to officers and employees of the Federal Government generally.

(c) Section 107 (except paragraph (5) of subsection (a) thereof and subsection (b) thereof) of part II of the Legislative Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1933 (relating to certain special salary reductions); section 12 (relating to compensation reductions of officers and employees of insular possessions); section 13 (relating to the retired pay of certain judges), section 14 (relating to reduction in compensation benefits to certain civilian employees), and section 15 (relating to reductions in certain private pensions) of the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1934; and section 18 (relating to pensions for military service prior to the Spanish-American War) of title I of such act of March 20, 1933, are hereby continued in full force and effect for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for the purpose of continuing such sections with respect to the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, the figures "1933" (except in such sections 13, 14, and 15) shall be read as "1935" and the figures "1934" shall be read as "1935"; except that in the application of such sections 12, 13, and 18 with respect to the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, the percentage of reduction shall be the percentage applicable to officers and employees of the Federal Government generally. In the application of such sections 12, 13, and 18 with respect to the portion of the fiscal year 1934 beginning February 1, 1934, and ending June 30, 1934, the percentage of reduction shall be the percentage applicable to officers and employees of the Federal Government generally.

(d) Notwithstanding the provisions of the antideficiency acts, deficiencies in their respective appropriations made during the second session of the Seventy-third Congress and available for obligation during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, may be incurred during such fiscal year by any executive department or independent establishment and the municipal government of the District of Columbia, upon written order of the President specifying the amount of the deficiency which may be incurred, and by the legislative branch of the Government and the agencies customarily considered a part of such branch; but such deficiencies may be incurred only to the extent necessary to enable the payment to officers and employees of such activities of sums for which the available appropriation is inadequate by reason of a diminution in the percentage of reduction of compensation in pursuance of action of the President under the provisions of section 3 of title II of such act of March 20, 1933, as continued for the fiscal year 1935.

(e) There is hereby appropriated so much as may be necessary for the payment of sums due, and payable out of the Treasury of the United States, by reason of the diminution under this title in the percentage of reduction of compensation, and other amendments to existing laws made hereby; and limitations on amounts for personal services are hereby respectively increased in proportion to the increase in appropriations for personal services made in this subsection. In the case of officers and employees of the municipal government of the District of Columbia, such sums shall be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia and the Treasury of the United States in the manner prescribed by the District of Columbia appropriation acts for the respective fiscal years.

TITLE III. VETERANS' PROVISIONS

SEC. 26. Notwithstanding any provision of law to the contrary, in no event shall the compensation being paid on March 19, 1933, under subsections (3) and (5) of section 202 of the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, to veterans for the loss of the use of both eyes, where such veterans were, except by fraud, mistake, or misrepresentation, in receipt of compensation on March 19, 1933, be reduced or discontinued, except in accordance with the regulations issued under the act entitled "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government", approved March 20, 1933, pertaining to hospitalized cases.

SEC. 27. Where service connection for a disease, injury, or disability not caused by his own willful misconduct was on March 19, 1933, established in accordance with section 200 of the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, and such connection has been severed through the application of, or regulations or instructions promulgated under, Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, or Public Law No. 78, Seventy-third Congress, service connection is hereby reestablished, and as to such cases the provisions of the first paragraph of section 200 of the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, are hereby reenacted: Provided, That the provisions of this section shall not apply (1) to persons entering the active military or naval service subsequent to the date of November 11, 1918; (2) to persons as to whom clear and unmistakable evidence discloses that the disease, injury, or disability had inception before or after the period of active military or naval service, unless such disease, injury, or disability is shown to have been aggravated during service; (3) to persons as to whose cases service connection was established by fraud, clear or unmistakable error as to conclusions of fact or law, or misrepresentation of material facts; and as to all such cases enumerated in this proviso all reasonable doubts shall be resolved in favor of the veteran, the burden of proof being on the Government: Provided, That the rate to be paid to anyone under this section shall be 75 percent of the amount received by him on March 19, 1933.

SEC. 28. The fourth paragraph of section 20, Public Law No. 78, Seventy-third Congress, is hereby amended to read as follows: "Notwithstanding any of the provisions of Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, in no event shall the compensation being paid on March 19, 1933, for service-connected disabilities to those veterans who entered the active military or naval service on or before November 11, 1918, and whose disabilities are not the result of their own misconduct, where they were, except by fraud, misrepresentation of a material fact, or unmistakable error as to conclusions of fact or law, in receipt of compensation on March 19, 1933, be reduced or discontinued, except in accordance with the regulations issued under Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, pertaining to hospitalized cases: Provided, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to persons as to whom clear and unmistakable evidence discloses that the disease, injury, or disability had inception before or after the period of active military or naval service, unless such disease, injury, or disability is shown to have been aggravated during service; and in any review of the case of any veteran to whom compensation was being paid on March 19, 1933, for service-connected disability, reasonable doubts shall be resolved in favor of the veteran, the burden of proof being on the Government: Provided further, That notwithstanding any of the provisions of Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, any veteran whose disease, injury, or disability was established on or after the date this paragraph, as amended, takes effect as service connected under section 200 of the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, shall be entitled to receive compensation in accordance with the provisions of such act, as amended, and the rating schedule in effect on March 19, 1933: Provided further, That whenever there is a change in the degree of disability of any such veteran, the amount of compensation to be paid shall be determined pursuant to the provisions of the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, and the rating schedule in effect on March 19, 1933, and such amount shall not be reduced or discontinued. In no event shall death compensation being paid, except by fraud, misrepresentation of a material fact, or unmistakable error as to conclusions of fact or law, to widows, children, and dependent parents of deceased World War veterans under the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, on March 19, 1933, be reduced or discontinued, whether the death of the veteran on whose account compensation is being paid was directly or presumptively connected with service. In any case where a World War veteran dies or has died from disease or injury, and service connection for such disease or injury has been reestablished on or after the date this paragraph, as amended, takes effect as service-connected under section 200 of the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, or which would have been established under such section 200 had the veteran been living on March 19, 1933, and reestablished on or after the date this paragraph, as amended, takes effect, the surviving widow, child, or children, and/or dependent parents shall be entitled to receive compensation at the rates prescribed in Veterans' Regulation No. 1 (a), part I, paragraph IV, and amendments thereto."

SEC. 29. Section 6 of Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, as amended by Public Law No. 78, Seventy-third Congress, is hereby amended by adding thereto the following proviso: "Provided, That any veteran of any war who was not dishonorably discharged, suffering from disability, disease, or defect, who is in need of hospitalization or domiciliary care, and is unable to defray the necessary expenses therefor (including transportation to and from the Veterans' Administration facility), shall be furnished necessary hospitalization or domiciliary care (including transportation) in any Veterans' Administration facility, within the limitations existing in such facilities, irrespective of whether the disability, disease, or defect was due to service. The statement under oath of the applicant on such form as may be prescribed by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs shall be accepted as sufficient evidence of inability to defray necessary expenses."

SEC. 30. Notwithstanding any of the provisions of Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, no pension being paid on March 19, 1933, to any veteran of the Spanish-American War, including the Boxer rebellion and the Philippine insurrection, or to the widow as long as she remains unmarried and/or dependents of any such veteran, shall be reduced by more than 25 percent, except in accordance with the regulations issued pursuant to Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, pertaining to hospitalized cases and except where his disability is the result of his own willful misconduct: Provided, That the provisions of this section shall not apply (1) to persons to whom payments were being made on March 19, 1933, through fraud, clear or unmistakable error as to conclusions of fact or law, or misrepresentation of a material fact, except that decisions as to degree of disability rendered prior to March 20, 1933, shall be conclusive, or (2) to any person during any year following a year for which such person was not entitled to exemption from the payment of a Federal income tax: Provided, however, That a veteran in Federal employ shall not receive more than $6 per month if his salary if single exceeds $1,000 and if married $2,500: Provided further, That this section shall not apply to any person who enlisted after August 12, 1898, and who did not serve in either the Boxer rebellion or the Philippine insurrection.

All laws in effect on March 19, 1933, granting monetary benefits to veterans of the Spanish-American War, including the Boxer rebellion and the Philippine insurrection, are hereby reenacted in their entirety, and such laws shall be effective from and after the effective date of this act, subject to the limitations of this section and to such reduction in pensions as may be made hereunder.

SEC. 31. Where any veteran suffers or has suffered an injury, or an aggravation of any existing injury, as the result of training, hospitalization, or medical or surgical treatment, awarded him under any of the laws granting monetary or other benefits to World War veterans, or as the result of having submitted to examination under authority of the War Risk Insurance Act or the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, and not the result of his misconduct, and such injury or aggravation results in additional disability to or the death of such veteran, the benefits of Public Law No. 2, of Public Law No. 78, and of this title shall be awarded in the same manner as if such disability, aggravation, or death were service connected within the meaning of such laws; except that no benefits under this section shall be awarded unless application be made therefor within 2 years after such injury or aggravation was suffered, or such death occurred, or after the passage of this Act, whichever is the later date. The benefits of this section shall be in lieu of the benefits under the act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes", approved September 7, 1916, as amended.

Sec. 32. The last sentence of section 9 of Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, is hereby repealed.

Sec. 33. Service-connected money benefits payable to World War veterans under this title and Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, shall be entitled "compensation" and not "pension."

Sec. 34. This title shall take effect on the date of enactment of this act, and no payments of any benefits conferred under the provisions of this title shall be made for any period prior to such date.

Sec. 35. That notwithstanding the provisions of section 17 of title I of an act entitled "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government", approved March 20, 1933, and section 20 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes", approved June 16, 1933, any claim for yearly renewable term insurance under the provisions of laws repealed by said section 17, wherein claim was duly filed prior to March 20, 1933, and on which maturity of the insurance contract had been determined by the Veterans' Administration prior to March 20, 1933, and where payments could not be made because of the provisions of the act of March 20, 1933, or under the provisions of the act of June 16, 1933, may be adjudicated by the Veterans' Administration, and any person found entitled to yearly renewable term insurance benefits claimed shall be paid such benefits in accordance with and in the amounts provided by such prior laws.

Mr. BYRNES. I move the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate numbered 14 and 22 and ask for a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on those amendments.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. What are the amendments to which we shall have agreed if we adopt the motion?

Mr. BYRNES. The two amendments cover all the legislative amendments in dispute.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, I respectfully desire to call the attention of the Chair to paragraph 17 of the Manual of the Law and Practice in regard to conferences and conference reports in reference to the appointment of conferees, from which I desire to quote the following language:

In the selection of the managers the two large political parties are usually represented, and, also, care is taken that there shall be a representation of the two opinions which almost always exist on subjects of importance. Of course the majority party and the prevailing opinion have the majority of the managers.

I respectfully hope that that rule will be followed in the appointment of conferees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate numbered 14 and 22, request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on those two amendments, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. GLASS, Mr. BYRNES, Mr. RUSSELL, Mr. HALE, and Mr. STEIWER conferees on the part of the Senate.

BONDS OF HOME OWNERS' LOAN CORPORATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2999) to guarantee the bonds of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, to amend the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, and for other purposes.

Mr. McKELLAR. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Barbour	Brown	Capper
Ashurst	Barkley	Bulkley	Caraway
Bachman	Black	Bulow	Carey

Glass	McAdoo	Russell	White
Goldsborough	McCarran	Schall
Gore	McGill	Sheppard

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DUFFY in the chair). Ninety-four Senators having answered to the roll call, a quorum is present.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, this is a very important bill and I think it ought to be read. It has not as yet been read to the Senate.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I acquiesce in the request of the Senator from Michigan for the reading of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That (a) section 4 (c) of the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933 is amended to read as follows:

"(c) The Corporation is authorized to issue bonds in an aggregate amount not to exceed $2,000,000,000, which may be sold by the Corporation to obtain funds for carrying out the purposes of this section, or exchanged as hereinafter provided. Such bonds shall be in such forms and denominations, shall mature within such periods of not more than 18 years from the date of their issue, shall bear such rates of interest not exceeding 4 percent per annum, shall be subject to such terms and conditions, and shall be issued in such manner and sold at such prices, as may be prescribed by the Corporation, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. Such bonds shall be fully and unconditionally guaranteed both as to interest and principal by the United States, and such guaranty shall be expressed on the face thereof, and such bonds shall be lawful investments, and may be accepted as security, for all fiduciary, trust, and public funds, the investment or deposit of which shall be under the authority or control of the United States or any officer or officers thereof. In the event that the Corporation shall be unable to pay upon demand, when due, the principal of, or interest on, such bonds, the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay to the holder the amount thereof which is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and thereupon to the extent of the amount so paid the Secretary of the Treasury shall succeed to all the rights of the holders of such bonds. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, is authorized to purchase any bonds of the Corporation issued under this subsection which are guaranteed as to interest and principal, and for such purpose the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to use as a public-debt transaction the proceeds from the sale of any securities hereafter issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, and the purposes for which securities may be issued under such act, as amended, are extended to include any purchases of the Corporation's bonds hereunder. The Secretary of the Treasury may, at any time, sell any of the bonds of the Corporation acquired by him under this subsection. All redemptions, purchases, and sales by the Secretary of the Treasury of the bonds of the Corporation shall be treated as public-debt transactions of the United States. The bonds issued by the Corporation under this subsection shall be exempt, both as to principal and interest, from all taxation (except surtaxes, estate, inheritance, and gift taxes) now or hereafter imposed by the United States or any District, Territory, dependency, or possession thereof, or by any State, county, municipality, or local taxing authority."

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, at this point may I interrupt the reading to ask the Senator from Ohio a question? I understand there are no exemptions in this case, as there are with reference to some bond issues of $5,000, so far as surtaxes are concerned?

Mr. BULKLEY. The exemptions are carefully stated in the bill. There is no exception.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

"The Corporation, including its franchise, its capital, reserves and surplus, and its loans and income, shall likewise be exempt from such taxation; except that any real property of the Corporation shall be subject to taxation to the same extent, according to its value, as other real property is taxed. No such bonds shall be issued in excess of the assets of the Corporation, including the assets to be obtained from the proceeds of such bonds, but a failure to comply with this provision shall not invalidate the bonds or the guaranty of the same. The Corporation shall have power to purchase in the open market at any time and at any price any of the bonds issued by it."

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, let me interrupt again to submit an inquiry to the Senator from Ohio. The bill provides that "the Corporation shall have power to purchase in the open market at any time and at any price any of the bonds issued by it." Does not the Senator believe there ought to be a limitation on the price they may pay, and that they ought not to be permitted to pay above par? The bonds may be at a premium, and under the language of the bill they could pay a premium or any other price they might desire.

Mr. BULKLEY. I had not thought of it in that light. I see no reason why the Corporation should not have authority to buy at such prices as they deem advantageous.

Mr. COUZENS. Even above par?

Mr. BULKLEY. Yes; even above par.

Mr. COUZENS. I have in mind at the appropriate time to offer an amendment, on page 4, line 3, after the word "price", to insert "not above par", so that it would read:

The Corporation shall have power to purchase in the open market at any time and at any price not above par any of the bonds issued by it.

The Chief Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill, as follows:

"Any such bonds so purchased may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, be sold or resold at any time and at any price. For a period of 6 months after the date this subsection, as amended, takes effect, the Corporation is authorized to refund any of its bonds issued prior to such date or any bonds issued after such date in compliance with commitments of the Corporation outstanding on such date, upon application of the holders thereof, by exchanging therefor bonds of an equal face amount issued by the Corporation under this subsection as amended, and bearing interest at such rate as may be prescribed by the Corporation with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury; but such rate shall not be less than that first fixed after this subsection, as amended, takes effect on bonds exchanged by the Corporation for home mortgages. For the purpose of such refunding the Corporation is further authorized to increase its total bond issue in an amount equal to the amount of the bonds so refunded. Nothing in this subsection, as amended, shall be construed to prevent the Corporation from issuing bonds in compliance with commitments of the Corporation on the date this subsection, as amended, takes effect.

"(b) The amendments made by subsection (a) of this section (except with respect to refunding) shall not apply to any bonds heretofore issued by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation under such section 4 (c), or to any bonds hereafter issued in compliance with commitments of the Corporation outstanding on the date of enactment of this act."

Sec. 2. Section 4 of the Home Owners' Loan Act is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsections:

"(1) No home mortgage or other obligation or lien shall be acquired by the Corporation under subsection (d), and no cash advance shall be made under subsection (f), unless the applicant was in default on June 13, 1933, with respect to the indebtedness on his real estate: Provided, That the foregoing limitation shall not apply in any case in which it is specifically shown to the satisfaction of the Corporation that a default after such date was due to unemployment or to economic conditions or misfortune beyond the control of the applicant, or in any case in which the home mortgage or other obligation or lien is held by an institution which is in liquidation.

"(m) In all cases where the Corporation is authorized to advance cash to provide for necessary maintenance and to make necessary repairs it is also authorized to advance cash or exchange bonds for the rehabilitation, modernization, rebuilding, and enlargement of the homes financed; and in all cases where the Corporation has acquired a home mortgage or other obligation or lien it is authorized to advance cash or exchange bonds to provide for the maintenance, repair, rehabilitation, modernization, rebuilding, and enlargement of the homes financed and to take an additional lien, mortgage, or conveyance to secure such additional advance or to take a new home mortgage for the whole indebtedness; but the total amount advanced shall in no case exceed the respective amounts or percentages of value of the real estate as elsewhere provided in this section. Not to exceed $200,000,000 of the proceeds derived from the sale of bonds of the Corporation shall be used in making cash advances to provide for necessary maintenance and necessary repairs and for the rehabilitation, modernization, rebuilding, and enlargement of real estate securing the home mortgages and other obligations and liens acquired by the Corporation under this section."

Sec. 3. The sixth sentence of section 4 (d) of the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933 is amended to read as follows: "The Corporation may at any time grant an extension of time to any home owner for the payment of any installment of principal or interest owed by him to the Corporation if, in the judgment of the Corporation, the circumstances of the home owner and the condition of the security justify such extension."

Sec. 4. Section 4 (g) of the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933 is amended by striking out "within 2 years prior to such exchange or advance" and inserting in lieu thereof "within 3 years prior to the filing of an application with the Corporation to accomplish such redemption or recovery."

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if he would object to changing "3 years" to "4 years", on line 6, page 7?

The Senator will remember that many bona fide home owners conveyed or lost their property early in 1930, and, of course, they would be denied relief if the time should be placed at 3 years instead of 4.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I think I would rather not accept that amendment offhand. It is a matter that has had the attention and consideration of the committee. I will say to the Senator that there is no one magic date that is sure to be right, with every other date wrong, but the committee thought 3 years was long enough. The original bill provided for only 2 years.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes.

Mr. COUZENS. I think the Senator has misinterpreted this language. It means 3 years from the application to the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, and not from the date of default.

Mr. BULKLEY. According to this bill, it goes back 3 years from the time application is made.

Mr. COPELAND. The point I tried to bring out is that those applications began to come in about the early part of 1930.

Mr. COUZENS. Oh, no!

Mr. COPELAND. Am I wrong about that?

Mr. COUZENS. They could not have begun to come in until after the Home Owners' Loan Corporation Act was passed. The provision refers to application to the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. That act had not been passed in 1930.

Mr. COPELAND. I shall have to get the full text of the bill to see the point; but this amendment was presented to me by some of the building and loan people. I ask that the statement I send to the desk regarding the reasons for the amendment be inserted in the RECORD at this point. In the meantime I will find the original bill, and see whether or not the amendment is appropriate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The statement is as follows:

MEMORANDUM RE S. 2999, REPORT NO. 466 (GUARANTEE OF H.O.L.C. BONDS, ETC.)—AMENDMENT PROPOSED BY UNITED STATES BUILDING AND LOAN LEAGUE

On page 7, section 4, line 6, strike out the word "three", and insert in lieu thereof the word "four."

REASONS FOR AMENDMENT

1. A fixed date would be preferable and approximately January 1, 1930, marks the beginning of loss of homes through voluntary conveyance or foreclosure. The substitution of 4 years for 3 years in the amendment proposed to the bill is the simplest way of accomplishing this purpose.

2. Many bona fide home owners conveyed or lost their property early in 1930 and, under the present language in the bill, they are denied relief as time passes, often due to delays in the action of the H.O.L.C. Many cases where applications were filed some 8, 9, or 10 months ago have not yet received attention.

3. The number of homes thus to be recouped will not be substantial, but it may include some of the very worthiest cases who, for example, conveyed to their mortgagee when first encountering unemployment and who would now repossess their homes if the favorable terms of Government relief legislation were available.

4. The only argument against the proposal is the suggestion that fraud or collusion on the part of mortgagees might develop. This argument is not substantial, as the Corporation makes ample records and investigation and should be able to recognize bona fide transactions in which sincere home owners desire to repossess and carry on their property.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill and read as follows:

Sec. 5. Section 5 of the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsections:

"(j) In addition to the authority to subscribe for preferred shares in Federal savings and loan associations, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized on behalf of the United States to subscribe for any amount of full paid income shares in such associations, and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to subscribe for such full paid income shares upon the request of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board. Payment on such shares may be called from time to time by the association, subject to the approval of said Board and the Secretary of the Treasury, and such payments shall be made from the funds appropriated pursuant to subsection (g) of this section; but the amount paid in by the Secretary of the Treasury for shares under this subsection and such subsection (g), together shall at no time exceed 75 percent of the total investment in the shares of such association by the Secretary of the Treasury and other shareholders. Each such association shall issue receipts for such payments by the Secretary of the Treasury in such form as may be approved by said Board and such receipts shall be evidence of the interest of the United States in such full paid income shares to the extent of the amount so paid. No request for the repurchase of the full paid income shares purchased by the Secretary of the Treasury shall be made for a period of 5 years from the date of such purchase, and thereafter requests by the Secretary of the Treasury for the repurchase of such shares by such associations shall be made at the discretion of the Board; but no such association shall be requested to repurchase any such shares in any one year in an amount in excess of 10 percent of the total amount invested in such shares by the Secretary of the Treasury. Such repurchases shall be made in accordance with the rules and regulations prescribed by the Board for such associations.

"(k) When designated for that purpose by the Secretary of the Treasury, any Federal savings and loan association may be employed as fiscal agent of the Government under such regulations as may be prescribed by said Secretary and shall perform all such reasonable duties as fiscal agent of the Government as may be required of it. Any Federal savings and loan association may act as agent for any other instrumentality of the United States when designated for that purpose by such instrumentality of the United States."

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, section (k) has just been read. I should like to inquire if an amendment to that section would now be in order. There are no committee amendments, and it strikes me that at the time a section is read amendments from the floor would be in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would rule that they would be in order.

Mr. TYDINGS. I offer the following amendment:

On page 8, line 23, after the word "association", insert:

Or any member of the Federal home-loan bank.

I wish to offer the same amendment on page 9, line 2, after the word "association":

Or any member of the Federal home-loan bank.

I have submitted that amendment to the counsel of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation here in Washington, and also to the assistant counsel here, and neither of them has any objection to it. I have also submitted it to the chairman of the committee, and I understand he has no objection to it.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, these amendments, of course, have not been considered in committee; but inasmuch as authority is given to the Secretary of the Treasury to designate who shall act as fiscal agent in his discretion, I cannot see any possible harm in the adoption of the amendments proposed by the Senator from Maryland. I suggest, however, that instead of reading "member of the Federal home-loan bank" it should read "member of a Federal home-loan bank."

Mr. TYDINGS. Oh, no!

Mr. NORRIS. There is only one.

Mr. BULKLEY. There are 12.

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; but they are all simply branches of the Federal home-loan bank.

Mr. COUZENS. May I ask the purpose of the amendment?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; just as soon as I get this matter cleared up, I shall be glad to answer the Senator's question.

Mr. BULKLEY. There are 12 independent banks. I think the word "any" is much more appropriate.

Mr. TYDINGS. I said, "or any member."

Mr. BULKLEY. "Any member of any."

Mr. TYDINGS. I have no objection to that modification.

Let me say to the Senator from Michigan that the purpose of the amendment primarily is as follows:

Under the bill as drawn, the Secretary of the Treasury has the power to designate fiscal agents of the Government. The building associations to which I have referred in my amendment are federalized building associations. They have complied with the terms of the Home Owners' Loan Act. This amendment simply permits them to be designated to collect the money in a transaction in which they are interested, because they are already covered in the Home Owners' Loan Association just as a bank is covered in the Federal Reserve System.

There are 800 building associations in Baltimore, I understand, and they feel that this is only a proper amendment, in that they have already been federalized; and therefore, having been federalized, they feel that they should be permitted to act as the agents of the Government.

Mr. COUZENS. I am afraid I do not understand the amendment, because, on line 21, the bill begins with the language:

When designated for that purpose by the Secretary of the Treasury, any Federal savings-and-loan association—

And that is the kind of loan association the Senator is referring to as having been federalized. Is not that true?

Mr. TYDINGS. No. As I understand, the Federal Government anticipates going into Detroit, for example, and setting up its own building association, and that will be known as the "Federal Savings & Loan Association."

Mr. COUZENS. That is already mentioned in the bill. Why the amendment? I do not get the point.

Mr. TYDINGS. Because other building associations have complied with the terms of the act, and have been federalized, so that they are in the position of branch agencies now; but without this amendment they would not be entitled to carry on all the functions of a branch agency. Only these Federal building associations which are new associations, set up after the passage of this bill, would be permitted to do that. In other words, the building associations have been asked to come in and become members under the Federal act; yet after having complied with the law in all particulars they would be denied the right to act as fiscal agents of the Government.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I understand that the amendments are modified pursuant to my suggestion. I have no objection to them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments offered by the Senator from Maryland, as modified.

The amendments, as modified, were agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to that section which I should like to have stated from the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 6, line 18, it is proposed to insert the following subsection:

(M) In the appointment of agents and the selection of employees for said corporation, and in the promotion of agents or employees, no partisan political test or qualification shall be permitted or given consideration, but all agents and employees shall be appointed, employed, or promoted solely upon the basis of merit and efficiency. Any member of the Board who is found guilty of a violation of this provision by the President of the United States shall be removed from office by the President of the United States, and any agent or employee of the corporation who is found guilty of a violation of this section by the Board shall be removed from office by said Board.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Home Owners' Loan Corporation is going to be one of the largest business institutions in the United States, if not the largest. It has its agents and its attorneys in every city and every town, and practically every hamlet, in the country. It is conducting a business operation. There is nothing in it that is not business, and everything that is not transacted along business lines ought to be kept out of it.

The amendment I have offered simply provides that the Board, in appointing an agent or an employee, shall be guided solely by efficiency and shall not give any partisan consideration to such appointment.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska is a very good one. I know that in my own State, owing to the workings of politics, most of the appointments have come from the party with which I am affiliated. I want to suggest to the Senator that I believe he would accomplish more of what I know he desires to accomplish if he would word his amendment a little differently. I simply offer this as a suggestion—that he say in the amendment that not more than 75 percent of the employees of any organization shall come from any one political party. I am afraid that, if we wished to, we could all get around the provision as the Senator has worded it.

Mr. NORRIS. No, Mr. President. In the first place, the Senator's suggestion, I believe, would not remove the evil which he, with me, admits exists, and we want to remove it. If his suggestion were followed, we would have a bipartisan consideration. Each party would be represented and would see that it got its proper proportion of the appointments and the employees, and we would make this a partisan activity. I want to make it nonpartisan, because the organization is doing a nonpartisan business, and certainly no one could ask that an agent in my town, or in some other city, should be appointed because he was a Republican, or that an attorney should be selected because he was a Democrat.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I agree with the theory of the Senator, but I should like to call this attention to his attention: I nominated in my State the present manager of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. I am glad to say that the Department here in Washington say he is the best manager in the country. I hope they are right. Quite often, however, when vacancies have occurred, I have suggested names to the manager for appointment out of some twenty or thirty thousand applications for positions which have come to my office. I have not said in any of my letters to the manager that "John Brown is a good Democrat and deserving", but I have tried to give him men who were qualified to do the particular work, so that Mr. Stiefel, the manager of the Maryland branch, acting upon my letters, would not know whether the men were Republicans or Democrats, except that he would assume they were Democrats, for the most part, if I recommended them.

Mr. NORRIS. The assumption would be justifiable, would it not?

Mr. BORAH. Rather a conclusive presumption.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not mean to say that I would not recommend Democrats—I intend to recommend Democrats for most of these places—but I want to be fair about it. I can see the injustice of that, and I would be very glad to have an amendment which would allow Republican representation in the functioning of the Board. But there is no way by which Mr. Stiefel would know, from my recommendation, whether a man were a Republican or a Democrat.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand, the Senator is willing to be restrained to 75 percent?

Mr. TYDINGS. I am; and if I am not restrained to 75 percent, I will probably not be restrained 1 percent.

Mr. BORAH. If the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska were enacted into law, the Senator would be restrained entirely.

Mr. TYDINGS. How?

Mr. BORAH. I assume that the Senator would obey the law.

Mr. TYDINGS. I would, of course; but the people who are applying to me for positions are Democrats. The manager is a Democrat. Therefore, as these people write in to me for these places, I write letters of recommendation and send them over to Mr. Stiefel and say, "When you are requested to take on more employees, I will appreciate it if you will give John Brown and Bill Jones consideration."

What is there to stop me from doing that, or what is there to stop Mr. Stiefel from taking those people on?

Mr. BORAH. The amendment contemplates that there will not be any political recommendations.

Mr. TYDINGS. That would not stop it.

Mr. NORRIS. The amendment contemplates that in the appointments there shall not be any Democratic appointments or Republican appointments; that the appointing power shall ascertain the efficiency of any number of applicants for a vacant position, and shall appoint on the ground of efficiency.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to make a statement myself in regard to the amendment before I am interrupted further.

Mr. President, here is a bank, and we are going to appoint officials in the bank. Let us do for the Government exactly what we would do if we were individuals and running a bank. If we were individuals, we would not hunt for Republicans and Democrats. If we had a cashier to appoint, we would hunt a man who was, in our judgment, qualified to act as cashier. We would give no consideration to his politics. It would never be taken into consideration.

Here is a business which the Government is going to transact. It is the biggest business in the United States. The taxpayers of the United States, whether they are Republicans or Democrats, have contributed the money that is to be expended in the management of that business. It will amount to hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars. Moreover, the work they are performing is in no way partisan. We are going to build homes for poor people, we are going to modernize homes for poor people. Fifty percent of the houses in the United States do not have bathrooms in them today. The men who are running this business are going to buy millions and millions of dollars' worth of equipment. There are going to be carpenters employed. There are to be bathrooms and toilet facilities bought for these improvements. Why in the name of business and economy, acting for the taxpayers of the United States, should we let politics enter into the matter?

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield later. It is said that we cannot have the Government doing any business because politics always gets into it. The Government is going into this business, and we are met at the threshold with the proposition on one side that we are going to make the business partisan, and on the other side we are asking that it be made nonpartisan, that every employee everywhere shall be employed according to his efficiency.

The amendment does not touch members of the Board in their appointment. It says nothing about them. They can all be Democrats. Perhaps they are; I do not know. But it provides that when we are transacting this business, when we are building homes, when we are saving homes for the poor people of our country, we want the Board to keep out of politics.

Where is there any defense for a business operation, or a Government operation of business, going into politics? Why should we not do just the same as business corporations would do?

Let me say also that this language, with one or two slight exceptions, as far as it applies to the naming of officials and agents, is identical with the provision we put into the law which authorized the Tennessee Valley Authority to go into the construction of dams and the improvement of the country in the Tennessee Valley.

Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Maryland that in the operation of that law this provision has been the savior of those who are operating it. I have talked with at least two of the members of the board as to how they were operating under that law, and both expressed their gratification at the inclusion of that feature in the law. One of them told me that but for that, he would have been compelled to resign, that he could not have gone on, that the pressure would have been too great, and he could not have withstood it. It is greater than under ordinary circumstances because of the depression, because of the large number of men and women who are out of employment. They have had something over 100,000 applications filed with them. It was difficult for them to sift them out. It cost a great deal of money and took a great deal of time, but they kept politics out of it. It was amazing to see. For instance, there came to my office, as I presume to the offices of other Senators, numberless applications, especially the Senators from the South have been bothered the same way, but the applicants come to me probably because I was the author of the language. Men have come to me by the thousands seeking positions under the Tennessee Valley Authority. Without exception I have said to them, "I cannot give you any recommendation. I will tell you where to go to file your applications, and they will be given consideration the same as those of others."

Some of them have said, "I will stand no show there. There are thousands of applications for this job which I want. Unless I can get political pull, I will not stand one chance in a thousand of getting the position." They have gone to the Board with the same kind of a plea. I have seen those men; they have been in my office. One I remember now very well who wanted to be employed as an expert in chemistry. I called his attention to the law. He said, "I am familiar with that. I have read it, but it does not amount to anything." I said, "Why does it not amount to anything?" He said, "Because it is not going to be enforced. Politicians are going to make these appointments; they are going to pick the experts, they will pick the stenographers; they will pick everybody they want to pick."

I said, "I do not believe you. I think you are entirely wrong." He said, "I have been around getting recommendations. I come to you and want your recommendation." He had a wonderful showing. If what he produced was 100 percent true, he was a wonderful chemist. He showed me the recommendations he had. He had a letter from a Member of Congress saying to him, in so many words, in black and white, "You get an endorsement from your Democratic county central committee, and I will give you my endorsement."

I said, "Did this man know you?" He replied, "No; he had never seen me, but I was guided to him by others who said politics is going to control this matter; the Government has control of it, and the law will not have any effect."

I said to that man, "You are going to be woefully disappointed. You will run up against men who will enforce the law, and these recommendations will not do you one cent's worth of good. They will investigate you. They will find out whether your recommendations are valid. They will see whether or not you are a chemist. They will ascertain what kind of a chemist you are, and whether you fit into the niche where there is a vacancy, if there is one."

That is what they have been doing, Mr. President. These men said that it was their salvation; and the members of the board will hail with the greatest of delight the adoption of the amendment which I have proposed. It will relieve them from embarrassment a million times if they want to do their duty, as I assume they do.

I have not talked with the head of the Home Loan Owners' Corporation, Mr. Fahey. I have never met him. I have not been in correspondence with him, so I am not authorized to speak; but I believe he is doing a good job under difficult circumstances. He is trying to do the best he can. He is certainly embarrassed, as I know some others under him have been embarrassed, by politics. They do not want any trouble with a Senator, or a Member of the House, or a Governor of a State, or a chairman of a committee. They want to avoid trouble if they can, because they know these men might make them trouble, whether they feel inclined to do it or not. They like to accommodate such men, but they want efficient men to do the work.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President—

Mr. NORRIS. Permit me to finish.

I know of some instances in this great corporation where men under appointment by the board are not efficient, are not doing their work properly. I have had my attention called to two or three of them. One of them, in particular, did not want to hurry up when he was asked to do so by the board; he did not want to do it, because he said, "When this work is finished I shall be out of a job. I want it to last as long as possible."

That is the politics that is involved in this matter. It seems to me it is perfectly plain that if this amendment shall be adopted, the Senator from Maryland will be relieved of a thousand embarrassments by reason of applications for jobs, because he will be able to say to the applicants, "Politics does not go. We are looking for efficiency. You can put in your application." If the Senator knows the applicant and knows he is qualified, he can say, "I endorse you."

Mr. TYDINGS and Mr. CLARK addressed the Chair.

Mr. NORRIS. I shall have to yield, I presume. I yield first to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. In order that I may not be put into an unfavorable position—

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I do not put the Senator from Maryland into an unfavorable position.

Mr. TYDINGS. No; but let me say to the Senator from Nebraska that, as the record will show, perhaps 99 percent of all the persons appointed in the Home Owners' Loan Corporation office at Baltimore, outside of a few attorneys, are people that I do not know. In cases where a number of applications have come to me, I have sent them back to be investigated and have asked the applicants to furnish their biographies, and have tried to recommend only people who could render the services the public required.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator is doing a remarkably good work. I have no doubt about that.

Mr. TYDINGS. So long as that point has been raised, I desire to clear my own record. I have done this to such an extent that I have been criticized by the powers that be in the city of Baltimore; and I have said, in a recent speech in Baltimore, that I thought it was the best kind of politics to give the people who were about to lose their homes the very best service which the Government could give them to save their homes.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly.

Mr. TYDINGS. My fear is, however, that while the Senator's amendment will tend to bring that about, in its actual operation, where the agency is all within a State, it will not accomplish what he hopes it will accomplish. That is my fear.

Mr. NORRIS. I think it will.

The Senator says he has been criticized. Why? Because he has been insisting that the appointees shall be qualified. That is very commendable of the Senator. He is doing a good work along that line. He will not be criticized, however, when he is able to say, "Here is the law. I cannot recommend you unless you are qualified. Show your qualifications to the Board and you will stand a show; otherwise, not."

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. What I am afraid of is not the picture the Senator from Nebraska visualizes, but rather that other people will endorse applicants for political reasons, and that the system now in effect in Maryland will not be in effect if the Senator's amendment shall be agreed to. I know now that the manager of the Maryland branch has had practically all the leaders of my party in Baltimore City after him constantly to put people on, regardless of merit; and I am afraid—

Mr. NORRIS. Would he not like to see this amendment become the law? Would not the manager like to be able to say that that was the law?

Mr. TYDINGS. That would not stop it.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; it would. The manager wants good service. He wants efficient men. Here is a provision which says that he shall not consider political qualifications, but shall base employment upon efficiency. If he were able to point to such a law he would relieve himself from a great deal of criticism, and it could all be put onto me. That is what I told the officials of the Tennessee Valley Authority: "If you get into trouble, lay it onto me. I wrote the law."

It was born in my own brain. It is on the statutes; and if anybody wants to blame anybody, blame me." I have had to tell people by the hundreds myself that I was going to do my best to uphold the law that I helped to pass. I believed it was a good law. The officials of the Tennessee Valley Authority have told me, over and over again, that it was their saving grace. They would have fallen down if it had not been for that law.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I know the provision suggested by the Senator has worked successfully in the operations of the Tennessee Valley Authority; I have not had much connection with it, but I am sure his observation is correct. I am trying to point out to the Senator that that is something away off, over which no local boards or leaders have much to say. Within the States, however, that reasoning will not altogether apply, and I will be very much mistaken if human nature does not get around the provision when it applies to one small section of the country that is highly organized.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] did not get the impression I was not going to yield to him. The Senator from Missouri asked me a while ago if I would yield, and I now yield.

Mr. CLARK. I do not wish to bother the Senator from Nebraska, but since he has been talking about the Tennessee Valley Authority, I may say that the provision of the law about which the Senator has been speaking has been carried to a much greater extent than I think even the Senator from Nebraska ever intended when he drew it. In other words, the Tennessee Valley Authority has considered it an absolute disqualification for employment of a man to have the good opinion of a Senator or Representative of the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator is entirely wrong. He is 100 percent wrong about that. I happen to know of some cases where the opinions of Senators and Representatives were sought by that organization, where the letters of recommendation said the applicant had had a long acquaintance with this or that Member of Congress. Inquiries have been made of the Congressman himself as to what he knew about the individual and what he thought about him.

Mr. CLARK. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska, if he will permit me, that I have in mind a case where I recommended a young man with whom I had not been personally acquainted, but he brought very strong personal letters to me from persons in Missouri in whom I had the utmost confidence, not through political channels but from persons who were competent in every way to recommend him for his particular qualifications. He went to the Tennessee Valley Authority and was told by some smart aleck college professor who was acting as personnel officer down there that it was practically a disqualification for him to bring a letter from a United States Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have no doubt the Senator has been told that, but in my judgment no such reply ever emanated from the Authority. They are too careful. They are too anxious to get good men. They are too anxious to enforce the law just as it is. But I presume they have said many times that political recommendations would not result in appointments.

I will refer to the very case which the Senator has mentioned. He said he had given a recommendation to a young man whom he did not know on the strength of recommendations to him by men in whom he had the greatest confidence. Let us consider that case just as the Senator has given it to us. Why should the Senator's letter receive consideration? The evidence upon which the Senator's letter is based consists of recommendations from other men, and those recommendations ought to have been filed with the appointing power. Why did he want the Senator's recommendation when the Senator did not know him? If the Senator could help him in any way, it would be by writing a letter and saying, "These men, A, B, and C, who have recommended this man, are well known to me. I have known them for years. They would not deceive you, and I have absolute confidence in what they say."

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Of course, it may be presumed that a man who has lived in a State all his life is thoroughly familiar with the people of the State, and has some idea about the standing of the people who are making recommendations in the State in which he lives. I do not profess that the opinion of a United States Senator should have any weight as against the opinion of a college professor in the Tennessee Valley Authority, but my acquaintance in Missouri with the outstanding engineers and people of that State might be presumed for just a moment to be sufficient to set up against the opinion of some personnel officer in the Department. In other words, it might be presumed that when I recommend a man and state in a letter all the circumstances about him, that would not be exactly a disqualification to the applicant.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course not.

Mr. CLARK. But this man, when he went down there, was told by the college professor that the recommendation of a United States Senator was practically a disqualification.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator could give me the names of all the applicants and the name of the college professor, I would take it upon myself to find out what was said along that line.

Mr. CLARK. I have the names and I will be glad to give them to the Senator. That was the last man I ever recommended to that organization.

Mr. NORRIS. I am of the opinion, if that were done, that the Senator would find that he had been misinformed, and that the college professor did not say what he is alleged to have said.

I had a man come to my office and say, "I want a letter from you that will get me in touch with the Chairman of the Tennessee Valley Authority", and when I declined to give it to him and asked him why he wanted it, when I told him that he could go there and make his application the same as could anybody else, that I did not know him from Adam and had never seen him before, he told me—and he was probably telling me the truth—what a great man he was and what an expert he was in his line. Perhaps he had a letter from somebody. I said to him, "Take that letter down; that is what you are going to use to influence me, why not influence the Board with it? Why do you want my letter? I would have to say, if I told the truth, that I never saw you before in my life."

I remember an incident that occurred some years ago, but it will illustrate the point. A lady came to my office. She wanted a letter of recommendation to a Cabinet officer for a position. I had never seen her before; she was an old lady. She told me who she was; she told me all about herself; and then she said, "Here are letters of recommendation"; and she gave me letters, which I read. They were fine letters; they were from Members of the Senate, from Governors of States, many of whom I knew personally, and in whom I had great confidence and respect. I said, "My dear lady, why do you not present these letters down there?" "Well, I intend to", she said, "but I want yours, too." "Well", I said, "I have never seen you before; I am not questioning but what you are telling me the truth, but I have no knowledge about you. You do not want me to tell anything that is not true in my letter?" She said, "Of course not." I said, "Well, I will write you a letter and I will say in that letter that I met you for the first time today; that I never heard of you in my life and that in trying to get a letter from me you presented letters of indorsement from Senator So-and-so, whom I know very well and in whom I have great confidence. I believe that this Senator would not recommend this lady if he did not believe she was all right. She also presented to me a letter from a Governor, whom I know very well and in whom I have great faith, and I think he believes what he says in his letter. Would that be satisfactory?" And she said, "Oh, no; I would not have such a letter; I want you to write a letter like Senator So-and-so has written, who tells who I am and that I am qualified to do this work; and I will tell you honestly that I am qualified to do it." She wanted me to take her word for it.

It seems to me if the other Senators and Governors knew her, it would have been sufficient for her to have presented their letters. It is evident, on the very face of things, that such people want political influence behind them. Why would they come to me and to you, Mr. President, who have never seen them before, and get letters of recommendation? Yet, it is remarkable how many letters can be had in just that way. It is remarkable how many people write such letters of recommendation.

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] referred to a recommendation he had made. Suppose a man came to the Senator from Maryland and wanted a position under this Board, and he said to the Senator from Maryland, "Here is my diploma; I am a graduate from the State University of Maryland"; and then the Senator from Maryland wrote a letter recommending Mr. So-and-So, saying that he did not know anything about the facts; that he had never seen him before and did not know him, but he would say in favor of the man that he had a diploma from the State University of Maryland? What would be the good of that kind of letter? If we are only looking for proficiency, why could the applicant not present to the appointing Board his diploma just as he presented it to the Senator from Maryland? Why did he want a letter from the Senator from Maryland? He wanted it because he felt that some political influence would help back him up.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. OVERTON. I should like to ask the Senator whether his amendment goes far enough to eliminate consideration of factional politics as well as party politics? There are some States where there are very few who are not allied with one party. In the State of Louisiana, for instance, the people are practically all Democrats. If we were to undertake to officer the Home Owners' Loan Corporation agencies in that State with Republicans we might have a great deal of trouble. The Senator has evidently been informed that we have some factional politics in the State of Louisiana; and I should like to know whether the Senator's amendment goes far enough to eliminate the consideration of factional politics in the appointment of those who are to serve the people through the medium of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; it would. The amendment says, "no partisan political test or qualification shall be permitted or given consideration", and that includes every member of every party and every faction of every party. Under the amendment political recommendations would not be given consideration, but appointments would have to be made on the basis of efficiency.

If we want to make this great institution a success, an institution that deals with the homes of our people, an institution from the operations of which the taxpayers, all of them, regardless of party, must stand to lose if there is a loss, for we must furnish the money from the pockets of the taxpayers—are we going to turn over the appointment of its attorneys and agents to politicians, instead of making such appointments on the basis of proficiency alone?

Mr. DILL and Mr. OVERTON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield first to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. DILL. With men who have been appointed as members of a political party, and who have built up an organization that is admittedly largely a partisan organization, composed mostly of members of the majority party in the administration, does the Senator from Nebraska believe that his amendment can really be effective?

Mr. NORRIS. I do.

Mr. DILL. Does the Senator think that these men—

Mr. NORRIS. It has been tried and has been a great success.

Mr. DILL. I understand that, but I am talking about this particular organization.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; this organization. The only difference is this organization is a great deal larger than the other one where it applies.

Mr. DILL. But this organization, up to this time, to a large extent has been built up by the appointment of men of the administration party.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; and under the amendment they would not be removed, if they should do their duty.

Mr. DILL. I understand that.

Mr. NORRIS. There is no attempt to put anybody out of office.

Mr. DILL. I am asking whether we can introduce successfully the merit system in this instance, when that has not been the basis of the organization in the past, but rather political influence has had its weight in this organization up to the present time?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I think it has; but I think this would be true. There are men in the organization now, put there by political influence, who will become better men, better agents, better employees if this amendment shall be adopted than if it shall not be adopted. Their positions would be based on efficiency, and in order to hold their jobs they would have to be efficient, regardless of their politics. If they should be inefficient, if they should fall down on the job, they would be removed, and the man who should take the place of one who was removed would be appointed without regard to any consideration except his efficiency and ability to perform the work.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HEBERT. I wonder if the Senator might not accomplish his purpose more effectually by providing that these appointees, at any rate the appointees in the field, shall be chosen from the Civil Service lists? Then, there could be no politics, and we would have absolute assurance there would not be any political considerations in the choice of these employees.

Mr. NORRIS. That might reach the difficulty. It would not affect those who are now employed there as much as would the amendment. The amendment, I think, would assure good appointments, to start with, and would improve the caliber of men who are already engaged in the work, for they would realize, "Now my political pull is ended; I have got to make good on this job or I will lose it."

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield further, my observation of appointments that have been made with which I am at all familiar has led me to the conclusion that no one but those of the political faith of the party in power have as yet been appointed. I do not see how the Senator's amendment is going to change that condition. I do not know of anyone else except those who are members of the party in power who has been appointed.

Mr. NORRIS. I think most of them have been appointed in that way. I presume there are sections of the country where that is not true, and other sections where it is 100 percent true, but there are going to be much greater funds provided; we are going to modernize homes; we are going to be, in effect, in the market for all kinds of conveniences to be put into homes; we are doing a noble work, if we do it right; we are doing a Christian work. We are going to modernize the homes of America; we are going to put into them bathrooms and toilet facilities and running water where they have not had those conveniences. If we leave the law as it is, we are going to have it done by men who must prove conclusively, to start with, that they are members of some political party. They may not have any qualifications for the office which they are seeking.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, I am not questioning the Senator's sincerity of purpose, and I am quite in accord with what he seeks to accomplish, but as I read his amendment I do not see how it is going to effectuate his purpose. Even if what he now seeks had been the law, even if this amendment had been part of the original statute, it would not have prohibited the doing of that which has already been done, as I read it.

Mr. NORRIS. It depends upon what has been done. I do not know as to that. I think it would prohibit it. I think there are agents and employees now in this service who, if they had not had political pull, could not have come within 10 miles of being appointed and who are in reality disqualified for the places which they hold.

Mr. HEBERT. I question, Mr. President, if one could ever get those who have made these appointments in the past to say that they ever appointed anyone for political considerations.

Mr. NORRIS. When we shall have such a law as is now proposed, they will be able to say it. I do not know, but I have an idea that if we would send for Mr. Fahey, for instance, who, I understand, is at the head of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, and ask him about it, I could rest the whole case on him. I have never talked with him; I have never heard from him; but I believe he is an honest man and good man. I assume he is a Democrat, but I do not know as to that, and I do not care whether he is or not. I believe he wants to do a good work, and if he is half the man he certainly is he, himself, does not want this great business undertaking to fail on account of any weakness. I should be willing to leave it to him whether the amendment would be helpful or otherwise.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. The Senator would have to leave the administration of his amendment in the same hands that make the appointment.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. LONG. I am in sympathy with the Senator's amendment, but I think the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT] is correct. I say that because I know how these matters are administered. If the Senator would put the appointing power in the hands of the Civil Service Commission, that would be a protection; but—and I hate to say this to the Senator—this will never do him or any of us a bit of good, not only with reference to those who are in the service now, but as to those who will come hereafter. How is the Senator going to prove that they are appointed through any political motive?

Mr. NORRIS. Very well. We will put them to work and see how well they perform their work. I venture the prophecy that in less than 10 days many of those men would walk out of the office if they were appointed through political influence and political motives.

Mr. LONG. There is no question that in my State we have had more employees than there were loans made, and probably after some time there will be more employees than there are dollars involved. I should like to have the Senator accomplish what he is undertaking. I should like to see a workable amendment adopted. I wish the Senator would consider modifying his amendment to provide that the appointments shall be made through the Civil Service. This is the highest order of what may be termed "public charity", coming from the Government, undertaking to relieve the people from loans they are unable to discharge and having an agency of the Government created to take them over. I wish the Senator would modify his amendment and put these appointments under the Civil Service. There can be no objection to that.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me answer the Senator's suggestion. I would not have any objection, if we had time, to consulting those in charge of this work. If they would say they preferred that all of the appointments be made through the Civil Service Commission instead of under the provision I have offered, I would willingly consent to adopting that method.

I doubt very much whether the Civil Service Commission would be able to help in this case, however. Just think of the wonderful machine involved, that reaches in every direction clear across the United States, that is going to have thousands and thousands of employees of all kinds—attorneys and what not. I doubt very much whether the Civil Service Commission would have the machinery to select the necessary employees within the time that it is going to be necessary to have them.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. May I point out that the organization is now running and in operation. The provision the Senator proposes is to apply only to new employees, and that would be true if it were under civil service. There will be plenty of time to fill the vacancies either through civil-service examinations or under the Senator's amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. I will make this proposition. Let us adopt this amendment. Probably the bill will be here 2 or 3 days before being passed. Then let us get the gentleman who is at the head of this institution and find out whether he would prefer to have a civil-service provision. If he says he would, then I will move to reconsider the adoption of the amendment and we will take it out of the bill and adopt the other method.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to his colleague?

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield in a moment. I first want to answer what the Senator from Louisiana and several other Senators have suggested, that my amendment will not prove effective.

If it will not be effective, then nobody ought to be afraid of it. If anyone who wants to have these appointments made through political influence thinks the provision which I have offered will not amount to anything, then he ought to be in favor of it. I want to say to the Senate that as nearly as a man can know anything and be absolute about it, I know that the kind of provision in the law to which I have referred, relating to the Tennessee Valley Authority, has been effective.

I know from my own experience in that identical case that it has done wondrous work and accomplished great good. I know that to be so from what at least two members of that Authority have said to me, and I have not as yet seen the third one about it. They have said that if it had not been for such a provision in their law they would have fallen down completely because the political pressure was so great, and they had an awful job anyway to choose from among the thousands of men who had applied those who were the most competent. They realize that they perhaps have made a great many mistakes, but they did the best they could. I think that would be true with reference to this board. I believe that this board would welcome such a provision as I have proposed, or at least it would be welcomed by the man who has charge of it.

I yield now to my colleague.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I merely wish to invite my colleague's attention to the situation as it has existed in the past.

I agree with him that the right way to run the enterprise is without political influence; but I remind him that many of the banking institutions of a governmental nature were organized before the Democratic Party came into power. They were organized by the Republicans. They were supposed to be nonpolitical organizations. They are not, as we all know. If the Senator will but make a close examination of the situation in the State of Nebraska, he will learn, if he does not already know, that they are not of a nonpolitical nature.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I do not have to make an examination. I know it as a matter of common knowledge. I have not drawn any distinction between political parties. I am not claiming that my party is any better in this respect than any other party. When it comes to handing out offices or appointments, there is no difference; at least, I do not see any difference. The situation applies to one party the same as it does to another. The Democratic Party may not always be in power. Some of the men who have been making mistakes in the past may correct them, may reform themselves and become better men, and the country may at some future day go Republican again. I do not know. It may go something else.

But whatever party comes into power, whatever organization has charge of it, what I have said applies to all of them alike. I would not have any Member of the Senate get the idea that this is intended to be a blow at the Democratic Party, because it is not. I had no such idea in mind. I do not want to strike a blow at one party any more than I do at another. I want to remove politics from these business appointments, just as the Senator would if he were organizing a bank, just as the Senator would if he were organizing an office force to conduct a business of any kind. I want the Government, when it goes into business, to do just as honest business men would do and nothing else.

Mr. THOMPSON. I agree with my colleague. I think that where an industry is having the support of both Republicans and Democrats it ought to be kept out of politics, so far as possible. But that has not been the policy of either party during my lifetime, so far as I have ever observed. Today the situation is somewhat different than existed at the time the land banks and the other farmers' aid banks were operated under recent administrations of the Republican Party. I know that, and other Senators know it.

Therefore, when this new organization was created as it was under this administration, it was supposed that it would be organized in the same way. That is the way those in charge began the organization and began the manning of it. It is not fair to criticize a Democratic Senator for having recommended persons that he wanted appointed by these different organizations, because that has been the policy of both parties during their entire history.

If the condition before us warrants a change in that respect, and we are ready to make such change, I am ready to join with the Senator; but I want the new policy to apply to all organizations, not alone to this organization. The Federal Reserve banks, the farm-loan banks that were organized and manned before the present administration was installed were organized and manned by Republicans. I know that, and I think everybody in the hearing of my voice knows it. The senior Senator from Nebraska was in the Senate at that time and is aware of this fact.

If we are starting out now on a new basis, then the theory of the Senator is correct.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, Mr. President, let me continue. I desire to refer to the interruption of my colleague. I think he protests too much. He is protesting because the Republican Party, before the Democratic Party, was guilty of the same sin that covers us now. His argument is "The Republican Party was wrong; it was sinful; it was wicked in doing these things. Now we have come into power, and we are going to do identically the same things, and we are going to use the action of the Democratic Party as a precedent."

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President—

Mr. THOMPSON. Just let me answer that.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me talk for a little while now. [Laughter.] I have the floor. "We are going to use the sins of the Republican Party as a precedent for the Democratic Party to go and do likewise." That is the proposition.

The Senator cannot put those words into my mouth. I do not care anything about what the Republican Party or the Democratic Party did in the past. I am arguing that this is justice; that it is fair. Everybody knows that the Republican Party did the same thing that the Democratic Party did in this respect; but did not you promise to be better? Did you not tell us, before election, that you were going to give us a better government? Then, why, in the name of God, are you now saying, "Why, you did all these things, and we are going to do them, too?" [Laughter.]

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield there, we did promise to do better and to give the country a better government; but we did not promise to do it by keeping Republicans in office or appointing nobody but Republicans to office.

Mr. NORRIS. Nobody wants you to do that. That is begging the question. Nobody asked you to do that, and that is not involved in this amendment.

I confess I am tired of hearing men say, "Oh, this is a good thing. We ought to have it. It would be an awfully good thing if we did have it; but the Republican Party 10 years ago sinned. Therefore, we are going to sin now just as they did. We are going to continue this method of dealing out the offices. We are going to do better," we say before election; but after election we say, "We are going to do just as you did. You were wrong. You sinned yourselves." That, however, is not any precedent if you want to be righteous. If you want to give the country a good government, you ought to improve upon the Republican Party; and if you cannot improve upon the Republican Party you are in a pretty darned bad fix, I tell you! [Laughter in the galleries and on the floor.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must inform the occupants of the galleries that the rules of the Senate prohibit any manifestations of approval or disapproval by them.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Nebraska absolutely in his last statement; but the word "politics" has two or three different meanings, and the word "political" has many shades of meaning. Politics as the science of government is one thing. Politics, in the sense of running for office, is entirely another thing. There is no activity of the Government of the United States or any other government that is not political.

Assuming that the Senator is right as a matter of principle, that man ought not to be appointed or denied appointment merely because they are Democrats or Republicans, I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska if he does not believe that when a new administration comes into power, or a new activity is inaugurated by that administration or any other administration, the men who are put in charge of the activity ought to be in sympathy with its administration and with the purposes of the law. Does the Senator agree to that?

Mr. NORRIS. As to some of them, I do. I will answer that question right now. I agree that if we were selecting a Cabinet officer, he ought to be in sympathy with the policies of the administration of which he is a part; but when we go into a business operation I deny most emphatically that that ought to be true. When a cashier is to be appointed to run a bank, I deny most emphatically that that ought to apply. When appraisers are to be selected to go out and look over a man's home, I most emphatically deny that they should be only Democrats or only Republicans?

Mr. BARKLEY. Is the Home Owners' Loan Corporation any more of a business organization than the Internal Revenue Bureau?

Mr. COUZENS. Oh, yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Or many other of the activities of the Government?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. The Internal Revenue Bureau and all the other Departments are following a policy of the Government.

Mr. BARKLEY. That policy is to collect taxes.

Mr. NORRIS. That policy may be different under this administration than it was under the old administration, and the men running the Bureau ought to be men who are in sympathy with the present policy; but when you ask a man to go out and appraise my house to see whether it is worth $10,000 or $5,000, that policy does not apply. That is a matter that ought to be taken out of politics entirely. It is a business matter.

Mr. BARKLEY. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. Then the Senator ought to vote for this amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. But I know cases in my own State where appraisers sent out by the Federal land bank deliberately undervalued farm land because they were not in sympathy with the administration that was trying to save these farms; and the land bank under which they worked had to fire every one of them in order to get men who were in sympathy with the program of the Federal land bank to reappraise these farms, in order that men might borrow money on them and save their property.

Mr. NORRIS. That only carries out a principle in this amendment which says that those men ought to be appointed without regard to their political affiliations.

Mr. BARKLEY. The same principle says also that when men are appointed or found in office who are entirely out of sympathy with the administration which is trying to put over a thing, and by their official acts are deliberately prejudicing the minds of the people against the administration, they ought not to be kept on the pay roll.

Mr. NORRIS. Why, no; of course, not. They ought to be put out of office. This amendment will not prohibit putting such men out of office. I am astonished that Senators should argue against this amendment because a "t" is not crossed or an "i" dotted somewhere, when the real reason they give is because, under a Republican administration, things were done that they rightly condemn and that this very amendment seeks to eliminate. They want the law to remain as it was when the Republicans were in power, before we had this great business institution, and let the evil continue under Democratic rule just as it did under Republican rule.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the administration now in power found occupying a certain position a man wholly out of sympathy with the policies of the administration, and found that he was using his position to embarrass the administration in the exercise of its jurisdiction to put forth policies, and that man was dismissed and a man appointed who happened to be a Democrat who was in sympathy with these policies, would the Senator say that he was appointed by reason of political considerations?

Mr. NORRIS. He might have been. The Senator has not given me enough facts on which to base my judgment.

Mr. BARKLEY. Would that be in violation of the Senator's amendment?

Mr. NORRIS. No; it would not. It would absolutely carry it out. That is what I want to do. I want to eliminate from the service, in this great business institution that we are about to set up, all such men who have no sympathy with what we are trying to do.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, will the senior Senator from Nebraska again yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. THOMPSON. As I told the Senator when I first rose, I agree with him in theory in what he is trying to do; but I do not agree with him in the proposition that in order to make a thing nonpartisan, all the officials have to be members of one party.

Mr. NORRIS. I have not said anything of that kind. My colleague cannot put me in that false attitude. I have not said anything and I do not believe anything of that kind. When the Senator says he does not agree with me when I want to put all these activities under one political party, he misstates my position.

Mr. THOMPSON. I did not mean to.

Mr. NORRIS. I hope the Senator will not do it, then. I do not believe in anything of that kind.

Mr. THOMPSON. I attempted to get the land bank at Omaha and the Federal Reserve bank to remodel their policy by appointing more Democrats and fewer Republicans, and in this connection I said, "You have this organization here so thoroughly honeycombed with Republicans that the administration is unable to create a friendly atmosphere throughout the State."

Mr. NORRIS. Well, let us get rid of some of them. Let us adopt this amendment and put out the unworthy ones.

Mr. THOMPSON. How are they to be put out? They are all in. They were in when the Democratic Party came into control of the Government.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, Mr. President, I want to add one word to the amendment.

Mr. THOMPSON. Before the Senator does that, will he let me correct his misunderstanding of what I said?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska further yield to his colleague?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. THOMPSON. When I brought this matter up with the president of the bank, he said, "We are running a nonpartisan organization." I took the same matter up to the Department here, and I told them the condition out in our State. They said, "Well, we are running this concern on business lines." I said, "Are there no business men in the Democratic Party? Must we have all Republicans in order to have a nonpolitical organization, or can we get a few Democrats mixed in with the Republicans who are running over our State and appraising our property?"

I have had the same experience, Mr. President, that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] just told us about. I have had letters by the thousands from my constituents telling me that they could not get appraisals so that they could get a fair value of their property; that the appraisers were creating a sentiment against the President of the United States and against my party. I have asked that these matters be investigated and changed. However, the situation remains unchanged, as the Senator will find if he will go out now and investigate it.

I told my colleague when I first started in with this discussion that I did not think all of the men should be Democrats.

I worked on that theory. I came back after the first time I had been here and told my colleague that I believed that this organization should be built on the theory that it was out of politics, because of the fact that both sides of the Senate had given the President the power to appoint these different officers, and therefore that the organization ought to be run as a nonpolitical organization.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator still thinks that he was right when he said it ought to be run as a nonpartisan institution, but that all the offices ought to be held by Democrats. [Laughter.]

Mr. THOMPSON. No; I told the Senator long ago that I did not believe in that.

Mr. NORRIS. I thought from what the Senator said that he did believe in it.

Mr. THOMPSON. I said that I thought that some of the officers in these different departmental organizations ought to be Democrats, and that if Democrats were not appointed to some of them, then the Democrats might retaliate and take the home-land banks and fill the offices with Democrats as far as they could to offset the situation with which they are confronted. I do not think either one of them is right. What I have said reflects the true situation.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if I may proceed a while, in order to satisfy Democrats who have been kept out of office by the wicked Republicans when they were in, in the Federal Reserve offices and other offices, we are going to fill the home-loan organization with Democrats. In other words, the Republicans have put in a lot of men in other offices on the ground of politics, and to offset that we want this organization made a political machine and filled with Democrats, and that will make it bipartisan, and everybody will be happy!

Mr. President, I call attention to the fact that this question involves a matter of business, in which the people of the United States are deeply interested, in which every man who pays taxes and every man or woman who has a heart is deeply interested. They want the homes of this country saved; they want the business conducted honestly and efficiently. They do not want it conducted as a matter of political connivance. They do not want it turned over to one political party, no matter what it may be named. They would just as lief have it turned over to the Democratic Party, if it had to go to a political party, as to the Republican Party. I do not think the people would care to which party it went. It would at least only be a choice of evils, and it would be pretty difficult to know what choice to make. They would both be so bad that the people would want to keep away from both of them.

The people want the business done on a business basis. We are going to spend the taxpayers' money, we are going to spend it ostensibly for the purpose of saving the homes of American citizens, and not to furnish jobs for partisans. We are going to give modern homes to women and little children who are now deprived of them, and we want it done in a businesslike way. We want every penny of the taxpayers' money to be accounted for honestly. We do not want it to be part of a political machine, of anybody's political machine, and it is no answer to say that because in times past or times present some other business has been turned over to politicians to run as a political adjunct, this business should be handled in the same way.

My Democratic friends are saying, "We do not want this amendment because we want the matter in the hands of the Democratic Party." In the next breath they censure the Republican Party for doing the same kind of thing when they were in office. If we are going to get things of this kind out of politics, when should we begin? Now is the time. I think this amendment would accomplish what we desire.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BULKLEY. I want to assure the Senator that I have not the slightest criticism of the merit of his amendment, but I want to ask him about the place at which he has offered it. He proposes it as an amendment which would appear in section 5 of the Home Owners' Loan Act. Section 5 deals with Federal savings-and-loan associations. It seems to me that the appropriate place for the amendment would be in section 4 of the bill, which deals with the structure of the corporation. I would suggest to the Senator that instead of offering it on page 9 of the bill, he put it on page 6, at the end of line 18.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well; I will change it. The amendment will be offered to be inserted on page 6, at the end of line 18.

CANCELANON OF AIR-MAIL CONTRACTS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I am constrained to interrupt the discussion on the pending amendment in order to take note of the position taken by the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. Fess] during the course of an address delivered in the Senate yesterday on the subject of the air-mail contracts.

Mr. KING. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. KING. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Cutting	Keyes	Robinson, Ark.
Ashurst	Davis	King	Robinson, Ind.
Bachman	Dickinson	La Follette	Russell
Bailey	Dieterich	Lewis	Schall
Bankhead	Dill	Logan	Sheppard
Barbour	Duffy	Loung	Shipstead
Barkley	Erickson	Long	Smith
Black	Fess	McAdoo	Steinwer
Bone	Fletcher	McCarran	Stephens
Borah	Frazier	McGill	Thomas, Okla.
Brown	George	McKellar	Thomas, Utah
Bulkley	Gibson	McNary	Thompson
Bulow	Glass	Metcalf	Townsend
Byrd	Goldsborough	Murphy	Trammell
Eyres	Gore	Neely	Tydings
Capper	Hale	Norris	Vandenberg
Caraway	Harrison	Nye	Van Nuys
Carey	Hastings	O'Mahoney	Wagner
Clark	Hatch	Overton	Walcott
Connally	Hatfield	Patterson	Walsh
Coolidge	Hayden	Pittman	Wheeler
Copeland	Hebert	Pope	White
Costigan	Johnson	Reed
Couzens	Kean	Reynolds

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Ninety-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the speech of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Fess], to which reference was made before I was interrupted, consumed several hours, and discussed many phases of problems pertaining to aviation, which it is not my intention this afternoon to touch upon. The conclusion of his argument, as stated by the Senator from Ohio, it seems to me, may be fairly summarized to the following effect, that no such facts exist and no such evidence has been submitted to the select committee of the Senate investigating mail contracts as would justify, in law or in equity, a cancellation of the air-mail contracts.

The Senator stated that he was willing to concede that, insofar as the information of the Senator who now has the floor extends, there is no valid ground upon which to controvert the assertion that the contracts referred to were made through collusion and fraud. His final conclusion I interpret to be that gross injustice has been perpetrated by the administration through the cancellation of the contracts and through the requirement or order that the air mail be carried by Army flyers. Indeed while there was nothing that I recall in the address of the Senator from Ohio yesterday to that effect, it has been asserted in the Senate from time to time by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] and others, that the action of the executive department in canceling the contracts, and the further action in requiring the mails to be carried by the Army, was so ill-considered and unfair that it justified placing upon those responsible for the cancellation of the contracts the responsibility also for the lives that had been lost during the period of the carriage of the mails by the Army.

My object this afternoon is to make clear, if I can, some of the grounds which appear to me as a lawyer and as a citizen, as well as a Senator, to refute the arguments of the able Senator from Ohio and of others who have taken more radical or extreme positions than he has with reference to the subject matter involved and to emphasize that under the law and the facts there was no other course open to the Postmaster General than to declare the contracts annulled.

There arise differences in this debate as to what are the facts and consequently there have resulted differences of conclusions. I assert that the proof relied upon to support the declaration that the contracts were entered into through collusion and fraud, is sustained by both direct and circumstantial evidence.

It has not been possible for me to familiarize myself with all the testimony that has been taken by the committee of the Senate which has had this matter under investigation, but I am familiar with a portion of it, and my assertion is that, accepting the statements made by the beneficiaries of the contracts, their agents and representatives, there was not only ample authority upon which to form the conclusion that the contracts should be annulled, but there was also such forceful evidence supporting that conclusion that it was the duty, under the statute, of the Executive to annul the contracts.

I quite naturally must admit in the beginning that it would probably be an impossible task to convince the Senator from Ohio of the correctness of this assertion, but this is a matter which, before it is concluded, is going to be thought about all over this broad land. Whether it be made a political issue, as has been attempted, I believe, in the Senate, or whether it be treated as a matter strictly of public interest, this subject is going to be familiar to every intelligent man and woman who resides in the United States.

Responsibility for error, if error occur, must be borne by those who commit the error. Responsibility for misrepresentation, if misrepresentation be made, must be charged to and accepted by those who attempt to misinform or misrepresent the public.

The reference in his speech, particularly at page 4491 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, by the Senator from Ohio, to the subject of competitive bidding and to the provision relating to extension and consolidation of routes, in my judgment discloses a hostile attitude on his part to the provisions of law referred to, and lack of comprehension or of sympathy, if you please, with the purposes of the statute I have mentioned.

There was nothing very new about the cancelation of air-mail contracts by Postmaster General Farley because of indicated fraud and collusion in the making of these contracts. The records of the Post Office Department are filled with instances of the cancelation of mail contracts because of fraud and collusion. They come all the way down to and including the administration of Postmaster General Harry S. New.

Cancelation of contracts on the grounds of fraud and collusion in private business and in public business is a recognized right of the person defrauded. This practice is neither strange nor unusual.

The recent cancelation of air-mail contracts because of fraud and collusion was in keeping with the principles of morals and law, and the fraud of the contractors was accomplished with the connivance and the incitement of Postmaster General Walter F. Brown and some of his chief deputies.

Moreover, involved in the queer deals were extraordinary fees to connections of influential Members of the Senate and other prominent politicians, which gave a political tinge to the whole matter and which brought about an attack on the present administration by various hack politicians of the opposing political party.

They could not defend the deals. They could not deny or controvert the confessions and other testimony which showed that the former Postmaster General had deliberately called together the representatives of the aviation companies which had enormously productive subsidy contracts and with them arranged a program which utterly nullified the law in regard to awarding these contracts by competitive bids and which actually parceled out about 92 percent of the Air-Mail Service of the United States to three great aviation combinations—United Aircraft & Transport Corporation, North American Aviation Corporation, now controlled by General Motors Corporation, and the Aviation Corporation of Delaware, now controlled by the Cord Corporation—assuring to them enormous profits from their monopoly. Certainly one who has no respect for the restraints sought to be imposed by law would not regard with a great degree of seriousness violations of those restrictions, but those who believe that the public interest should be safeguarded by well-considered restrictions designed to prevent partiality and favoritism in the awarding of Federal contracts will recognize the importance of the action of the former Postmaster General in inviting and bringing about a combination under which the contracts would be let without competitive bidding.

In 1930 these three great corporations controlled 93.21 percent of the air-mail companies; in 1931, 92.66 percent; in 1932, 92.56 percent; and in 1933, 91.88 percent.

In their predicament following the cancelation of the contracts these critics seized upon the deaths of Army pilots engaged in or preparing for the carrying of the mails in the emergency resulting from the cancelation of the commercial contracts.

These critics sought to put the blame for these unfortunate accidents upon the administration, and in more than one instance intimated that the administration had deliberately and recklessly forced a hazardous service on the Army aviators for which they were unprepared and incompetent.

In addition, they sought to convey the impression that this was done without consultation with those best qualified to express an opinion of the Army air branch's capacity.

Maj. Gen. Benjamin D. Foulois is Chief of the Army Air Corps. He has had years of experience in this service and has an accurate knowledge of the equipment and training of the aviation unit. He advised the Post Office Department that the Army was fully capable of carrying the air mail and that this would afford them excellent and advantageous experience.

Surely there can be no better authority as to the training and equipment of the Army Air Corps personnel than its chief.

The President has said definite assurances were given that the Army Air Corps could fly the mails. These assurances were given before the contracts with the commercial carriers were annulled.

Critics have demanded—and that demand has found voice in the Senate—that the President mention names; that he reveal by name the person who gave the assurance of the Army's ability to fly the mail. In reply to these critics, I give again, as I gave day before yesterday in an address to this body, the name of Maj. Gen. Benjamin D. Foulois, no less a person than the Chief of the Army Air Corps himself. And General Foulois himself has testified before a Senate committee that he made the statement. So much for that.

The Army was not asked to begin carrying the mails until 11 days after the contracts were annulled. The Army had 11 days in which to prepare itself for this job. In those 11 days not a single word of objection was heard from any official of the War Department or any officer of the Army. On the other hand, officials of the War Department and officers of the Army said that it was not necessary to give as much as 11 days for this work of preparation.

It is unquestionably true that the Army has been flying the mail during one of the worst periods of bad weather this country has known in a generation, and that this has contributed to regrettable crashes, not only in the Army but in commercial flying. Since the Army took over the mail there have been 4 crashes of commercial planes and 12 people have lost their lives as a result of these crashes. These commercial planes were under the guidance of pilots of long experience in exactly the kind of flying in which they were engaged when they met disaster.

However, the necessity for a red herring to draw across the trail of the collusive and fraudulent contracts prompted these critics, such as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Fess], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON], Chairman Sanders, of the Republican National Committee, former Senator Bingham, of Connecticut, and a few others, to charge the tragedies to the administration and to describe these tragedies as political murders.

The law under which the air-mail contracts were canceled is perfectly plain. Section 432 of title 39 of the United States Code, reads as follows:

Combinations to prevent bids. No contract for carrying the mail shall be made with any person who has entered, or proposed to enter, into any combination to prevent the making of any bid for carrying the mail, or has made any agreement, or given or performed, or promised to give or perform, any consideration whatever to induce any other person not to bid for any such contract; and if any person so offending is a contractor for carrying the mail, his contract may be annulled; and for the first offense the person so offending shall be disqualified to contract for carrying the mail for 5 years, and for the second offense shall be forever disqualified.

Let me meet here squarely the issue that has been raised in the press and in both branches of the Congress of the United States. It has been stated that, granting the Executive was justified, on the ground of fraud and collusion to prevent competitive bidding in the making of these contracts, to cancel them, nevertheless it is his duty and obligation to make new contracts with those who were guilty of the alleged fraudulent contracts. But here is the statute, which imposes upon him not only the obligation to determine the question of the validity of the contracts but whether to cancel them, and having canceled them it makes it impossible for him, without violating the law, to renew the contracts with those who justified by collusion or fraud the nullification of the contracts. That, in my judgment, is a complete answer to the propaganda going through the country that it is not only the duty but the obligation of the President to take back in some form or another those whose contracts were repudiated and have them carry the mails under new contracts. The law says that they shall be disqualified to contract for carrying the mail for a period of 5 years.

Every provision of that act was violated in the making of the contracts recently canceled. There were combinations to prevent the making of competitive bids. There were agreements, with reference to the purchasing of property, made and carried out for the express purpose of preventing competitive bidding, and the persons making such agreements were officers and agents of air-mail contractors. This was a clear violation of the statute, and demanded the annulment of the contracts.

What would you, what would any of you do if you were Postmaster General and discovered these things?

Particularly, what would you do if you found that the public documents concerning these transactions had been destroyed or removed from the files?

We have the testimony of Col. Paul Henderson, vice president of the United Aircraft & Transport Co., that he had engaged Mr. Lehr Fess to expedite the passage of the Watres bill, under which Postmaster General Brown had sought to escape the obligation to submit contracts to competitive bidding, and we have the admission of young Mr. Fess himself that he was so engaged. According to Colonel Henderson, the service consisted of 2 days' work in April 1930, after the Watres bill had already passed the House and Senate committees, and the fee was $3,000 or $5,000—the uncertainty being due to the hazy memory of the witness. And even Colonel Henderson told the Senate committee that he had considered a conference of operators called by Postmaster General Brown as improper and had sought to have it adjourned.

Similar payments to young men who might ordinarily not be suspected of great influence bob up elsewhere in the testimony regarding these unsavory proceedings.

There is the instance of Mr. Ernest W. Smoot, who sent in a bill for $15,000 to Western Air for services rendered for his representation work before Comptroller General McCarl and the Appropriations Committee. At about this time young Smoot was the secretary of the Senate Finance Committee, of which his father was the chairman.

Postmaster General Brown arranged it in such a way that a contract for an air line from New York by way of St. Louis to Los Angeles should go to a combination which embraced the Transcontinental Air Transport, the Western Air Express, and the Pittsburgh Aviation Industries, Inc.

One of the moving spirits in the Transcontinental Air Transport was Gen. W. W. Atterbury, president of the Pennsylvania Railroad. The Western Air Express had associated with it Mr. R. B. Chandler, publisher of the Los Angeles Times.

The Pittsburgh Aviation Industries, Inc., was a strong political factor in Pennsylvania and the Mellons were prominent stockholders and officers in that company. This combination put in a bid of 97½ percent of the maximum rate allowed by law. The United Aviation Co. bid on the same line on a basis of 64 percent of the maximum rate.

Although the original plan of Postmaster General Brown had contemplated ignoring the provisions of law requiring competitive bids, the Comptroller General made a ruling which required competitive bids on the transcontinental routes. Thereafter Mr. William P. MacCracken, the representative in Washington of a number of airlines, and former Assistant Secretary of Commerce, and an associate of Mr. Brown in that Department, submitted to Mr. Brown a memorandum suggesting specifications and provisions for bids. One of these suggestions of Mr. MacCracken was that 6 months' experience in night flying should be required to qualify any company to bid.

This night-flying qualification barred from the competitive bids all except those which belonged to the favored few.

Thereupon the Comptroller General again rendered an opinion, holding that Postmaster General Brown did not have the right to thus amend the law and arbitrarily add this restrictive qualification.

Immediately thereafter Mr. Warren Irving Glover, Assistant Postmaster General, collaborated with others in offering further arguments and excuses against the acceptance of the aviation company's low bid. Mr. Glover, writing to another post-office official and urging that the Department insist upon the award to the Chandler, Atterbury, Mellon, and Hoover, Jr., group, which had made the high bid, stated "we must stick together or we will hang together."

These are but a few of the details that have been produced in the evidence of the unlawful award of this contract.

These details perhaps explain a letter from young Mr. Smoot to President Hanshue, of the Transcontinental & Western Air Express, with which he enclosed his $15,000 bill. According to Smoot's letter—

Both of these projects, the decision of the Comptroller General of the United States, and the matter of domestic air-mail appropriations, have now reached a successful conclusion. You will note in my bill that I take into consideration the $2,500 advanced me by James Woolley on December 13, 1930.

And on the bottom of this letter was this notation:

Jim (James Woolley, formerly vice president of the Western Air Express), you will have to get in touch with Erny and get this cut down. It's way too much. H. N. H.

President Hanshue's full name is Harris N. Hanshue.

There were all sorts of devious transactions involved in this splitting up of the Air Mail Service among the favored Big Three, such as buying off a possible competitor for $1,400,000, double the price at which that possible competitor valued its assets, and the extermination by the Mellon Airport Co. of an active Pittsburgh Air Transport Co. in order to make good the former's demand for a share in the great Atlantic-to-Pacific mail line; the subletting of a profitable subcontract for the price of another possible competitor's refraining from bidding, all of which worked out as planned by Brown and his coconspirators.

Now, I ask again, what any of you would have done had you been Postmaster General and such a condition had been brought to your attention?

Perhaps I should make an exception. I do not think that I would put that question to the eminent former Senator from Connecticut, who said the other day:

It appears to be true that the President did not consult any of the regular military authorities who should have been called upon to express their judgment—

On the capacity of the Army to take over the mail service. Mr. Bingham is now president of the National Aeronautic Association. He presumes to criticize the President for unethical conduct. If one were disposed to reply in kind, it might be said that Mr. Bingham is the only Senator in a hundred years to have been officially censured by the Senate for unethical practices. He is not regarded here as an authority on what constitutes ethical conduct. Perhaps one who surreptitiously introduced a lobbyist into an executive tariff hearing under the guise of his clerk or secretary might not see anything wrong in awarding contracts in defiance of the law which provides for the letting of such contracts by competitive bids.

Perhaps the most bare-faced instance of double-crossing the Government was the employment of the extension provision of the new law to avoid asking for bids on contracts. It seemed reasonable when that law was passed that there should be some latitude in regard to comparatively small feeder systems to the main stem in order to round it out. As the thing was worked under Postmaster General Brown and his assistants, the extensions were frequently longer than the original route. For example, there was a line from St. Paul to Chicago for which a contract was given. Later an extension was granted to Mandan, N.Dak., followed by two extensions granted on March 2, 1933. One of these was from Milwaukee across Lake Michigan to Detroit and was immediately sublet to another company which had been flying that route commercially and which in no way or by any construction of law was eligible to receive an extension. The other was an extension on the west end of the line from Mandan, N.Dak., to Billings, Mont. These extensions were approximately three times the mileage of the original contract, making the tail a great deal longer than the dog. The Chicago-to-St. Louis line was extended in various directions. It finally reached New Orleans by the extension method, and all without competitive bidding. The original route from Cleveland to Albany was stretched by extensions all the way to Boston. The little jump from Cleveland to Pittsburgh was stretched out to Washington, D.C., after the pioneer flying the route had it taken away from him by the Mellon Airport Co., aided by Postmaster General Brown. The line from Chicago to Detroit, under the magic touch of Mr. Brown, was extended to New York City without competitive bidding.

As a result of the disclosures of the illegality, the collusion, and the fraud involved in the air-mail contracts, the administration felt compelled to cancel those contracts.

Any other course, after the truth had been disclosed, would have meant condoning the crimes, and would have resulted in the Government's continuing to pay out millions of dollars to corporations and to people who were piling up great fortunes for themselves on contracts obtained by fraud and collusion.

This the administration was not willing to do. The facts showing fraud and collusion have been testified to under oath by the officers and representatives of the very companies that had the air-mail contracts.

The Postmaster General could do no less and no more when the venality of greedy men prostituted the effort to encourage the development of aviation to their own selfish purposes. Common morals demanded it. The obligation was greater because of the connivance of officials in the fraud. The Government granted what amounted to subsidies to expedite the development of the Air Mail Service—not for the purpose of enabling a few men to accumulate huge fortunes. The whole set-up of the corporations that engaged in this collusion is an affront to commercial ethics, morals, and law.

Interlocking directorates make honest competition impossible. A few men control approximately 92 percent of the air-mail companies through these queer relationships.

Can there be even a suggestion of legitimate practices when we read of men investing a few dollars and, through combinations and stock dividends and conversions, finding themselves multimillionaires, drawing salaries and bonuses of hundreds of thousands of dollars a year, on a basis of such subsidies as brought $40,000,000 from the Government to the United Aircraft & Transport Corporation alone?

Can there be any possibility of fairness toward the Government when other organizations express their willingness to carry the air mail for a fraction of what these contracts permit the favored companies to charge?

What does it mean when a responsible contractor offers one of the favored companies to take over the contract for half of what the United States is paying, and when the company that has the contract refuses the offer because it can make still more money by doing the work itself?

What is the significance when Postmaster General Brown writes a favored contractor that he again has an offer from an independent line to carry the mail from New York to Richmond at a saving of a thousand dollars a day, and in the same letter suggests to the contractor that he not invade the territory of another favored mail contractor?

The instances of crookedness I have recited are merely a tithe of the total amount. The full recital unearthed by the Senate Investigating Committee and the Post Office Department already fills volumes, all of it documented and corroborated by letters, telegrams, and memoranda, obtained for the most part from the files of the benefiting corporations, of which many originals were not to be found in the Post Office Department. Perhaps this explains why it took 27 drawers to accommodate Postmaster General Brown's files, while what he returned did not fill a single drawer.

It is difficult to believe that our standards with reference to common honesty have changed. Whatever may be said by intense partisans on this floor or elsewhere, the people of this country still believe in common honesty and will never disapprove the cancelation of contracts conceived in fraud and executed in iniquity.

Mr. BLACK subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD, immediately after the remarks made by the Senator from Arkansas, a letter dated February 26, addressed to me, from the Post Office Department, in response to an inquiry I made as to the awarding of the various air-mail routes. I do this at this time because the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Fess] in his remarks stated that the meeting in Mr. Brown's office failed. In other words, he left the impression that the agreement was not carried out.

In this letter will appear the recommendations made by the operators in this meeting, in this spoils conference. Answer will be made as to what happened with reference to recommendations. There will also appear the lines on which no agreement could be reached, and the fact that the Postmaster General was to act as arbitrator in dividing up the air-mail map. There appear in the letter the names of the claimants to the various lines represented at that meeting. Then there appears the result after the Postmaster General had arbitrated and decided the matter, showing that far from the statement made by the Senator being accurate, that the meeting resulted in a failure, it was a most glorious success for the operators.

I desire to have this letter inserted in the RECORD immediately after the remarks of the Senator from Arkansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

FEBRUARY 26, 1934.

HON. HUGO L. BLACK,
Chairman Special Committee on Investigation of Air Mail and Ocean Mail Contracts,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR BLACK: I have your inquiry as to what agreements were reached between the participants in the conferences held in the Post Office Department Building during May and June of 1930, and what contracts were awarded. I have carefully examined the report of Mr. William P. MacCracken, chairman of the meetings, together with other data, and the facts are as follows:

Conferences were held in the Post Office Department among air-mail contractors during May and June of 1930. They met in the office adjacent to the room of the Postmaster General, Walter F. Brown, and the meeting was called together by his direction. The operators selected a chairman, Mr. William P. MacCracken. At the conclusion of the conference a report of the agreement of the contractors was filed by Mr. MacCracken with Postmaster General Brown under date of June 4, 1930. This report shows that the operators had made a study of 12 routes and agreed as to how 7 of them should be awarded.

The recommendations of the operators, through Mr. MacCracken, and subsequent action were as follows in the order appearing in the report to Postmaster General Brown, dated June 4, 1930:

The first recommendation is as follows:

"Recommendation: No. 3, Omaha to St. Paul and Winnipeg. Northwest Airways, now flying entire route."

Postmaster General Brown requested a ruling from Comptroller General McCarl as to granting an extension to Winnipeg. The Comptroller General held no such extension could be granted without competitive bidding, and such extension was not made. However, on September 1, 1930, the contract of Northwest Airways from Omaha to St. Paul was surrendered and exchanged for a route certificate between the same points.

The second recommendation in the MacCracken report was:

"Recommendation: No. 4, Albany to Boston. Aviation Corporation."

The Albany-Boston route was awarded to Aviation Corporation (American Airways, Inc.), as recommended by the MacCracken report, on February 12, 1933, by granting an extension of 162 miles to the American Airways at an annual rate of $134,816.40, without bids.

The third recommendation in the MacCracken report was:

"Recommendation: No. 7, Denver to Kansas City. United States Air Lines—now flying route."

An extension was granted to American Airways June 5, 1931, 544 miles, Kansas City to Denver, at an annual rate of $158,848. It was sublet, with the consent of Postmaster General Brown, on the same day to the United States Airways. Thus the third recommendation in the MacCracken report was carried out by Postmaster General Brown.

The fourth recommendation in the MacCracken report was:

"Recommendation: No. 8, Pueblo to Fort Worth and Dallas. Western Air Express—now flying route."

On August 1, 1931, an extension was granted by Postmaster General Brown to Western Air Express of 291 miles, Pueblo to Amarillo, at an annual rate of $117,898.65, without bids. From Amarillo the route was continued to Fort Worth and Dallas, as of the same date, 315 miles, at an annual rate of $181,660.50, by a so-called "extension" of route 33 to American Airways, Inc., by Postmaster General Brown.

The fifth recommendation in the MacCracken report was:

"Recommendation: No. 9, Pueblo to El Paso. Western Air Express—now flying route."

Route 12, from Cheyenne to Pueblo, was held by Western Air Express. It was extended on August 1, 1931, 276 miles, Pueblo to Albuquerque, at an annual rate of $111,821.40.

The American Airways route no. 33 was extended at right angles from El Paso to Albuquerque on August 1, 1931, a distance of 219 miles, at an annual rate of $126,297.30, and on the same date was sublet to the Western Air Express, with the consent of Postmaster General Brown, thus carrying out completely the fifth recommendation of the operators.

The sixth and seventh recommendations in the MacCracken report of June 4, 1930, were as follows:

"No. 11, Great Falls to Lethbridge. National Parks Airways—only party in interest."

"No. 12, Seattle to Vancouver: United, first schedule; Varney Air Lines, second schedule."

Neither of these extensions was made, and so the question of awarding to these particular lines, according to the recommendations, was never decided.

On page 1 of the MacCracken report it was stated that 7 routes had been agreed upon as above shown, but as to 5 routes "there are still some matters of controversy." On page 3 of this report it was agreed as to the routes in controversy "to submit the issues to the Postmaster General."

These "routes which are still the subject of negotiation" and the claimants shown and action taken, were as follows:

"Route no. 5, Pittsburgh to Washington and Norfolk: Final terms not yet arranged."

The working memorandum taken from Mr. MacCracken's files listed the claimants for this route as follows:

"ROUTE NO. 5, PITTSBURGH, WASHINGTON, AND NORFOLK

"Pittsburgh Aviation Industries; operating locally, Harrisburg and Pittsburgh.

"Clifford Ball flying into Pittsburgh from northwest, and flying route Pittsburgh to Washington.

"Transcontinental Air Transport not on route."

Ball, who was present at the conferences, was then flying the route between Cleveland and Pittsburgh and seeking an extension to Washington and Norfolk. Postmaster General Brown advised Ball that he could not have a certificate nor an extension of this route. Being denied a contract to operate with his own company, Ball sold out to Pittsburgh Aviation Industries and was made the operating manager for them. Thus this matter was settled by Postmaster General Brown without competitive bidding and the route operated by Pittsburgh Aviation Industries through its subsidiary, Pennsylvania Airlines.

On June 8, 1931, this route was extended by Postmaster General Brown 186 miles, from Pittsburgh to Washington, at an annual rate of $154,156.80, without bids.

The second route subject to negotiation, according to the MacCracken report, was listed as:

"No. 1, Los Angeles, San Diego, El Paso, Dallas, to Atlanta."

The claimants to this route on Mr. MacCracken's memorandum were listed as follows:

"ROUTE NO. 1, LOS ANGELES, SAN DIEGO, EL PASO, DALLAS, TO ATLANTA

"Claimants: Aviation Corporation, Dallas to Los Angeles, now flying Dallas to El Paso; Western Air Express, Dallas to Los Angeles, now flying entire route; Halliburton, Dallas to El Paso, now flying Dallas north and west; Eastern Air Transport, Atlanta to Dallas, not flying this route; Delta Air Lines, Inc., Atlanta to Dallas, not flying this route.

"NOTE.—This route is being considered with route no. 6."

This controversy was apparently very satisfactorily and profitably settled between those who were listed by Mr. MacCracken as claimants. The route was advertised with a night-flying provision, which was declared illegal by the Comptroller General and the Attorney General's Department. Delta Air Lines was bought out by American Airways. Halliburton sold out to American Airways (Aviation Corporation) for $1,400,000 and simply allowed its name to be used in making the bid for American Airways. The American Airways wanted the southern route and Western Air wanted the middle-transcontinental route. Western Air contributed to the funds necessary to buy off Halliburton by purchasing 20,000 shares of its own stock owned by Aviation at $55 a share, when the market value was $20, and a half interest in some other property in Oklahoma, making a total contribution by Western Air of $1,399,500.

Western Air also sold its routes from Dallas to Los Angeles in this deal. Hanshue wrote MacCracken that they were "advised we had to sell the Dallas route from $400,000 and take a $600,000 loss on it and, further, that we had to put up $700,000 to buy Western Express stock at 35 when the market was around 20."

This was done under the direction of Postmaster General Brown, who became the umpire, and the controversy was settled and the Aviation Corporation became the holder of the route. There was no bidder against it.

The third route in controversy, according to the MacCracken report, was:

"ROUTE NO. 6, DALLAS TO LOUISVILLE

"Atlanta to Dallas, Eastern Air Transport and Delta Air Service. "Louisville to Dallas, Aviation Corporation and Curtiss Flying Service.

"Los Angeles, San Diego, El Paso, to Dallas, Western Air Express and Aviation Corporation."

The list of claimants for route no. 6 was shown in Mr. MacCracken's memorandum as follows:

"ROUTE NO. 6, LOUISVILLE, MEMPHIS, DALLAS, AND FORT WORTH

"Aviation Corporation flying into Dallas and Fort Worth from the south and into Louisville from the northeast.

"Western Air Express flying into Dallas and Fort Worth from the west.

"Halliburton flying into Dallas and Fort Worth from the north and west.

"Curtiss Flying Service operating locally, Louisville, Memphis, and Dallas."

When Halliburton got his $1,400,000 he made no further attempt to get the route from Louisville to Fort Worth. Western Air Express, of course, made no further effort, as they had given up their route from Los Angeles to Dallas and Fort Worth from the west. Curtiss Flying Service was not considered, and the Aviation Corporation (American Airways) got this route by the simple expedient of granting an extension of route 16 of the American Airways from Louisville to Nashville of 166 miles and an extension of route 20 on June 15, 1931, of 671 miles from Nashville to Fort Worth, the total of the two extensions being 837 miles. These extensions were granted without any bids or notice to any possible competitors, and thus the Aviation Corporation, the first of the claimants, received the route.

The next route under controversy, according to the MacCracken report, was:

"Route No. 2, Los Angeles, Albuquerque, Kansas City, St. Louis, Columbus, Pittsburgh, Philadelphia, and New York."

The claimants listed by Mr. MacCracken were as follows:

"ROUTE NO. 2, LOS ANGELES, ALBUQUERQUE, AMARILLO, KANSAS CITY, ST. LOUIS, COLUMBUS, PITTSBURGH, PHILADELPHIA, NEW YORK

"Transcontinental Air Transport, now flying Columbus to Wichita, and Clovis to Los Angeles, interested in entire route.

"Western Air Express, now flying Los Angeles to Kansas City, interested in western half of the entire route.

"NOTE.—This route is being considered with route no. 10. United has indicated they would be satisfied with either the eastern half of no. 2 or with no. 10."

The only two contenders for the route being the Transcontinental Air Transport and the Western Air Express, it was required by Postmaster General Brown that the two corporations merge. They did merge and the new corporation is now known as Transcontinental & Western Air, Inc. They jointly have the middle-transcontinental route above described in the MacCracken report. Forty-seven and one half percent of the stock in this corporation is owned by Western Air Express and a like amount is owned by Transcontinental Air Transport. The Pittsburgh Aviation Industries was injected into the picture and demanded a 10-percent share of the stock and actually received a 5-percent share.

Therefore, this problem was satisfactorily settled between the operators of the routes with the assistance of Postmaster General Brown and the combination of these companies, although the high bidder received the route.

The following route was also listed as subject to negotiation in the MacCracken report:

"NO. 10, AMARILLO, OKLAHOMA CITY, TULSA, AND ST. LOUIS (TULSA CUT-OFF)

"Kansas City to New York: Transcontinental Air Transport and Pittsburgh Aviation Industries.

"Los Angeles to Kansas City, Amarillo, Oklahoma City, Tulsa, to St. Louis: Western Air Express and Transcontinental Air Transport.

"Amarillo, Oklahoma City, Tulsa, and St. Louis Cut-off: Western Air Express, Southwest Air Fast Express, Transcontinental Air Transport."

On the memorandum of claimants to these routes, prepared by Mr. MacCracken, we find the following:

"ROUTE NO. 10, AMARILLO, OKLAHOMA CITY, TULSA, ST. LOUIS

"United: Crosses route at Oklahoma City and Dallas.

"Western Air Express flying Amarillo to Tulsa.

"Halliburton flying Sweetwater, Oklahoma City, Tulsa, St. Louis."

This route is especially treated in the memorandum of Mr. MacCracken, where it is said that "United has suggested that it abandon its line south of Kansas City and take over some other line of equal value; * * *. This would permit the clearing of the mid-transcontinental of its N.A.T. contract between Wichita and Kansas City, and would open the N.A.T. line south of Kansas City and Wichita for proper disposition in harmony with the Postmaster General's ideas."

The route under consideration, which they referred to as No. 10, was made a part of the middle transcontinental, as agreed, and went to the Transcontinental Air Transport and United Aviation and Western Air Express. The United kept its routes from Kansas City to Wichita, Kans., and from Kansas City to Tulsa and Oklahoma City.

KARL A. CROWLEY,
Solicitor.

Mr. McKELLAR and Mr. FESS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas has been using my name. I demand the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. McKELLAR. I cannot yield now.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President—

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well, if the Senator insists.

Mr. FESS. I insist upon it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FESS. I insist upon the floor.

Mr. McKELLAR. Well, now, wait one moment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator cannot insist on it.

Mr. McKELLAR. If that is the attitude of the Senator he might as well sit down, because I am going on with my speech. I will not yield to him under those circumstances. The Senator cannot do that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee refuses to yield.

Mr. FESS. The Senator will please yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be glad to yield if the Senator puts it that way.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, on yesterday I detailed the facts leading up to the letting of the contracts. I did not go into the contracts themselves. Neither have I gone into the evidence. At the very earliest opportunity I shall take the floor and deal with the evidence that has been submitted to the committee to establish the charge of collusion and fraud.

I did not attempt that yesterday. Therefore, I am very glad to have the best possible defense of this indefensible act read by the leader of the majority of the Senate. I shall pay attention to that just as soon as we can reach it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if there was any lingering doubt in the mind of any person about the genuine reason that the President had for canceling the air-mail contracts, that doubt must have been removed by the facts stated by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

I am very happy that the Senator has given those facts to the Senate and to the country. They are unanswerable. They are indisputable. Even with those indisputable facts, however, it required a man of courage to act upon them; and no man knowing in his own heart what the facts are can have anything but the highest admiration for the course of the President of the United States, when he learned the facts, in acting upon them in the interest of common honesty, common decency, and good government.

I take off my hat to the President of the United States for his courage in acting upon the facts disclosed. Those facts have been known to some of us for a good, long time; but when they came out where the entire public knew them, they were acted on, and acted on effectively.

All honor to the President for his action. He was exactly right.

Mr. President, it is perfectly remarkable how politics creeps into these matters. For weeks, ever since the Army took over the air mail, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] have been weeping and wailing and gnashing their teeth over first the 6 flyers who lost their lives, and then the 8 flyers, and finally there were 2 more added, making 10 in all who lost their lives. It is a remarkable thing.

I believe every single day since the first Army plane went down one of these distinguished Senators has been on the floor of the Senate, not only deploring the deaths of these men, as he should have done, but charging the President of the United States with responsibility for the deaths and the loss of these airplanes. Everybody sympathizes on such a sad occasion; but the remarkable thing to me is that I found that in the preceding administration, while Herbert Hoover was President, 173 Army fliers lost their lives in flying Army planes, and there was not a tear from the Senator from Ohio; there was not a criticism from the Senator from Indiana. They were both as silent as the grave when 173 Army pilots lost their lives in airplane accidents.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will yield to the Senator in just a little while. Just let me finish. I am going to give the Senator plenty to answer. I will give him plenty to inquire into. If the Senator will pardon me for a while, he will have to work night and day for weeks to answer what the Senator from Tennessee is now going to tell him. [Laughter.] Just wait a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. There were 1,789 accidents during the administration of Herbert Hoover, and not a tear, not a criticism, not a word from these Senators. I say that because I have had the records looked up.

Mr. FESS. Now will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FESS. I thank the Senator.

I called the attention of no one to anyone who lost his life in Army flying; but I do call attention to the fact that in the 3 years since 1929—

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator is going to make a speech, he will have to wait. I am not going to allow it to be done in my time.

Mr. FESS. No; I am not making a speech. Last year there were 8 lives lost in mail flying; the year before, 14 lives; and the year before, 8 lives. Those are all the deaths that have occurred in mail flying.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator does not know what he is talking about. He has not the figures. He has never looked up the matter. The only flyers he has learned about who have been lost are these 10 Army flyers who have been lost in the last month.

Mr. FESS. Oh, no!

Mr. McKELLAR. And the Senator has dwelt on their deaths in season and out of season, morning, noon, and night. Whenever he got a chance he has talked about those 10 flyers.

Mr. FESS. No.

Mr. McKELLAR. I decline to yield just now. Only one of us can talk at a time. I hope the Senator will wait a little while. I will yield to him after I get a little tired.

While the Senator has talked about those 10 flyers, unfortunately there were 13 other flyers in the same period of time who lost their lives in commercial airplanes.

Mr. FESS. Two planes crashed.

Mr. McKELLAR. Not a word, not a tear, not a regret for those 13 unfortunate people; but, oh, my, what about the 10 Army flyers? "I have a chance to do something to President Roosevelt", thought the Senator, and he has been here trying to do it day and night ever since, but not a word for the poor 13 who lost their lives in commercial flying. I have looked up the speeches, I have read them, and there is not a single word. The Senator from Ohio puts in newspaper articles about the Army flyers having lost their lives, but did not even put in a newspaper article when he saw that eight lives were lost in 1 accident.

I proceed with these figures, however. I employed a secretary to look up the records. One hundred and seventy-three Army flyers were killed during the Hoover administration. The Senator from Ohio never shed a tear for one of those; he never held up appealing hands, he never expressed a regret, not a single one, during those 4 years.

Mr. President, I find another remarkable thing. The Senator was here last June, he was in this body every day last June, but he never shed a tear over the accidents which occurred during that month. Fifteen Army flyers lost their lives last June, and there was not a wail from the Senator from Ohio, and not a wail from the Senator from Indiana. In 24 days, in less time than the 10 lost their lives recently, 15 Army flyers lost their lives, and there was not even a wail. The Senator had not gotten into the politics of the thing. He thought it was not judicious to attack anybody last June, and therefore the fact that 15 lost their lives did not bother the Senator at all. He did not have a sleepless night on account of it.

I will tell him where these accidents took place. At Cajon, Calif., 3 were killed; at Oceanside, Calif., 2 were killed; at Boise, Idaho, 2 were killed; at Orchard Lake, in Michigan, 1 was killed; at Pensacola, Fla., 1 was killed; at Great Mills, Md., 1 was injured; at Plum Island, Va., 1 was killed; at Descanso, Calif., 2 were killed; at Rushmore, Va., 2 were killed, and another one was killed at Rushmore. That made a total of 15. Oh, my, what an opportunity the Senator lost then. He did not shed any tears for those 15 lost in 24 days. But the politics of the situation had not opened up to him as it has since been opened. An election was not in the offing, and therefore he forgot those flyers; he forgot those 15, just as he forgot the 173 Army flyers who were lost during Hoover's administration. He did not charge the administration with the loss of those men.

Mr. FESS. Now, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. I did not charge up the loss to anybody at that time, from the mere fact that these men were all in training, they were in school, many of them were amateurs. What I am complaining of is the Government's taking over a new service at the cost of so much human life when the loss of life could have been avoided by leaving the service under disciplined men. I think I have a right to make the complaint.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator does not think that.

Mr. FESS. Yes, I do.

Mr. McKELLAR. Just one moment. The Senator has not his facts correct. Fifteen Army officers lost their lives in 24 days last June. The Senator did not have a word to say then, he did not even mention it to the Senate.

Mr. FESS. Why should I have mentioned it?

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator was not running for office then. [Laughter.] Since the Senator is running for office, he is here trying to find some issue. That is what he is doing. That is the reason why he has done this.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. RUSSELL. I want to point out to the Senator from Tennessee that no contracts that were fraudulent had been canceled at that time.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; no mail contracts had been canceled. But that is not the principal thing. Is there not an election to be held in Ohio this year?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator had to find something, if possible, to run on.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I yield again.

Mr. FESS. May I say to the Senator that in all probability I would run better if I should make no criticism than I will run when I make criticism.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator does not believe that now, he will believe it by next November. [Laughter.] The Senator will go down on his knees and probably ask forgiveness for ever having gotten into such place as he has gotten himself into now.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President—

Mr. McKELLAR. Just one moment. Why do I say that? It is because the Senator is proceeding on a false premise. I have the greatest sympathy and regret for the families of the 10 unfortunate fliers who were killed. My heart is full of regret for the sad loss of their lives, just as it is for the loss of the 13. The trouble was that the Senator did not cover enough territory when he was making his lamentations. He confined them to the 10 who had lost their lives in Army flying recently, and he thought he would do that for political purposes.

Mr. FESS. No.

Mr. McKELLAR. He did not say a word about the 13, did he?

Mr. FESS. They were not under the responsibility of the Government.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the contracts are good, as the Senator claims they were, then they were under the full responsibility of the Government.

Mr. FESS. No; they were not.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator knows that. Of course the Senator knows that. If the Senator will permit me to continue with my speech—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee declines to yield further.

Mr. McKELLAR. One hundred and seventy-three Army flyers lost their lives during the Hoover administration and 137 commercial air flyers lost their lives during the Hoover administration, making 310 in all who lost their lives, without the expression of a regret on the part of the Senator from Ohio. The Senator ought to write a letter to each one of the widows of those 310 men who lost their lives during the Hoover administration and tell her that he is very sorry for not having risen and had a word to say in their behalf. The Senator did not say a word about the 310 who lost their lives during the Hoover administration, but now, day after day, morning, noon, and night, whenever the Senator can get an opportunity, he refers to the loss of these 10 Army flyers.

The Senator is so anxious about the matter that he does not want anybody else to make a speech on it. He wants to take up everybody else's time, as well as his own, in order to talk about the 10. The Senator is very much mistaken if he entertains the thought that he can come back to the Senate through talking about those men who lost their lives, unfortunately, during storms. There were no accidents as a result of storms last June, and yet 13 Army flyers lost their lives during that month, and the Senator did not have a thing to say about it.

Mr. President, let me go further into the airplane situation. During the Hoover administration there were 456 accidents in commercial flying, and not a wail from the Senator from Ohio or from the Senator from Indiana, not a wail. One hundred and thirty-seven commercial flyers lost their lives in 456 accidents, and not a wail.

In the Army Air Corps there were 1,789 accidents and 173 lost their lives. Yet the Senator is undertaking to make a mountain out of a molehill, so to speak. He forgets the 300, he forgets the 153, he forgets the 137. But, he says, "Oh, I must not forget the 10. I can go back into Ohio and tell the people out there, those good Republicans, that President Roosevelt killed those 10, and I can get by with it." I say to the Senator that he is not going to get by with it. If the Senator makes that an issue in the campaign, he is going to be beaten on it, because honesty and justice will not be on his side. The President of the United States has not done an improper thing; he has done an honest thing, a fair thing, a just thing.

Mr. FESS. No; he has not.

Mr. McKELLAR. And a courageous thing. I think the Senator is the only man in the Senate who differs with that statement.

Mr. FESS. No; I am not.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will tell the Senator why I say that. The other day, when I asked if there were any other Senators on the other side who took the view the Senator from Ohio took, not another Senator rose. The Senator from Ohio alone rose.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. GORE. The Senator from Tennessee has given some very interesting figures. I was wondering whether he intended to state them by fiscal years.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I want to put this statement from the War Department into the RECORD, and I pause long enough now to ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEBRUARY 26, 1934.

HON. KENNETH McKELLAR,

United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In compliance with your telephonic request of this date, the following accident and fatality statistics pertaining to scheduled commercial air-transport services and the Army Air Corps since July 1, 1928, are submitted:

Commercial air-transport services

Period	Accidents	Fatalities
Fiscal year 1929.....	112	35
Fiscal year 1930.....	120	49
Fiscal year 1931.....	108	19
Fiscal year 1932.....	132	49
Fiscal year 1933.....	96	20
July to December 1933.....	53	10
Total.....	621	182

Army Air Corps

Fiscal year, 1929.....	390	61
Fiscal year, 1930.....	468	52
Fiscal year, 1931.....	456	26
Fiscal year, 1932.....	423	49
Fiscal year, 1933.....	442	46
July to December 1933.....	193	23
Total.....	2,372	257

In this connection particular attention is invited to the fact that the figure 2,372 includes all accidents, even when minor damages only are incurred, in which Regular Army personnel, students, and Reserves, on both active and inactive duty, are involved; also the figure 257 includes all fatalities among military and civilian personnel. Approximately 75 percent of these Air Corps accidents are connected with student-flying training, which training is continuous. Whereas commercial air-line pilots are all experienced pilots who have already had their flying training, either at one of the service schools or at some civilian school.

It is understood that minor accidents, which only cause minor damage to aircraft, are not included in the table showing commercial air-transport accidents, whereas the Army Air Corps includes all accidents of every description.

The records show that during the fiscal year 1933 an average of 2,933 group I pilots, including Regular Army personnel, Reserves both on active and inactive duty, and flying cadets flew Army aircraft, and that an average of 543 first-line pilots were in the employ of the scheduled commercial air-transport services during the calendar year 1933.

Yours very truly,

B. D. FOULOIS,
Major General, Air Corps,
Chief of the Air Corps.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?
Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. GORE. Since the Government canceled the mail contracts and assigned the task of carrying the mail to the Army officers, on February 9, there have been nine fatalities. Three of the planes in which those fatalities occurred had mail aboard ship. Five fatalities occurred on trial flights or trial trips.

During this fiscal year there have been 39 fatalities among the Army flyers. For the fiscal year 1933 there were 46 fatalities. For the fiscal year 1932 there were 49 fatalities. For the fiscal year 1931 there were 26 fatalities. For the fiscal year 1930 there were 52 fatalities. For the fiscal year 1929 there were 61 fatalities. That was an average of 47 for each fiscal year.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I have the figures to substantiate the statement in the memorandum sent me by General Foulis of date February 26, 1934, which I have offered for the RECORD.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the Senator know also that it is a fact that several among the 10 Army fliers who lost their lives while carrying the mail, as enumerated by the Senator from Oklahoma, were using planes and engines that were purchased from the very companies which are now demanding that the air contracts be returned to them?

Mr. McKELLAR. I did not know that; and I thank the Senator for his contribution.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is a fact; and not only that, but one company, Pratt & Whitney, which is a concern that makes Army airplane engines, has sold many of them to the United States and declared dividend profits of $10,000,000 on an investment of $500,000.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. McKELLAR. One moment, Mr. President. I desire to put into the RECORD at this point exhibit 1, on page 2 of document no. 70, known as "Air Mail Contracts."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

EXHIBIT 1.—List of contracts

The routes that are now operating, except nos. 33 and 34, carry air mail under a route certificate and on a space-mileage system of compensation, as prescribed in the act of April 29, 1930. Routes 33 and 34 operate under a contract and on a space-mileage basis, as prescribed in the same act.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have placed this in the RECORD, Mr. President, for the purpose of calling attention to the fact that the contracts which were awarded, as shown by the Department as of date March 2, 1932, were not awarded to the companies to which the United States Government is paying the enormous subsidies in connection with which there have been fraud and scandal and rascality ever since they were initiated; but listen to this recital of how the routes were awarded: Route 1, American Airways; route 2, American Airways; route 20, American Airways; route 21, American Airways; route 22, American Airways; route 23, American Airways; route 24, American Airways; route 27, American Airways; route 29, American Airways; route 30, American Airways; route 33, American Airways.

Eleven out of the 23 routes went to American Airways, which is not even mentioned as ever having gotten a contract; but, as the Senator from Arkansas has so well said, the former Postmaster General has manipulated the contracts into the hands of three great companies, one of which is the American Airways. So if we ever make another contribution of similar kind for the building up of aviation, I think it ought to be termed, "A bill for the continuous support in luxury of the American Airways" and the two concerns joined together with them.

I now yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, the Senator, of course, is aware that the unfortunate deaths of the young Army officers, to whom the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] has referred, have no connection whatever with, nor would they have interfered with, the flood of easy money out of the United States Treasury that has made multimillionaires of a lot of airplane gamblers in the last few years. I am happy the Senator has made that plain to the American people.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thank the Senator.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. FESS. Referring to the statement of the Senator from Oklahoma giving the number of fatalities during the year, does the Senator recall that in flying the mail in 1930 there were only 8 pilots lost, there being an average of 1 fatality to every 2,000,000 miles flown? In 1931 there were 14 pilots lost, but the mileage flown was nearly double, so that the average number lost was still about 1 to every 2,000,000 miles flown. In 1932 there were only 8 pilots lost, an average of only 1 fatality for four and a half million miles flown. That is what I am talking about with reference to fatalities in the Air Mail Service.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President—

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Ohio is talking about politics.

Mr. FESS. No, Mr. President; I am not.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is uppermost in his mind. He has not been thinking about anything else for the last month. He thought he saw a chance to land, but I think he is mistaken about it.

Mr. FESS. No. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. Just one moment. I will yield first to the Senator from Oklahoma, and then I will yield to the Senator from Ohio for the purpose of saying whatever he wants to say.

I now yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, with reference to the figures quoted by the Senator from Ohio, every death that has occurred in connection with the flying of the air mail by the Army officers was of course a tragedy.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course.

Mr. GORE. But to me the most significant circumstance in connection with all these tragedies is the fact that the flyers upon whom the public will have to rely in case of war have had so many fatalities in carrying the mail. Whether the fatalities are chargeable to inefficient engines or to a lack of proper training on the part of those who have gone to their deaths, I do not undertake to judge. Mr. President, there lies the tragedy, and the nations of the earth must marvel at the result.

Mr. McKELLAR. I now yield to the Senator from Ohio if he desires to speak.

Mr. FESS. I simply wanted to ask the Senator whether he will not be a candidate for reelection this fall?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; but I am not running on the deaths of other people.

Mr. FESS. What is the Senator running on?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am running on what I hope is a good record which I have made since I have been in the Senate, a record of what I believe to be honest and really courageous defense of my Government.

Mr. GORE. Against subsidies.

Mr. McKELLAR. Against subsidies, and against wrongs of every kind. If I am defeated I will take my medicine like a man, and I will not stay around Washington, either.

Mr. FESS. The Senator is making a defense of an indefensible position.

Mr. McKELLAR. No, Mr. President; I am not defending. The Senator is trying to defend his position, but I do not feel that there is anything which it is necessary for me to defend. I just want the facts brought out.

There has been some criticism on the floor of the Senate recently of Postmaster General Farley. I wish to take this occasion to say that prior to the last campaign I did not even know Mr. Farley. During and since that campaign I have learned to know him intimately. In my judgment, he is one of the ablest young men in this country. He is absolutely honest, he is clean-cut, he is courageous, and he is doing his duty as Postmaster General without fear and without favor, in a highly commendable way.

Mr. President, I digress here long enough to say that "courage" is one of the noblest words in the English language. Why is the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] so honored and respected throughout our Nation? Because he is honest; but above all, because he is courageous. Why is the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] respected and esteemed by honest men throughout the land? It is because of his honesty and courage.

Courage, in my humble judgment, is one of the noblest attributes that any man can have. Jim Farley is courageous, and he is doing his duty as Postmaster General without fear and without favor and in a highly commendable way.

My good friend the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] spoke yesterday of the Postmaster General having gone on a trip to Texas in an airplane, and of his having received a present of a hat. If the Senator from Louisiana had ever examined the law he would have known that the Postmaster General has the right to travel on trains and in airplanes.

Mr. BARKLEY and Mr. LONG addressed the Chair.

Mr. McKELLAR. One moment, Mr. President. The Postmaster General has the right to travel on airplanes carrying the mail.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President—

Mr. McKELLAR. Just one moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee declines to yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. There is nothing dishonest about his riding in the airplanes. There is nothing wrong about it. The very fact that the Postmaster General rode on these planes before he knew the conditions under which the planes were operating for the Government in carrying the mail indicates the fairness of the man.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President—

Mr. McKELLAR. In just a moment I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I want to call the Senator's attention—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana is out of order.

Mr. McKELLAR. So soon as Postmaster General Farley learned that the air-mail contracts had been obtained in a fraudulent and corrupt manner in a previous administration, he did not hesitate a moment about canceling the contracts, and for anyone to say that the Postmaster General committed a wrong in riding in these planes shows he is hunting for an opportunity to criticize the Postmaster General.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. McKELLAR. I should prefer that the Senator from Louisiana permit me to finish.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee not give me a chance?

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well, I will yield.

Mr. LONG. Does the Senator say it is legitimate for the Postmaster General to accept a $20 hat?

Mr. McKELLAR. Well—

Mr. LONG. Yes or no. Let us get down to the bottom of this thing.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will tell the Senator that, in my opinion, a matter like this is a trifle. Has the Senator, while he has been in office, never accepted a gift of $20 in any way, shape, or form?

Mr. LONG. No; not a dime. I have been looking for it, but I have not found it.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator has been looking for it, but he has not found it?

Mr. LONG. I have not found it. The Senator says he thinks it is all right for the Postmaster General to take a $20 hat?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not see any particular objection to it.

Mr. LONG. All right. There would be no harm in getting a hat for his wife, either, or for the rest of the family?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, there is no use talking about such things. If the Senator wants to interrupt me with that kind of argument, I will not yield.

Mr. LONG. The Senator—

Mr. McKELLAR. I will not yield for that kind of an argument, Mr. President.

If the Senator will proceed in order, I will be happy to yield to him, but I do not wish to yield for the purpose of having foolish questions asked.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will yield in one moment, Mr. President.

Mr. LONG. Was it all right for this airplane to be furnished Mr. Farley that was not on any air-mail route, that was not carrying any freight whatever, to take him to a barbecue, from Shreveport, La., to Meridian, Miss., where there is no air-mail route of any kind?

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the Senator is wholly mistaken, and that there is a route.

Mr. LONG. Oh, no; there is no route there.

Mr. McKELLAR. He was on his way to Texas, and of course, he could go through Mississippi on an airplane and stop over if he wanted to do so. I believe there is not a man in the country except the Senator from Louisiana who personally does not like Mr. Farley, who would rise to criticize him in this way.

Mr. LONG. There is no air-mail route between the points where Mr. Farley was flown. I know the Senator from Tennessee to be an honest man, but is he going to tell the people that it is honest for that man to have taken that airplane, with that gas, without a pound of mail, to have taken a $20 hat, to go on a junketing trip to a barbecue, and then let those people out of their contract? I do not think that was right.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator does not have his facts right.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President—

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. I merely wish to inquire of the Senator from Tennessee if the predecessor of Mr. Farley did not accept a gift of an entire new automobile on account of a hat? [Laughter.]

Mr. McKELLAR. I think I heard something about it at the time. It seems the automobile was not big enough for his hat.

Mr. BARKLEY. His high hat! [Laughter.]

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; his high hat, and he had to get either a new automobile at the expense of the Government or a new hat.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Government would have saved a lot of money if someone had given Mr. Brown a new hat. [Laughter.]

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; it would have saved a lot of money for the Government.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I understand that the former Postmaster General can now wear an average size hat. [Laughter.]

Mr. McKELLAR. As a matter of fact, Postmaster General Farley has let no air-mail contracts at all. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. Long] should be careful to know the facts before he undertakes to dispute statements that are made on the floor. That is my judgment. I like the Senator from Louisiana, and I have no quarrel with him.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator from Tennessee one more question.

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. LONG. It seems that this hat business is infectious. It seems that his successor in office had the hat habit, too. The only difference is that the one was a hat in an automobile and the other was a hat in an airplane. [Laughter.]

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator as usual is mistaken. As a matter of fact, it is easy to criticize, but the Senator ought to have the facts behind his criticism or it falls to the ground. For some reason the Senator from Louisiana does not like Mr. Farley, and continuously assails him. I think it is hardly fair that he should do so in this body unless he has the facts to back up his criticism.

Mr. President, I will proceed.

Mr. LONG. I want to know first if anything I said is denied. Farley got the hat, Farley took the trip, Farley got the free gas, the free grub, and was on the plane that was not on an air-mail route, and did not have an ounce of mail in it. Does the Senator deny those facts?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say for the benefit of the Senator from Louisiana that I will take his statements under consideration.

Mr. LONG. Then please leave me out of it, if the Senator wants to do that.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I have been here during the administrations of a number of Postmasters General. The first one was Mr. Hitchcock, a Republican; the next was Mr. Burleson, a Democrat; the next Mr. Hays, a Republican; the next Dr. Work, a Republican; the next former Senator New, a Republican; the next was Mr. Brown, a Republican; and the last, the present Postmaster General, is Mr. Farley, a Democrat.

I have never known a Postmaster General more assiduous in his efforts to run the Department successfully than Mr. Farley. He is genial in dealing with men. He is considerate of the men under him. He is watchful of the best interests of the Service, and he is one of the ablest men in the Government service, barring none.

The very fact that the Postmaster General had the courage to recommend to the President the cancelation of the air-mail contracts when he became convinced that the contracts were dishonest and illegal ought to give him the highest place in the esteem and admiration of the American people. I believe it has done this very thing. He has thereby won for himself a splendid distinction as a Cabinet officer, unafraid and determined to do his duty, let the chips fall where they may. I honor and respect him for the position he has taken. I honor and respect him for the success that has come to him as a young man. I am delighted to have the privilege of saying that I believe in him, in his honor, his integrity, and his splendid capacity as Postmaster General.

ORDER FOR RECESS TO MONDAY

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its labors today, it take a recess until 12 o'clock noon on Monday next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, does that contemplate that the unfinished business shall go over until Monday?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. And there shall be no vote on the unfinished business before Monday?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I understand it will not be practicable to finish the pending bill this afternoon. After consulting with a number of Senators I expect, when the present debate shall have been finished or suspended or something else has happened to it, to move a recess.

Mr. McNARY. Does the Senator's proposal also contemplate that no action shall be taken on the pending amendment until Monday?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes. I will say to the Senator from Oregon and other Senators that I should like to have a brief executive session for the consideration of certain nominations on the Executive Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent agreement submitted by the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I should like to inquire just what is the situation with reference to the so-called "bonus bill." What has happened to it since the House passed it?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. My information is that the bill is on the table. I am not sure that that is correct. I inquire of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the bill has been received from the House and is here. No action has been taken on it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I desire to be recognized in my own right, since my name has been brought into the debate.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to have something printed in the RECORD?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I prefer not to yield now. It will take only 5 minutes for me to conclude my statement.

Mr. BLACK. Very well.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask that the agreement which I have submitted may be entered into, unless there is objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the unanimous-consent agreement is entered into.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I have listened to the Senator from Tennessee—

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I do not wish to disturb the Senator from Indiana, but I think I had the floor, and it was my intention to yield to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] to make a brief statement and insert some matter in the RECORD.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I understood that I had the floor; but if it does not take long, I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not wish to enter into any argument about the matter. I thought I was recognized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognized the Senator from Arkansas in connection with the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. As a matter of fact, then, the Chair recognized the Senator from Indiana and asked the Senator from Indiana if he would yield to the Senator from Alabama.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well. I make no further contention about the matter.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] has seen fit to mention my name several times in the speech he has undertaken to make.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I merely desire to make an inquiry. Has the unanimous-consent agreement proposed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Robinson] been entered into?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; it has been.

Mr. NORRIS. That is, it is understood that we are not to take up the unfinished business again today?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I make a brief statement?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. There was no express agreement entered of record; but I did state that it is not my expectation to proceed with the unfinished business after this debate shall have been concluded.

Mr. NORRIS. I have told several Senators who have asked me, who wanted to go away—and some of whom have gone—that the unfinished business undoubtedly would not be taken up again today.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well; the Senator may rely on that. I shall make a motion to take a recess, in conformity to the agreement just entered into, as soon as the debate permits, except that I wish to have a brief executive session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana will proceed.

CANCELATION OF AIR-MAIL CONTRACTS

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I listened to the statement of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] very carefully, but so far as it refers to anything I have said, it begs the question completely.

This controversy does not arise over the question of how many casualties or fatalities there have been in past years in aviation in this country. It is lamentable, of course, that any pilots should ever lose their lives; but with the Army and the Navy and the Marine Corps aviation represents an important part of the national defense. In both the commissioned and enlisted personnel, men understand precisely what they are doing when they enter the service. A great deal of practice is necessary. Some of the men must lose their lives. Unfortunately that is true if the science is to be developed, and if we are to have a real air defense.

So far as the commercial companies that carry the mails are concerned, when pilots are employed by them the pilots understand the risks they are taking in that very hazardous employment; and that is a matter, then, between employer and employee. Unfortunately, there are fatalities there again, and all of us regret that that is true; and so there have been fatalities in the Air Service in the Army throughout the years. There will continue to be casualties there. There have been fatalities in the Air Mail Service conducted by private companies, and there will continue to be fatalities there; but that is an entirely different matter from the controversy which arises out of the President's ill-considered action in canceling these contracts in the matter under discussion.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. In a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Here, Mr. President, there was no national emergency. The President of the United States could have waited 3 weeks or 3 months if necessary until he was certain his action would not destroy aviation and a great industry in this country. But rashly, hastily, without giving the facts the consideration that the American people expect the Chief Executive of the Nation to give to great questions of this kind, the President of the United States canceled all these contracts and refused to give the carriers an opportunity to be heard in their own defense, violating the Constitution of the United States, certainly in its spirit, violating all the traditions of the American people throughout the centuries. At a time when the President is urging, through the N.R.A., that business all over the United States increase employment, increase wages and salaries, the President takes this action that completely destroys an entire industry that is absolutely essential to the defense of the Nation, and throws thousands of men and women out of employment.

Finally, after having taken this rash and hasty action which the country, notwithstanding what has been said on the other side, undoubtedly believes as ill-considered, the President ordered the mail to be carried by the Army; without any emergency existing at all, he sends these pilots into the air over routes with which they were not familiar; with equipment that certainly was not adequate for the task; with beacons having been discontinued through false economy so that pilots could not find their way; with no hangars provided over the routes so that the ships could be taken care of properly and inspected, and that ill-considered action resulted in the deaths of 10 of the bravest pilots in the United States. So that the Executive order, which was not an emergency matter at all, sent these 10 men to their deaths. That cannot be laughed off on the other side of this Chamber on the ground of politics, nor will the American people laugh it off, nor will they consent to have it laughed off, nor is it a laughing matter in the homes of tragedy, woe, and despair that have been wrecked because of these deaths.

Now I yield to my friend from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee and also the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] referred to the large number of fatalities per year in the Army. I wish the Senator would remind the country that when the Army is training in the various different kinds of "stunts" which are very hazardous and involve great danger, it is inevitable that there will be many losses of life. The Senator knows that trained flyers like Rickenbacker and Lindbergh have stated that there is no great danger in flying as long as no "stunt flying" is undertaken; but a good deal of that is necessary in the Army requirements as to maneuverability, and inevitably in the first efforts there will be many fatalities.

Now the Senator is complaining of the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from Ohio because we were not denouncing the Army for training these men, the result of which will necessarily be fatalities, and uses that as a defense for putting these men in a service that had been conducted without fatalities and having the work done by men who could not do it without fatalities, and the Senator assumes that that is an answer to the situation.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. In any event, Mr. President, it has nothing to do with this controversy—not the slightest in the world. It is simply a smokescreen being erected here in order to turn the eyes of the country away from the sickening sight of the Executive blunder that has resulted directly in the loss of 10 lives in the air and the loss of hundreds of thousands of dollars of property.

There is just one question involved here. That is, Why did the Executive in the first place cancel these mail contracts without giving those who held the contracts a fair hearing? We accord a fair trial, and his day in court, to the worst criminal who ever lived. If a man is charged with murder, we give him his opportunity to be heard. In this instance, with 31 of the contracts practically unquestioned so far as evidence is concerned—conclusive evidence, at any rate, it is ex parte up to this point, and only 3 contracts have been drawn into the controversy to any considerable extent—the President of the United States canceled all 34 of them, the good and the bad, the just and the unjust, and refused to hear what the contractors had to say. Of course, that is un-American and contrary to the whole spirit of American tradition.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President—

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That is the first thing that happened. I do not know whether there was any collusion or not. I hold no brief, I make no defense, for anyone charged with guilt in these matters. If they were guilty, they should all be convicted, and I should be glad to see them convicted, regardless of whether they are Democrats or Republicans; but they should have a fair trial—at least as fair a trial as we give to those charged with murder.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Has the President of the United States done anything since he has been in the White House of which the Senator from Indiana approves?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Oh, yes, Mr. President. I have voted for many measures he has proposed. I think the Record will show, perhaps, that I have more consistently supported the President's recommendations for legislation than has the Senator from Missouri; and if the Senator will look at the RECORD, I think he will find that that is a conservative statement.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator will yield a moment further, I have not always agreed with the President in his recommendations for legislation.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Nor have I.

Mr. CLARK. When I have not, I have voted against them.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. So have I.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from Indiana has consistently, day after day, week after week, month after month, come in and consumed the time of the United States Senate in abusive personal attacks on the President.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator may make all the speeches he desires to make in his own time, but I trust that he will permit me, particularly at this late hour, to speak for myself in my time.

I have supported the President when I thought he was right. If I believed he was wrong, I have opposed him. I shall continue to do that, even though I stand alone, and it makes no difference what the Senator from Missouri may say. That is the policy I have pursued during nearly 9 years in this body; and so long as I hold a commission from my State, I shall continue following the same policy.

The second thing was the issuing of the Executive order. I have mentioned it. It has been mentioned here time and again. I suspect there are those on the other side who would like to forget it. It will not be forgotten. The country cannot forget it. It will never be forgotten in the homes of those who have been sent to their deaths by this Executive order.

Now, Mr. President, one other point. As soon as the order was issued, there was protest from one end of this country to the other, which has continued to this very day. The American people believe in fair play, and one great aviator in the country, who holds the admiration of every American citizen, Colonel Lindbergh, was bold enough to protest against the ill-considered action of the White House. Immediately he was insulted and abused, and in the most scathing manner it was suggested that he was a publicity seeker, he who has dodged publicity all his life, he who goes out of his way to avoid publicity. Yet that was the cowardly charge made against Colonel Lindbergh.

Then the fatalities began, just as he said they would. One pilot was killed directly as a result of the Executive order; then 2, then 3, then 4, and still no action at the White House. Then 5, then 6, and still no action at the White House. Then 7, then 8, and still no Executive action. Then 9, and still no action. Then 10. Somehow or other 10 was considered to be the limit. That was the point where it seemed necessary to the Executive to call a halt on the whole ghastly business, and a halt was called.

What happened? The young man they had insulted, Colonel Lindbergh, who continues to hold the admiration of the American people, in whom the country still believes, notwithstanding the cowardly attack made on him, is sent for by the Secretary of War to come here and get them out of the ghastly mess in which the administration found itself. The Secretary of War had his picture taken with the colonel, in intimate conversation, as if they were old and tried and true friends. Then he gave out an interview to the effect that, "This is our leading authority on aviation." Of course, the country knew that without any statement from the Secretary of War. In every manner they undertook to undo the blunder they had committed. Then finally they insulted him again by asking him to come to Washington and become a member of a commission to undertake to work out some details in connection with that same Executive order which has destroyed the whole aviation industry in this country, and, of course, Colonel Lindbergh promptly refused. That is the history of this thing, in a word, up to date, and all this talk about what has happened in aviation in the last 3 or 4 years has utterly nothing in the world to do with the controversy which has engaged the attention of the Senate this afternoon.

Mr. President, it was a blunder. It was not only a blunder, it was a tragic blunder. If the Executive department of the Government would admit the blunder openly—and the whole country knows it is a blunder—and then constructively try to undo the evil that has been done, the Nation would be better satisfied.

Mr. CLARK subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be inserted in the RECORD at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] a very short stanza or verse or doggerel, as you may please to call it, which is completely illustrative of the attitude of the Senator from Indiana toward the President of the United States, whatever he may be, no matter what he may do.

It is as follows:

I do not love thee, Dr. Fell,
The reason why I cannot tell;
But this alone I know full well,
I do not love thee, Dr. Fell.

THE GOLD CLAUSE IN CONTRACTS

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President I have so often thought recently that I lived in a world all alone that I do not project myself into vehement controversies such as we have heard here today; and I have no idea of doing so now except incidentally to remark that for 5 years as a member of the Appropriations Committee of the Senate I have been trying to have these contracts canceled and to have the Government stop spending approximately $30,000,000 a year on air-mail service that is nothing in the world but a fanciful luxury.

I have received 8 or 10 air-mail letters within the last 2 weeks. I could just as well have gotten them next month as when I did get them. I am convinced that 90 percent of the mail carried by air could be carried by the best railway postal service in the world; and if there were anything of an emergent nature, it could easily be covered by the best telegraph system in the world; and if that were not swift enough, it could then be covered by the best long-distance telephone system in the world.

So I think that when people are starving, we ought to stop spending $30,000,000 a year on a useless air mail.

That, however, is not the purpose for which I rose, Mr. President. I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the first decision rendered, so far as I am able to ascertain, by a court in this country on the gold clause of public and private contracts. The decision follows the line of the decision of the highest court in Great Britain in maintaining the validity of these gold clauses. It is a matter that is going to concern the American people very much more seriously and to a larger extent than they seem to be concerned about it now. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent to insert the opinion in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The opinion referred to is as follows:

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of Mar. 11, 1934]

OHIO JUDGE'S DECISION HOLDING IT TAKES $6,000 IN CURRENCY TO PAY $3,600 GOLD OBLIGATION—JURIST CITES BRITISH OPINION IN CONSTRUING PRESENT STATUS OF CONTRACTS REQUIRING GOLD PAYMENTS

COLUMBUS, OHIO, March 10.—A ruling by Judge John R. King, of the court of common pleas, on how a debt contracted to be paid in gold should be satisfied, now that payment in gold is impossible, has attracted wide attention because of its far-reaching implications.

Judge King decided the creditor "under the contract is entitled to have the obligation paid in lawful currency of the United States of America in a sum equal in value to the amount of gold called for in the note."

As a result of the devaluation of gold by President Roosevelt at 59.06 percent of its former value, it now takes $169.30 in national currency to equal in value the amount of gold that formerly was worth only $100 in that currency.

The debt at issue in Judge King's decision was contracted February 3, 1930, when Theodore A. and Edna Freda gave to the Equitable Life Assurance Society of the United States a promissory note for $3,600 with interest at 6 percent a year, payable in monthly installments of $38.67. After default the insurance company sued for a balance due of $3,598.18. The note provided on its face that it was payable "in gold coin of the United States of America of the present standard of weight and fineness."

$6,000 TO PAY $3,600 DEBT

Payment in accordance with the ruling of Judge King would require $6,092 in currency since the President's gold devaluation order of last January 30, under an act of Congress.

The borrowers sought dismissal of the suit on a demurrer, contending that an act of Congress passed March 9, 1933, providing that the Secretary of the Treasury could call in all gold from private owners and providing a penalty for the possession of gold contrary to such order, made it impossible to carry out the terms of the contract without violation of law, and therefore made the contract illegal and unenforceable.

In addition to the act of March 9, Congress passed last June the so-called "Gold Clause Abrogation Act." This act declares that clauses making public and private obligations payable in gold are contrary to public policy and that such obligations may be discharged dollar for dollar in legal tender, and prohibits such clauses in future contracts.

DENIES CONTRACT IS NULLIFIED

Judge King quickly disposed of the contention that the contract was made invalid and unenforceable by the acts of Congress taking gold out of private hands.

"It is urged in brief by defendant," he said, "that the obligation of defendants entered into before the passage of the act of Congress and the orders of the Secretary of the Treasury and the President of the United States is canceled and nullified by the act of Congress; consequently they are not obliged to pay their debts. With this contention we cannot agree."

"Moreover, Congress is without authority to cancel the debt owed by defendants to plaintiff, calling for payment in gold, which contract or obligation at the time it was entered into was in all particulars lawful.

"If defendants were correct, it would amount to the confiscation of plaintiff's property without compensation. The Constitution of the United States would not permit legislation producing such results as contended by defendants."

INTERPRETS CONGRESS' INTENT

After citing Chief Justice Chase as having said: "There are acts which the Federal and State Legislatures cannot do without exceeding their authority", among which he mentioned "a law which punishes a citizen for an innocent action, a law that destroys the lawful, private contracts of citizens, a law that makes a man a judge in his own case, and a law which takes property from A and gives it to B", Judge King continued:

"The inviolability of lawful contractual relationships, both public and private, is an institution in our country, founded by the fathers, which has contributed so largely to the greatness of our country and the prosperity and well-being of its citizenship. No legislative authority should sanction or judicial tribunal tolerate any act that would tend to destroy or weaken our faith in this structure.

"We conclude that the interpretation of the act of Congress by counsel for defendants is wholly unwarranted; that it was not the intention of Congress, nor does the act provide, that contracts lawfully entered into for the payment of gold are invalid and unenforceable. We would be content to conclude with the foregoing observations, but in view of the fact that the act of Congress in question renders at this time the payment of gold impossible, we shall anticipate the inquiry as to the means of payment."

CITES BRITISH DECISION

Continuing, Judge King said the precise question of how the debt was to be paid was answered by the case of Feist v. Societe Intercommunale Belge d'Electricite, decided by the English House of Lords last December 15.

That suit was on a bond which contained a clause providing for payment "in sterling, in gold coin of the United Kingdom of or equal to the standard weight and fineness existing on September 1, 1928."

At the time the suit was instituted the gold standard had been suspended in England. Judge King described the situation as similar to that which exists in the United States, gold not being available for payment of debts. But the plaintiff insisted he was entitled to payment in gold. The British Court of Appeals had held that a bond containing a gold clause could be satisfied by the tender of paper currency in the amount specified in the bond, but the House of Lords reversed this judgment.

LORD RUSSELL'S OPINION

Judge King quoted from the decision of the House of Lords where it was held that the reference to payment in gold was not intended to define merely the mode of payment, but to describe and measure the obligation of the maker of the bond. He quoted Lord Russell of Killowen as saying:

"I would construe clause 1 (the gold clause) not as meaning that £100 is to be paid in a certain way, but as meaning that the obligation is to pay a sum which would represent the equivalent to £100 if paid in a particular way. In other words, I would construe the clause as though it ran thus, 'pay in sterling a sum equal to the value of £100 if paid in gold coin of the United Kingdom, of or equal to the standard of weight and fineness existing on the first day of September 1928.' * * * The treatment of the gold clause as indicating a mere modality of payment without reference to a gold standard of value would be not to construe it, but to destroy it."

Adopting the view of Lord Russell, Judge King concluded:

"The plaintiff in the instant case, under the contract, is entitled to have the obligation paid in lawful currency of the United States of America in a sum equal in value to the amount of gold called for in the note. Any other construction, in our opinion, would destroy the contract."

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. McKELLAR. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DUFFY in the chair). Reports of committees are in order.

Mr. HARRISON, from the Committee on Finance, reported favorably the nominations of sundry officers in the United States Public Health Service.

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reports will be placed on the calendar.

The calendar is in order.

THE JUDICIARY

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Florence E. Allen, of Ohio, to be judge of the United States Circuit Court for the Sixth Circuit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations of postmasters may be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the nominations are confirmed en bloc.

IN THE NAVY AND MARINE CORPS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Navy and in the Marine Corps.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the nominations in the Navy and in the Marine Corps may be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the nominations are confirmed en bloc. That completes the calendar.

RECESS

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, in conformity to the unanimous-consent agreement heretofore entered into, I move that the Senate take a recess until Monday next at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p.m.) the Senate, under the order previously entered, took a recess until Monday, March 19, 1934, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate March 15, 1934

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, MARCH 15, 1934

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Thou who art a loving and a living God, hear us as we wait at the mercy seat of prayer. Bestow upon us the blessing of Thy holy presence. Not only dost Thou fit us for the duties and the emergencies of life, but more than these, Thou art the spring of all moral influences. Each day enable us so to live that our conduct may be helpful and of good report. In many ways may we give wholesome expressions of that fullness of life which comes from the touch of the unseen power. Heavenly Father, allow us not to be satisfied with anything but the highest and the best. Almighty God, be Thou the supreme will in the current of human history, and be the power behind the purpose that sweeps us on, as a great people, to a glorious destiny. In the name of our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House is requested, bills of the House of the following titles:

H.R. 7966. An act to authorize the Postmaster General to accept and use equipment, landing fields, men, and material of the War Department, for carrying the mails by air, and for other purposes;

H.R. 8134. An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture and for the Farm Credit Administration for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes; and

H.R. 8471. An act making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein a telegram from Charles A. Lindbergh to Secretary of War Dern.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. I object.

CORRECTION

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, yesterday afternoon, after we voted on the Senate amendments, on page 4519 of the RECORD, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] made a motion which is exactly as follows, and I got this from the reporter:

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I want to make a preferential motion. I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment and send the bill to the White House.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the motion is not in order.

In the RECORD this morning I find that the gentleman from Texas has added to that "and if a point of order is not made against it, it will be in order." And then he has added 8 or 10 more lines to his motion.

I do not object to anything else, but I do object that when he makes a motion and I make a point of order against it to have him put in remarks different from what actually occurred. I think it was done for a purpose and not for the information of the House. I am not going to ask that it be stricken out, but I want to call the attention of the House to it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, in the hubbub that the gentleman's party makes on that side of the House—

Mr. SNELL. I object to that statement.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not care what the gentleman objects to. In the hubbub that you keep up on that side the reporter cannot hear half of what is going on.

Mr. SNELL. I object to that statement, and I demand the regular order.

Mr. BLANTON. It is a fact. Your party on that side keeps up a continual hubbub.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, was my request granted?

The SPEAKER. It was objected to by the gentleman from Nebraska.

STATE, JUSTICE, JUDICIARY, COMMERCE, AND LABOR DEPARTMENTS APPROPRIATION BILL, 1935

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H.R. 7513, making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice, and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H.R. 7513, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I might say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] that his colleague from New York [Mr. BACON] agrees to this motion.

Mr. SNELL. Then I have no objection to it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Chair appointed the following conferees: Mr. OLIVER of Alabama, Mr. GRIFFIN, Mr. McMILLAN, Mr. WOODRUM, Mr. BACON, and Mrs. KAHN.

COTTON CONTROL BILL

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 8402) to place the cotton industry on a sound commercial basis, to prevent unfair competition and practices in putting cotton into the channels of interstate and foreign commerce, to provide funds for paying additional benefits under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H.R. 8402, with Mr. HILL of Alabama in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GILCHRIST].

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted to say so, I know that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GILCHRIST] has made a considerable study of the legal phases of this question, and I know that he will make a very interesting statement.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, I thank the chairman of the committee [Mr. JONES] for his statement, although I feel there is small justification for it. Because of his suggestion I hope during the course of my remarks to say something concerning the legality of the bill.

This is the cotton bill which we have before us. I live in Iowa and represent a district which I suppose raises as much corn as any district in the United States, but I have been very greatly interested in the cotton situation. I come from the cornfields of Iowa, with an intention of extending a helping hand, and one vote to the cotton fields of the South. The suggestion has been made there is politics in this thing. There is not, and there ought not to be. The agricultural people of the whole country, East and West, South and North, are interested in the welfare of every single farmer, and they ought to join together in supporting the interests of all of the farmers. When they do that they are supporting the interests of every man engaged in commerce and carriage and trade and industry, because, until we lift up agriculture—a basic industry—from the slough of despair which it is in, we will never come to a recovery of our economic balances. So I regret the suggestion that there is politics in this bill. There should not be, and there really is not.

I was interested in the statements that were made about this bill by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. He is a great character, a most lovable gentleman, and a great patriot and statesman. During this discussion it has been suggested that he may be a candidate for a high office. Let me say to my Democratic friends on my right that we could go farther and fare worse than to accept him as a personality who will lend great ability and respect to that first office.

There are many things in this bill, as there are in other bills, that I do not like. I think agriculture can recover if we have something like the Frazier bill, or, if we can give our farmers something like the cost of production, but we are not going to get these things now—at least we are not going to get them at this session, in my judgment. So, therefore, we farmers will have to take what we can get.

The first suggestion I make is that we lay aside all of our abstractions and our scientific speculations and discover whether there is a necessity for this bill. The people of the South demand it. They have been in great economic distress and want down there. They say this bill will save them from a situation which they fear is right upon them, which is imminent, and if it will do that, let us give it to them. If you make inquiry as to whether there is a practical demand for this thing, you will find that there is. A real cross section of the cotton people of the South was taken in order to give voice to this question, and 95 percent of them are for this bill. Furthermore, I think 90 percent of those who represent cotton on this floor are for this bill. From what I can learn it is a necessity to these folks and will do what it is claimed for it in helping them.

The present law already on our statute books will not accomplish the thing, and why? Because there are scabs. I do not care whether it be in labor circles or anywhere else, I detest a scab, I detest a chiseler—a man who is not willing to go along with his neighbors for the benefit of the industry to which he belongs and in which he expects to make a living for himself and wife and family. The chiseler expects to get a little selfish personal advantage by being what the labor men call a "damned scab." And that is what is behind this bill. That is why it is necessary to have a little more of what my friends on this side have called "regimentation." Because it has been shown that a humber of the folks down there who raise cotton are scabs and chiselers, and it requires this bill to do away with an evil which ought to be done away with. So much for that.

Gentlemen here have stood on the floor, and my eminent friend from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] has joined them, and lamented the fact that we had killed a lot of pigs in carrying out the idea of restricting production.

He indicated that we had destroyed wealth. We have not destroyed wealth. What is wealth? Wealth is a thing which is valuable and is demanded at the place where it exists. Ice in Greenland is not wealth. Water at the mouth of the Orinoco River is not wealth; but if you could get water over in the Sahara Desert, then you would have it at a place where it would accomplish a useful purpose to mankind, and it would be in demand and it would then and there constitute real wealth.

When the proposition of disposing of the pigs came up, we learned that there was a prospect of 45,000,000 pigs this year. At the very height of our prosperity, when men were earning the highest wages they ever earned, and everybody had a job and an income, and when everybody was buying pork products, we used domestically only 37,000,000 head of hogs. Furthermore, our foreign market had fallen from 10,000,000 head yearly to 4,000,000 head, so that it was plain that something had to be done, and the Secretary proceeded to do it. We were not destroying wealth any more than the gentleman from New York is destroying wealth when he kills the male calves which come into his dairy herd. Such calves are not then and there useful; there is no demand for them; they have no sale value; they are not wealth; they are a menace to the industry. So my friend destroys them.

I remember the first time I heard mentioned this proposition about the lesser crop bringing a higher aggregate value. It came to my notice in a lecture by Governor Lowden, of Illinois. I heard him before the Legislature of the State of Iowa, and his proposition was that the smaller crop oftentimes sold for a greater aggregate value. I remember the peroration with which he closed his lecture, in which he told how, as a farm boy, he laid out under the roof, up against the attic on an Iowa farm and listened to the rain, and he thanked God for rain, because he knew it would fructify the fields. But when he grew into manhood and studied the statistics he had come to the conclusion that there was doubt about it and he did not know whether to pray for rain or to thank God for the drought. That is the situation we have regarding many of these crops. There must be some way of preventing or controlling any surplus which becomes a menace to an industry. That is all this bill proposes to do. It is a thing that must be done in all industries. If there is some regimentation in it, it is no more than now exists with regard to other things we are doing in this country.

My friend from Minnesota said something about socialism. Why, bless your heart, is not the R.F.C. socialistic? Is not the Reconstruction Finance Corporation socialistic in stepping into the channels of trade and extending Government credit to banks and insurance companies and railroads? I am not here finding fault with it. But it is a socialistic measure, and I say to you that something of this kind had been shown to be necessary in this country.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILCHRIST. I yield for a brief question.

Mr. MAY. I am very much inclined to support this bill, if I can, but I am disturbed about the constitutionality of that part of the bill that authorizes two thirds of the farmers concerned, under regulations by the Secretary of Agriculture, to say whether or not the other one third shall enjoy their property.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Upon that proposition I do not admit the premises involved in question, but I refer the gentleman to the brief filed in connection with that question at page 3966 of the RECORD of March 8.

Mr. MAY. I have read that brief three times very carefully, and I find that it deals particularly with the question of the power of the Federal Government on the subject of taxation, but it does not deal to any extent with the other question.

Mr. GILCHRIST. With the delegation of power?

Mr. MAY. Not that. The question of due process of law involved in the right of two thirds of any group of people to have the right to say what the other one third shall do with their property.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Under the bill they do not. Every man can raise all of the cotton he desires. The theory of the bill is that all cotton is taxed, but that certain exemptions are allowed. There is no referendum in the strict meaning of that word, but when the Secretary finds that two thirds of the persons interested in growing cotton favor a levy of a tax on cotton in excess of an allotment, then the Secretary ascertains something. He ascertains the quantity of cotton that shall be allotted and he proclaims such an allotment. If he does not proclaim such an allotment, then the tax is not imposed, neither is it imposed upon the allotted cotton.

I hope the chairman of our committee will answer the gentleman's question more specifically.

Now, since the gentleman has mentioned it and the chairman has suggested it, I will give my idea of the law on this question. It is a bold man who in this month of March 1934 can claim to know just how the Constitution will prevent the enforcement of any given piece of remedial congressional or legislative action. No man, however familiar he may be with the precedents and decisions of our courts, can at this time claim infallibility respecting constitutional interpretation, nor can he claim to know just how far the Supreme Court will go in upholding or denouncing legislative enactment.

I cannot, of course, take much time to argue the constitutionality of this legislation, but if I were going to do that, I would not go back through a century of legal construction. I would not cite the decisions back through the generations since our Supreme Court was founded; but I would content myself with those principles of interpretation which the Supreme Court has announced within the past 2 months. I would plant myself on the actualities of the present and I would propose to your consideration three decisions just now handed down, two of which I believe to be epochal and one of which is a restatement of prior law in a very succinct and striking way.

We have the decision of January 1934 wherein the Supreme Court upheld the Minnesota moratorium statute as a valid exercise of the police power of the State to meet an economic emergency, and declared that it was not invalid on the ground that it denied equal protection of the law or due process, nor upon the ground that it impaired the obligation of the contract. The Court set new bounds, approved progressive principles, and declared that, in addition to the power reserved to the States to control remedial processes, there was given also to each State a more fundamental power which was always reserved unto the States, being the power to safeguard the vital interests of the people. I quote the following language:

This principle of harmonizing the constitutional prohibition with the necessary residuum of State power has had progressive recognition in the decisions of this Court.

I also quote:

There has been a growing appreciation of public needs and of the necessity of finding ground for a rational compromise between individual rights and public welfare.

It denied that the great clauses of the Constitution must be confined to the interpretation which the framers would have placed upon them, and said that the Constitution was intended to endure for ages to come, and consequently was to be adapted to the various crises of human affairs. And again I quote a statement in reference to the impairment-of-contract clause:

With a growing recognition of public needs and the relation of individual right to public security, the Court has sought to prevent the perversion of the clause through its use as an instrument to throttle the capacity of the States to protect their fundamental interests.

Now, if this language means anything, it seems to me to mean that we are not bound by dead and worn-out conceptions of constitutional interpretation, but, on the contrary, that there is a growing recognition of public needs, a growing appreciation of the requirements of society, and consequently a growing necessity for finding ground for a rational compromise between individual rights and public welfare. It means that the Court is ready to protect and uphold this growing appreciation of public needs, this necessity of finding a new and rational compromise between individual rights, on the one hand, and of public welfare, on the other, and to prevent perversion of the Constitution in order to throttle the right of society to protect its fundamental interests.

Again I would cite the New York milk case handed down about 2 weeks ago. Last April Leo Neebia sold two bottles of milk and a loaf of bread at the bargain price of 18 cents in defiance of a new State law, which declared that the minimum price of milk should be 9 cents per quart. Leo devised a neat plan for getting around this rule. He figured that the loaf of bread that went with the 2 quarts of milk for 18 cents was merely a gift or premium. But the Supreme Court denounced his scheme, holding that the New York statute had a reasonable relation to proper legislative purposes, and was neither arbitrary nor discriminatory, and said:

Under our form of Government, the use of property and the making of contracts are normally matters of private and not of public concern. The general rule is that both shall be free of governmental interference. But neither property rights nor contract rights are absolute; for government cannot exist if the citizen may at will use his property to the detriment of his fellows, or exercise his freedom of contract to work them harm.

Equally fundamental with the private right is that of the public to regulate it in the common interest.

The milk industry in New York has been the subject of long-standing and drastic regulation in the public interest. The legislative investigation of 1932 was persuasive of the fact that for this and other reasons unrestricted competition aggravated existing evils and the normal law of supply and demand was insufficient to correct maladjustments detrimental to the community. The inquiry disclosed destructive and demoralizing competitive conditions and unfair trade practices which resulted in retail-price cutting and reduced the income of the farmer below the cost of production.

While these decisions relate to State statutes, yet the same reasoning must be applied to Federal statutes; and in construing them we must believe that neither property rights nor contract rights are absolute; that right of the Government to exist is paramount; and that the Government cannot exist if the citizen uses his property to the detriment of his fellows or exercise his freedom of contract so as to menace society.

In addition, I will speak of the teamsters' decision from New York City handed down February 5 of this year and say that we oftentimes have a misconception regarding our rights over interstate commerce, and declare with the Supreme Court that—

The control of the handling, the sales, and the prices at the place of origin before the interstate journey begins, or in the State of destination, where the interstate movement ends, may operate directly to restrain and monopolize interstate commerce.

And we have the right to prevent such restraint and such monopolization. In this case the courts interfered and enforced Federal statutes against acts which appellants had done after the interstate carriage had been completed, which acts regarded the unloading, the transportation, the sales by marketmen to retailers, the price charged, and the amount of profits exacted, because these things operated substantially and directly to restrain and burden the untrammelled shipment and movement of poultry while unquestionably it was yet in interstate commerce.

Mr. Chairman, a dam can back water far up the course of the stream, and injure and stop the flow from the land of an upper proprietor and such upper proprietor will have his remedy. Just so there can be practices within the State which prevent the flow of goods into interstate commerce and Congress may give relief, both in declaring, as does this bill, that there is a public necessity and that there exists a public calamity which should be remedied; but we may also promote the orderly marketing of cotton in interstate and foreign commerce, and we may prevent unfair competition and practices therein by the provision of this bill. These decisions and the logic behind them add new horizons to constitutional construction and point out the way whereby the Constitution will be made to serve humanity and whereby the administration of this Republic will be restored to the people and be administered by the people and for the people throughout the ages of progress that lie before us in humanity, equity, and righteousness.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Record a radio address by R. M. Evans, who is chairman of the corn-hog committee in Iowa.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, under leave to extend my remarks in the Record, I include the following radio talk by R. M. Evans, chairman of the Iowa Corn-Hog Committee from Chicago, January 29, 1934:

My friends, it is hardly necessary to go into great detail about the necessity for readjustment of agricultural prices. The mortgage-foreclosure records in every county courthouse throughout the farming sections are grim evidence of the results of low farm prices. During this depression those of us who are actively engaged in the agricultural business have watched our friends, our neighbors, and even the members of our immediate families, lose their farms and homes and all they have strived to set aside for old age.

Not only the farmer suffered from low agricultural prices, but also the capital and labor invested in all lines of business were hard hit. Restricted production, unemployment, and reduced pay rolls for those who did work resulted in all lines of business because farmer purchasing power was so low, farmers could not buy the products of other lines of business. Unemployment brought poverty and starvation amidst abundance of food products.

The agricultural industry is different in many respects from other manufacturing or processing industries. Take, for example, an automobile-manufacturing plant—if the plant has a maximum capacity of 10,000 cars a week, its manager is willing to buy raw materials and employ labor necessary to manufacture 10,000 cars per week just as long as you and I, as customers for his products, will pay him a fair price. The auto manufacturer watches the demand for cars closely; and just as soon as he sees signs of a diminishing demand, he reduces his production to avoid building automobiles which cannot be marketed at a fair price. The auto manufacturer long ago learned that you cannot continue producing at a loss without becoming bankrupt. Why should a farmer exhaust the fertility of his soil, wear out his machinery and farming equipment, taking no account of his own labor, in order to produce a product for which there is no profitable sale? The rapid exhaustion of the fertility of our agricultural land is a serious menace to the future prosperity of America. Our agricultural industry, consisting of millions of individual farms, has been forced to the verge of bankruptcy by continuing to produce farm products and sell them at a loss. In no branch of agriculture is this clearer than in the production of corn and hogs.

Normally an auto manufacturer whose demand diminished would organize a gigantic sales campaign to induce people to buy and use more automobiles. While a campaign of this type might help the producers of corn and hogs, there is one fundamental difference between agriculture and all other industries. If you have the money and the desire, there is scarcely any limit to your ability to consume many units of such products as clothing, automobiles, books, etc. But regardless of your incomes or desire, you cannot materially increase your per capita consumption of food. Your body will consume just about so much food, and no more.

In addition to the practical difficulty of increasing domestic consumption of corn and hogs due to the inherent nature of the products just pointed out, foreign consumption of these products has been materially decreased by the foreign-tariff walls accompanying the change in the position of the United States in international trade from that of a debtor nation settling international balances by our agricultural exports to that of a creditor nation to whom other nations must ship products in competition with our domestic goods.

For the past 14 years we farmers have been nailed to the cross of declining prices for our products by our own surplus production. Every time we demanded action we were met with the answer that the law of supply and demand governs prices and no Government action could tamper with it successfully, even if necessary to enable us to continue in business. Congress last spring recognized that at least a start had to be made toward some definite result to meet the emergency then existing and passed the Agricultural Adjustment Act. This law permits farmers to enforce the law of supply and demand by cooperative contracts adjusting production of farm products to meet the demand which will pay a reasonable price.

When the Committee of Twenty-five met in Chicago last summer, we found that in the United States in the years 1922-26 we consumed, on the average, 37,000,000 head of hogs and exported 10,000,000 head. During those years labor was universally employed at good wages, and it was fair to assume that the people of the United States were financially able to purchase and consume all the pork products they desired. The estimate for the hog crop of 1933 indicated we would have about 48,000,000 head of hogs for slaughter at federally inspected plants. Our exports had diminished for reasons already given to around 4,000,000 head, leaving about 44,000,000 head of hogs to be sold on a market that only consumed 37,000,000 head of hogs when everyone was gainfully employed.

In addition, our 1933 corn crop was soon to be marketed. The method for securing an adjustment of the supply of corn and hogs to the demand adopted to meet this situation falls into two phases:

First. The emergency program carried through during the past fall and winter, and Second. The corn-acreage-reduction and hog-reduction program to be in force in the crop year of 1934. The first part of the emergency program, involving the removal from the domestic market of about 8,000,000 head of hogs, was accomplished by the purchase and slaughter of pigs and brood sows and the purchase of pork products to be used in feeding the unemployed. We evolved the 45-cent corn-loan plan to save the corn crop of 1933 from being forced on the market from our farmer producers at the ruinously low prices prevailing during the fall and winter of 1932. At first there was some criticism that the 45-cent corn loans only took care of the corn farmers. However, every farmer who signs the corn-hog-reduction contract now available will receive adjusted payments that will bring the price of his hogs sold in 1933 to approximately 4½ cents per pound, which figure is in line with 45-cent corn. Also the fall pigs of 1933 and the hogs raised in 1934 are protected against a low price by the 45-cent corn-loan plan and the corn-hog-reduction program.

Every practical feeder knows that the price of corn governs the price of livestock. A man who produces 1,000 bushels of corn can sell it at the nearest elevator; but he will convert it into beef, pork, milk, or other products if by so doing he thinks he will receive a better price.

If the farmers cooperate and by reducing their acreage of corn make it possible for a farmer to pay his operating and living expenses from the sale of his corn, a great many farmers will, in the future as they usually have in the past, sell part of their corn for cash. But when the farmer cannot pay these expenses by the sale of his corn, he is forced to take the chance of converting it into livestock in the hope of thus securing a better price for the corn.

The overproduction of meat products we have witnessed just recently is partly due to the practical operation of this principle. When the price of corn is relatively high, the feeding business is left in the hands of those who by training and experience are best able to handle it. The same line of reasoning holds equally true in the dairy business. When the average farmer in the Corn Belt is getting along fairly well, he does not milk many cows; but when he is hard up, he increases his dairy production in order to pay his current expenses. Today people are milking cows who never did so before and who will not continue to do so as soon as they can make money out of corn and hogs, because these are the products they are best equipped to produce. For this reason a better price for corn will ultimately work to the advantage of eastern dairy farmers.

The plan for the year 1934 contemplates an acreage reduction for corn of between 20 and 30 percent and a corresponding reduction of 25 percent in the number of hogs produced and sold. The educational work necessary to give every farmer an understanding of why a reduction program had to be adopted has been completed in almost every section of the Corn Belt, and the actual sign-up has been started. In Iowa we believe that over 90 percent of the farmers will cooperate to secure reduced production and a higher price for corn and hogs, because they realize that only through a plan of this kind can they avoid a return to the bankrupt prices of 1932. Today farmers are at the fork in the road; and until such time as our foreign markets return or another use is found for our products, I am confident they will take the road of controlled production and a parity price instead of the bumpy road of uncontrolled production leading to 10- and 15-cent corn and 2-cent hogs. I do not know just what the attitude of farmers will be toward those who stay outside the program and increase their production, thereby chiseling and gaining for themselves a selfish advantage at the expense of their neighbors; but from the comments of farmers over Iowa with whom I have spoken recently and who have had enough depression to suit them for one generation, I know that these chiselers will not be popular. Indeed, it will not surprise me if they are subjected to community discipline at shelling and threshing time.

The expenses of this reduction campaign are to be paid for by a processing tax. The term is a new one, and many people do not have the correct understanding of just what a processing tax is. Ever since the first protective tariff was adopted in the United States, the American farmer has been paying more for the products he purchased than he would have had to pay for these products if he purchased them in the open markets of the world. The farmers have cheerfully paid these increased prices because they wanted American labor to receive higher wages and live on a higher plane than people engaged in similar enterprises who live in foreign countries. In a congressional debate which took place when the protective-tariff policy was first adopted in the United States, some of those responsible for the adoption of the tariff recognized that the American farmers would have to pay higher prices for the things they purchased, and called the attention of the people at that time to this fact, adding that the time might come when the farmers would have to be protected in a similar manner. That time has now arrived, and we are asking those who purchase our products to pay us a higher price for them in order that we may maintain an American standard of living in the agricultural sections of the United States.

It may seem a long step from the corn-hog program as it benefits an Iowa farmer to the home of the clerk of the city department store who is listening to this broadcast, but there is a very definite relationship. I live in a strictly agricultural section, and business is already showing the effects of the increased price for corn. The merchant in my town told me a few days ago that when he closed his business on the evening of January 13, 1934, he had transacted 20 percent more business during the 13 days of January 1934 than he had transacted during the entire month of January 1933. This means that he will have to replace the goods he has sold by purchase from the wholesaler and manufacturer. Slowly but surely, as the agricultural adjustment program gets into full swing and conditions in the Middle West improve, manufacturing will be resumed, transportation will pick up, employment will increase, and the whole business machine will start moving with revived vigor. Business men as a whole recognize this fact, and we are receiving splendid cooperation from them in the campaign to sign up corn-hog-reduction contracts.

President Roosevelt and Secretary of Agriculture Wallace have what we commonly term the headache and the backache knowledge of the agricultural industry. With support of this kind the Corn Belt farmers will go forward and by their united efforts make this pioneering effort in production control as great a success as the pioneering effort of our forefathers a generation or two ago.

Farmers tilled the soil to make possible the food every individual within range of my voice enjoyed tonight; farmers tended the fields and flocks from which the raw materials came to clothe this Nation today; farmers served our common cause in every war with life and toil; farmers raised their families under our common constitutional guaranty of equality of opportunity; farmers seek no more than an American standard of living for their families and selves; farmers will put over the corn-hog program as their bit in this war against depression.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, will be gentleman yield?

Mr. GILCHRIST. I yield.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. In behalf of the friends of this legislation, I want to thank the gentleman for the very informing and interesting speech which he has just made. I wish to ask him if at that part of his speech where he discusses the legal phase of the question he will not insert an excerpt, just two paragraphs, of the milk decision which I think upholds the opinion of the gentleman as to the legality of the bill?

Mr. GILCHRIST. I shall be very glad to incorporate the excerpt in my remarks if the gentleman will give me the manuscript, and I thank him for his helpful suggestion. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ARENS].

Mr. ARENS. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, I shall vote for the Bankhead cotton bill.

In my association with farm organizations I have adopted as my motto to put myself in the position where my fellow man can work with me. Some years ago I was sent to Washington to lobby for a bill in behalf of the farmers. It makes me laugh to think of it. I came here to lobby for the Coulter bill appropriating $50,000,000 to put dairy cattle into North Dakota. It was the occasion of the diversification of agriculture. When I went home and was asked to report, I told the farmers that I was sorry but we were not going to get what we asked for in Washington because there was no teamwork; the farmers were not working together. The farmers of the South at that time were trying to get the Government to operate Muscle Shoals that they might get cheap fertilizer and cheap electricity; certain representatives of the woolgrowers wanted the truth-in-fabrics bill; we wanted this bill. But our farmers of the Northwest were represented by Republicans who would not think of the Government operating Muscle Shoals in behalf of the farmers of the South; and the farmers of the South were not ready to support a bill to assist our dairying industry. None of them wanted to help the woolgrowers. There was no teamwork. The result was that none of us got what we went after.

We hear much talk about regimentation. Is it not about time our farm organizations over the United States got together and worked together as one unit? Is it not about time our little farm organizations, each of which has but one selfish purpose, that of getting what they want, got together into one regiment, into one unit all over the United States? Just think of 7,000,000 farmers voting as one and working as one! Why, they could get anything and everything they wished.

Talk about regimentation! I think it is time we got together. They tell us we are giving up our liberty. Yes; we have had the liberty of raising any crop we wished, as much thereof as we wished, and to market it at any time, in any shape we wished. What is the result? We have had to give the sheriff the liberty of selling our homes from under us.

In Denmark the Government stepped in quite a while ago. There the Government tells the farmers how many pigs they may raise. The result is they do not have to kill off any surplus. The Government furnishes to the farmers the herd sire; it tell them what breed they may raise. The Government builds packing plants in Denmark and tells the farmer where he must deliver his hogs. The Government field men go to the farmers and tell them when to market their hogs. When their hogs weigh between 175 and 195 pounds they must be delivered.

What is the result of the Government program in Denmark? The result is that they have built up a uniform quality of hogs, fine white bacon hogs. They have conquered the pork market in England. The English people eat only the nice bacon produced in Denmark.

The Danish farmer is today receiving from 7 to 10 cents a pound more for this nice, white Danish bacon than he did before the Government exerted its influence, and that much more than we are receiving for our bacon.

Is it not a nice thing for the Danish farmer to trade off just a little of his liberty for prosperity on the farm? Is it not nice to trade off a little liberty and receive from 7 to 10 cents a pound more for pork? Let me assure you the Danish farmer is glad to give up a part of his liberty and is not willing to trade back.

Yes; we are to be regimented. I suspect that we in our section will want help from the farmers of the Cotton Belt to keep our sugar industry from being restricted.

We want the 100 Representatives from the Cotton Belt here in Congress to help us put across the Lemke bill. We all want to help the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE] to pass his bill regulating the direct buying of livestock by the packers.

I want every Representative of an agricultural section to vote for my resolution to investigate the manufacturing, sale, and distribution of agricultural machinery and implements. In order to be fair and get the support of Congressmen from the Cotton Belt, we should support reasonable measures affecting their welfare.

We are told that this is the beginning or the wedge of the Agricultural Department to regimentize, to sovietize the whole of agriculture. I am not afraid. We dairy people are not yet producing any more dairy products than our country consumes in normal times, and we do not need this legislation, and I would be against this measure applying to our section.

However, when we find ourselves in a position like the cotton farmer, who produces on the average a 40-percent surplus and thereby forces the price down to one third of the cost of production, we, too, will be down here in Washington willing to give up some of our liberties if thereby we can get cost of production plus a small profit for the products involved.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 8 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MOTT].

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, this bill, known as the "Bankhead bill", provides for compulsory crop reduction of a particular farm commodity in a particular section of the United States.

Although it may be called local in character, the theory of the bill is such that, once it is enacted into law, this legislation can, and probably will, be expanded by amendment to include all agricultural commodities and all sections of the country. For, if the principle of the bill is right, then it is a good bill, not only for the cotton farmer, but for the wheat and the corn and the hog farmer as well. If the principle is wrong then it should not be applied to any agricultural commodity.

My objection to this legislation is twofold. First, I believe the principal of compulsory crop reduction is wrong; and secondly, I object to it because it is makeshift legislation. In my opinion, it is but another shot in the dark. It is but another attempt to solve a part of the farm-relief problem by the method of trial and error. It is just another one of those bills about which the best that can be said of it is that "if it does not work, we will try something else."

Mr. Chairman, when is the Congress going to cease experimenting and tinkering with the farm problem and get down to the serious business of enacting permanent farm-relief legislation, such as that embraced in the Frazier farm-mortgage refinancing bill and the Swank-Thomas cost of production bill?

Both the Frazier bill and the Swank-Thomas bill are on the Clerk's desk with motions to discharge the Agricultural Committee from further consideration of them, and to bring them out here on the floor for a vote. The Frazier bill motion has now more than 100 signatures of the 145 necessary to discharge the committee.

Both of these bills will be brought out sooner or later, and I believe the Frazier bill is going to be voted on this session. And when you pass these bills, then you will not need any compulsory crop reduction laws, either for cotton or anything else, because the legislation embraced in these two measures constitutes a complete and permanent solution of the whole farm problem.

I think this is an opportune time to discuss these measures, particularly the Frazier farm-mortgage refinancing bill, and I intend to devote the major portion of the time allotted to me for that purpose. Before doing that, however, I should like to point out very briefly what I believe to be the principal fallacy and danger of the bill now under consideration, the Bankhead bill. I shall then return to the Frazier bill.

The Bankhead bill proposes to grant to the Secretary of Agriculture the autocratic authority to compel every cotton farmer in the Southern States to reduce his acreage by whatever amount the Secretary may, by order, decree. The farmer must not only reduce his acreage, but he must also reduce the number of bales of cotton raised and sold to whatever maximum the Secretary may order.

The Secretary of Agriculture is given power to say, also, what kind of crops the farmer shall raise on that part of his land which he is compelled to take out of cotton production.

In other words, this bill takes the control of the farmer's land and crops out of the hands of the farmer and places it in the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture.

In order to enforce the law this bill provides that if any farmer raises and sells more cotton than the Secretary allows him to he shall be fined 50 percent of the sales price of all cotton sold over his allotment.

In addition to this, the Secretary is empowered to make rules and regulations which shall have the force of law, and to punish any farmer who violates them by fine and imprisonment. This is what the proponents of the Bankhead bill refer to as "the teeth of this legislation."

Now, Mr. Chairman, the people of my State are not directly interested in this bill, because I come from a State which produces no cotton. The State of Oregon, however, produces almost every other agricultural commodity that can be raised in the Temperate Zone, except cotton. The distinguished gentleman from Iowa, whose State likewise produces no cotton, but who so ably discussed this measure a few minutes ago, said that in such circumstances it would be a bold man, indeed, who would have the temerity to oppose this legislation.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GILCHRIST. I did not make that suggestion. I said it was a bold man who should attempt in March 1934 to interpret the Constitution, in view of the last three or four decisions of the Supreme Court. That is all I said.

Mr. MOTT. Probably I misunderstood the gentleman from Iowa, but that is the interpretation I received. I thought he suggested that it required boldness to object to legislation of this kind on constitutional grounds. But whether it requires any boldness or not, I do object to it, and the question of its constitutionality happens to be one of the grounds of my objection.

At any rate, Mr. Chairman, it has been suggested by other gentlemen who have spoken on this bill today that it is not greatly the concern of those who live in other parts of the country what method the people in the cotton States may use to regulate the production of their own commodities.

At first blush it may seem rather presumptuous on my part, or on the part of any Member from the North or West, to go out of his way to oppose this bill, particularly inasmuch as it has been repeatedly stated here that the people of the South are in favor of this kind of legislation. And if I thought the people of the cotton States really wanted this bill, and if I were sure that the legislation, being once enacted, would not be spread to other parts of the country and would not ultimately embrace all other commodities, then I would have no great objection to it.

But, Mr. Chairman, I am not at all sure, in the first place, that the people of the South want this bill, and I say this notwithstanding the statements to the contrary that have been made during the progress of this debate.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. ALLGOOD. The secretary of agriculture of Birmingham, Ala., was present at a meeting at which 6,000 farmers from every county in the State of Alabama were present, and they voted on this question, as to whether or not they wanted this control.

Mr. MOTT. They voted for control, certainly—for voluntary control. Nobody objects to that. But they never voted for compulsory crop reduction, with a penalty of fine and imprisonment for raising one bale of cotton more than their allotment allowed. That is the provision of this bill, and the bill was not even drafted when the meeting at Birmingham was held.

Now, I cannot yield to the gentleman for a speech on this point. My time is limited, and I cannot discuss it further myself. I only say that I have listened most carefully to the debate and that I have not been able to detect any real evidence of the demand, even in the South, in anything that has been said here.

But the serious objection I have to this legislation is that if this bill is enacted into law the fundamental principle behind the bill can logically be urged for every other section of the country, and that it will finally take in all other agricultural commodities.

And why not? If you say now that it is right to control cotton production by force of confiscation, fine, and imprisonment, what are you going to say when you are asked to vote the same kind of control for wheat?

We all know what the ideas of the Secretary of Agriculture and of Professor Tugwell, the Assistant Secretary, are in this regard. We have heard Professor Tugwell's words quoted here in debate upon the floor of the House. He is quoted as adhering to the principle of compulsory crop control for all farm commodities. And if that is to be even the remote program of the Agricultural Department, then I say that it is time for the farmers of the country, no matter where they live or what commodities they raise, to take heed of the principle laid down in this bill. For if this is simply the entering wedge, and if the principle of compulsory crop control is applied in the future to other commodities and to other sections of the country, then it will mean the end of all hope of economic freedom so far as the farmer is concerned.

So far as I am concerned, I am not willing by my vote to have the precedent of compulsory crop reduction, with a penalty of fine and imprisonment for violation, set up in any part of the United States.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOTT. If the gentleman from Minnesota will pardon me, I would rather not yield at this time. I only have a few minutes remaining, and I should like to resume my discussion of the Frazier bill now. When I finish that I shall be glad to yield.

Let me repeat, Mr. Chairman, what I said a moment ago. If we pass the Frazier and the Swank bills, we shall not need any compulsory crop-reduction law, either for cotton or any other farm commodity, because compulsory crop reduction is neither a necessary nor a desirable part of any comprehensive solution to the farm problem.

What is the real problem which confronts agriculture at the present time? What are the things which must be done if agriculture is to be restored to its rightful and necessary place in our national economic structure?

Whatever else is done, there are two fundamental things which must be accomplished, and without which the problem cannot be solved:

First, a feasible way must be found to enable the farmer to lift from his shoulders the impossible mortgage debt under which he is now staggering.

Second, a rational scheme must be evolved and put into operation under which the farmer may be assured of receiving the cost of production, plus a reasonable profit, on that part of his commodities which are consumed in the United States.

If these two things are accomplished, the farmer has a chance. If they are not, then neither the agricultural population nor the rest of the population of the country can progress.

There are 6,000,000 farm families in the United States, or about 30,000,000 people directly engaged in or dependent for their livelihood on agriculture. This constitutes a third of our total population. This part of our population, to a large extent, now hold their farms through the sufferance of those to whom they have given mortgages and whose mortgages they cannot pay.

They are without purchasing power, and have been for the past several years. Their purchasing power is decreasing instead of increasing. Unless they can be given a new lease on life, not only will their own future be a hopeless one but the future of every other industry will likewise be hopeless. For you cannot deprive a third of the population of this country of their buying power without permanently injuring the whole population.

That is the reason why these two things must be done. The recovery of the farmer has become a national necessity. The prosperity and security which we propose to bring to agriculture through the Frazier bill and the Swank-Thomas bill are not for the benefit of the farmer alone. They are for the benefit of the whole Nation. And therefore their speedy enactment by Congress has become the concern of the whole Nation.

Now, what is the Frazier bill? It is a comprehensive, carefully worked out national plan for permanently lifting the farmer out of his present state of insolvency through the refinancing by the Federal Government of all farm mortgages at a rate of interest which the farmer can afford to pay.

The Frazier bill undertakes to refinance these mortgages at the rate of 1½ percent per year, to be applied on interest, and 1½ percent to be applied on principal, the entire loan to be amortized over a period of 47 years.

As security for these loans the Government takes the farm mortgages themselves. Upon these mortgages farm-loan bonds are issued. These bonds are not sold to the public, but are held by the United States Treasury as the basis and security for a new issue of money with which the refinancing is done.

The total amount of the new money required to be issued upon this basis is $2,000,000,000. And the provisions of the bill for the annual payments on these mortgages and the consequent retirement of the bonds and the currency issued thereon are such that a greater amount than two billion will never have to be outstanding at any one time.

This refinancing obviously will not cost the Government anything. As a matter of fact, it has been conclusively demonstrated that the Government will make a profit on it. The refinancing is not a gift; it is a loan; it is a loan of credit to the agricultural industry; and it is a loan based upon the soundest and the best security that any government can have—the land of the Nation itself.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what are the objections that have been raised against the Frazier bill? And who are they who have raised them?

Three principal objections have been heard. The first is that the rate of interest proposed to be charged is too low. The second is that the Government should not loan its credit to the farmer because that would be preferring him to other classes of citizens. And the third objection, and the one that has been loudest, is that the money proposed to be issued would be fiat money and would constitute uncontrolled inflation.

Let me try to answer these objections in the order I have named them.

In answer to the contention that the rate of interest proposed is too low, it is only necessary to observe that a total rate of 3 percent is all that the farmer can afford to pay. One of the principal reasons for the farmer's present financial plight is that he cannot pay the rate of interest he is now being charged either by the private lender or the Government. And unless you lend to the farmer at a rate of interest he can pay, then the lending does neither the farmer nor the Government any good.

In further answer let me say that the Government has already financed other industry, including banks, railroads, and financial institutions, at a rate of interest in many cases no higher than this. It has also financed foreign governments with the people's money at a rate even lower. On most of these foreign loans the Government has cut down the principal to almost nothing, and few of us expect that we will get back even that.

The interest provided in the Frazier bill is necessarily low. The situation in which the farmer finds himself requires it to be low. But it is sufficient, and it has this all-important and sufficient feature—and that is that the farmer can and will repay it.

The objection that the Government would be preferring farmers to other classes of citizens by extending its credit to them has been sufficiently answered by showing that the Government has already extended its credit to almost every other form of industry and that it is now extending its credit to farmers under the various existing farm-loan laws.

Furthermore, the Government has been loaning its credit to national banks, all of which are privately owned, for a hundred years. And it has been loaning this credit to the banks free. It allows the banks even to issue money on the credit of the Government.

Why this objection still persists I do not know, unless, like most of the other objections, it is usually raised by persons who have never given the farm problem any serious legitimate thought. They do not seem to realize that this is not a farm problem alone, but a national one, and that there can be no real recovery for anyone until the farmers again own their farms and have money with which to buy the products and services of other industries.

I now come to the third objection, that the money proposed to be issued is fiat money and that its issuance would be uncontrolled inflation.

The money to be issued under the Frazier bill is not fiat money. It is exactly the same kind of money which we are now using. Here again the objection comes mostly from well-intentioned but shallow thinkers who have not taken the trouble to learn what our money is or upon what security it is based.

We have three kinds of money in circulation at the present time, and only three. For it must be remembered not only that none of our money is any longer redeemable in gold or silver, but that gold itself is not money. Under the recent gold bill it is unlawful even to possess gold, and no gold may be coined into money.

Our everyday money consists of Government notes, silver certificates, and bank notes—and nothing else. A Government note is a piece of paper on which is printed the denomination of the bill with the statement that the United States will pay the note on demand. Since it is unlawful for the Government to pay the note in gold or silver this note, if presented for payment, could be paid only by another like note, by a bank note, or by a silver certificate.

In other words, although the Government has a large reserve of gold, which it is not allowed under the law to use as money, a Government note is secured solely and simply by the credit of the Government. Yet no one has ever thought of calling a Government note fiat money.

A silver certificate is a piece of paper (usually of the denomination of $1) upon which is printed the statement that there has been deposited in the Treasury one silver dollar. The certificate is not payable in silver, or in anything else, and the actual value of the silver dollar that is deposited upon the issuance of the silver certificate is somewhat less than 50 cents. This kind of money is also issued on the credit of the Government. Yet nobody ever thinks of calling a silver certificate fiat money.

Now, what is a bank note? Bank notes form the largest part of the money we handle every day. A bank note is a piece of paper issued by a national bank, having a certain denomination, and upon which there is printed a statement that the bank will pay the face of the note on demand. There is also printed on the note the additional statement that the note is secured by United States bonds, and other securities, deposited by the bank with the Treasurer of the United States.

This money is based entirely upon evidence of a debt owing from the Government to the bank issuing the note, and on the Government's promise, expressed in the bond, to pay its debt to the bank. If anything can be properly termed "fiat money", probably this would come nearer to it than anything else. Yet no one ever thinks of calling a bank note fiat money; and none of the money I have mentioned is fiat money.

Now, the money to be issued under the Frazier bill has exactly the same features of all this other money; that is to say, it has the credit of the Government behind it, which is the most important feature of any money. But the new money provided under the Frazier bill has more than that behind it. It has the farm bonds, secured by the farm mortgages, every one of which can and will be paid. In brief, behind the issue of money with which it is proposed to refinance the farm mortgages is not only the credit of the Government but the very land itself of the world's greatest, wealthiest, and most progressive country.

The contention that the issuance of this money would constitute uncontrolled inflation is, in my opinion, the sheerest nonsense. It is not inflation. It is controlled expansion, which everyone admits we need at this time; and the expansion proposed under this bill is of an extent no greater than that which the best financial experts have already agreed upon.

Our present gold reserve alone is sufficient to warrant an expansion of $2,000,000,000, upon the basis of that reserve alone, entirely aside from the additional sound security of the farm bonds and mortgages, as provided under the Frazier bill.

Although we have a greater gold reserve at the present time than ever before in our history we have less money in circulation than we have had for many years.

The amount of gold in the Federal Treasury today is $7,438,317,567. The total amount of money of all kinds in circulation is $5,354,746,245. The amount of gold reserve has been steadily increasing, while the per capita circulation of money has been decreasing. On February 28, 1933, the per capita circulation was $52.23. On February 28, 1934, it was $42.40, or $9.83 less than a year ago.

By money in circulation I mean, of course, money issued and outstanding—money in existence—regardless of whether it is lying idle or in actual circulation. In other words, our total medium of exchange is over two billion dollars less than the amount of gold in the Treasury.

For 50 years a gold reserve of from 40 percent to 60 percent of the amount of money in circulation has always been considered a sufficient reserve, and the best financial minds of the country still say that is a sufficient ratio.

And yet, at this very moment the Treasury could issue more than two billion additional dollars in new currency based upon the gold reserve alone, and the total amount of money then in circulation would not even equal the amount of the actual gold now held in reserve in the Treasury of the United States.

Here, then under the Frazier bill, we have a comprehensive system for the Federal refinancing of farm mortgages, which contains these necessary and vital features:

First. The plan includes the refinancing of all farm mortgages, and thus deals with agriculture as an industry and as a whole; as a vital and indispensable part of our economic structure.

Second. The refinancing is done at a rate of interest which the farmer can pay, and the loans are amortized over a definite and uniform period.

Third. The refinancing will be without cost to the Government, because under this plan the Government simply loans its credit to agriculture, the same as it has always loaned it to national banks—which, of course are privately owned—for the last hundred years.

Fourth. The security upon which the loans are made is primarily upon the land, out of which all original wealth must continue to come if we are to have a rational recovery. For unless, by a complete revamping of the whole financial and production-cost set-up in agriculture, the farms can be made to produce wealth again, then it is axiomatic that the whole economic and financial structure of the country is doomed.

I repeat again the statement, which I think no one will venture to challenge; that industry cannot continue to exist and keep people employed unless the one third of our population, represented by agriculture, can again own their farms and can again attain a purchasing power sufficient to enable them to buy the products of industry.

Fifth. And incidentally, this plan provides for a controlled expansion of the currency, to the extent that the financial experts of the country have already declared that a currency expansion is needed. The extent of the expansion is absolutely controlled by the purpose of the issue of the currency itself, and under the provisions of the bill its stabilization and control are automatic.

Mr. Chairman, we who have been striving to attain this legislation here are not alone in our demands that the Congress now give the Frazier bill the immediate consideration which it deserves.

Twenty-four States of the Union, by joint resolution of their respective legislatures now filed in Congress, have petitioned Congress to pass the Frazier bill. My own State of Oregon is one of these.

Every national farm organization, including the Grange and the Farmers' Union, and every farm leader in the United States of real reputation as a farm leader have demanded this legislation.

Those who are making the open fight here may be small in numbers but we have the satisfaction of knowing that we represent the desires and the hopes of more people than have ever before united in a demand for any legislation of national scope.

Never has the real demand for any legislation been so well considered, so universal, or so intelligent as the demand for the Frazier bill. Never before have the great farm leaders, who have devoted their lives to evolving a rational remedy for the ills which beset the farmer, and consequently the Nation, been so in accord upon the solution which, they all agree, lies embodied in the Frazier bill. And never before have the people of this country shown sufficient interest in any legislation to cause their legislatures in 24 States to demand of Congress its enactment.

Time will not permit a discussion now of the Swank-Thomas cost of production bill, and I shall reserve that for a future date. Let me say, however, that it is a natural and necessary sequence to the Frazier bill in the national plan to make the farmer again the master of his own destiny; to assure to him at least a living from his toil; to return to him at least the cost of feeding and clothing the Nation; and to permit him again to make, in addition, that reasonable profit without which neither the farmer nor any other producer can exist.

To force a bill out of committee for a vote on the floor is not an easy task, but because the Agricultural Committee will not report the Frazier bill we are attempting to do this. If every gentleman here who believes the Frazier bill should become law at this session will sign the discharge motion, the bill will become a law, because if it reaches the floor it will pass. Less than 45 signatures are now necessary on the motion to do this, and I hope these may be added within the next few weeks.

Six million farm families are looking to us to enact this just and necessary legislation. Many of these families are now in actual want. They are losing their farms every day. They are on C.C.C. jobs, P.W.A. jobs, and in other lines of endeavor, and in doing this work, not from choice but from necessity, they have, in my State alone, displaced hundreds of unemployed industrial workers for whom these emergency jobs were created. Some of them are even on the relief rolls. And this is a thing that has never happened before among our agricultural population in the whole history of the country.

Let us not delay any longer. Let us pass this legislation at this session rather than the next. Let us not wait until all hope is gone and until a bureaucratic control, like that provided in the Bankhead bill, replaces the time-honored, self-respecting control of the farmer himself in the great basic industry of agriculture, which for a hundred and fifty years has been the bone and the sinew of our Nation's economic life.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY].

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. Chairman, on February 22, just 3 weeks ago, an esteemed colleague of ours took the floor of this House and challenged the tendency which has become a habit on the part of those sponsoring new and untried legislation to label it "an emergency measure" and thus give it a flying start toward its adoption.

He spoke with clarity and conviction. Within a few hours he had crossed the Great Divide.

Today some of us who were his associates, concurring in the thought that he expressed so well on that day, decry the attempt of the proponents of this legislation to justify this most unusual bill as an emergency measure. As we say in the minority report, no information has been presented to the House Committee on Agriculture to justify the consideration of this bill as such.

As we examine into this bill we may well pause and consider some of the vital points which, in our judgment, make it unwise legislation.

The voluntary act passed in the special session has been in effect 1 year, and much good has been accomplished therefrom. The benefits accruing to the cotton growers have been very material. No one will gainsay this, and we of the minority believe that the thing to do is to give it a fair and more thorough trial before we start upon this policy of compulsory control of production. The proponents of this bill come before us and say that this legislation is needed to take care of the chisellers, that element among the cotton growers who cut corners and shave edges and will not play the game in a sportsmanlike way. We come back and say that is not sufficient justification to change the whole economic policy of this country and put compulsory control of production in effect—just to save some of these chisellers from themselves.

Under this bill each grower will be allotted a certain quota and will be compelled to pay a tax of 50 percent of the market value on all cotton ginned in excess of his quota.

The purpose of this tax is to regulate the amount of cotton put into trade and is not for revenue. We therefore believe it unconstitutional.

The trouble with Congress and the Nation today is that we are wrongly attributing our condition to overproduction, when, in the last analysis, the great basic weakness today is not overproduction but rather underconsumption and a lack of purchasing power to remedy that defect.

Some fantastic and ridiculous measures are coming before us. The other day our House Committee on Agriculture had before it a bill to make cattle a basic commodity, and it was seriously contended in the hearing thereon that there was need to spay the cows of the country in order to reduce the production of cattle. What nonsense—spay the cows—I say cut the bull.

Again I say, not overproduction but underconsumption is the trouble with this country.

If this bill becomes law, it will hurt our friends of the South in two ways: First, they are going to lose their markets for cotton abroad. I believe sincerely that if this legislation goes into effect our cotton growers will lose their foreign markets. Who is it that prophesies that the foreign market will be impaired? Senator BANKHEAD, the distinguished brother of our distinguished colleague who introduced this bill, in his testimony before the Senate committee 2 years ago on the Frazier bill, made this statement:

We cannot afford to abandon and give up the foreign market for cotton.

Senator FRAZIER said to him:

If there is a demand on the world market for 50 percent of the cotton that we raise in this country, and they find they cannot get it unless they pay 16 or 18 cents—

Senator BANKHEAD. They will simply raise it abroad; that is all.

Senator FRAZIER. The price will come up?

Senator BANKHEAD. No; they will raise more cotton abroad.

Senator FRAZIER. If there are places where they can raise it.

Senator BANKHEAD. There are such places. There is no question about that. Russia can come into the cotton situation as well as she can come into the wheat situation. I am sure the gentleman recognizes that.

The second adverse factor for the South is this: The men who do not gin their cotton and pay the 50-percent tax will place it in storage. The large interests will store the cotton, and in this way you may have a million or 2,000,000 bales of cotton in storage. If they want to break the market, the speculative crowd can force the stored cotton on the market, pay the 50-percent tax, and break the market simply for speculative purposes.

In my honest judgment, the condition of the cotton grower of the South will be worse if this bill goes into effect than it was before. This legislation, if adopted, will constitute a radical departure from the existing order. Its effect will be to apply compulsory control of production to a great basic commodity and will eliminate the freedom of action which has always been an attribute of American citizenship. If this bill should pass, it would follow very naturally that similar control will be asked for all agricultural commodities, and as a corollary there would be suggested or attempted limitation of production of output of all our industries with applied control of production of agriculture and industry. We would become very nearly a sovietized United States.

This legislation is so far-reaching, such a transition from the order under which the Nation has grown from an infant in swaddling clothes to its present leadership, that we should hesitate to give it our approval. It will be a sad day for the people of the United States when a centralized government, a bureaucracy, is empowered to tell you and me as individual farmers or manufacturers the amount which we can produce. If that day comes, it will sound the death knell of the initiative, the energy, and the enterprise which have been our outstanding characteristics.

Be not misled. Let no man deceive you. The passage of this bill may well be an entering wedge toward such an unhappy result.

On all the evidence my judgment is that in the interest of the cotton industry itself, and even more in the best interests of the Nation as a whole, this bill should be defeated. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for 24 minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, this bill has so many involved features and so many questions might be asked seeking to explain its operation and provisions that I regret that the time at my command will not justify me in yielding to interruptions. I trust that no member of the Committee will think that because I decline to yield it is a matter of discourtesy to him, but I desire to attempt to summarize some of the arguments that I think justify the passage of this bill.

Now, gentlemen, I frankly admit that the burden is on the proponents of this bill to reasonably satisfy Members of Congress from all sections of the country that this new departure in the policy of our Government is justified; justified in law—and I regret exceedingly that I will not have an opportunity to discuss as I would like to the constitutional and legal phases of this bill—whether or not it is justified in conscience, whether or not it is justified as a matter of individual privilege, whether or not it is justified as a measure of sound and economic necessity. We think we are prepared to meet that burden.

In the beginning I want to say, inasmuch as something has been said in this debate, with reference to the origin of this bill, a suggestion made by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania seeking to lead the minds of the Committee to the conclusion that Professor Tugwell or Mr. Ezekiel, or some other representative of the Department of Agriculture, was in any wise responsible for the paternity of the bill or its preparation. I want to say to you on my word that, so far as I know, neither of those gentlemen ever saw the bill or discussed it, or had anything to do with its preparation.

I want to say to you, gentlemen of the Committee, that the sponsorship for this bill does not come from any expert; it does not come from any college professor; it does not come from any specialist on economic problems—the origin of this bill, my friends, comes from the real bona fide cotton producers of the South. [Applause.]

Why? I want to show you by this chart the real logic of this proposition from an economic standpoint. What we are seeking to do by this bill and its provisions is to make practically workable that age-old and inexorable law of supply and demand. There may be temporary departures from its application—an emergency may arise some time that would lead to the conclusion that it is not always sound, but you will find that locally and internationally it always works.

The chart (see p. 4634) I have here before you shows the production, the world consumption, the carry-over, and the price of American cotton.

When I say that word "price" of American cotton, I want you to contemplate what it means to the people of that great section of the country stretching from Virginia all the way across to California. Cotton is the very lifeblood of that section of the country, the lifeblood of the banker, the lifeblood of the merchant, the lifeblood of every business from an economic standpoint.

The only cash price that our people have is the cotton crop, because we have never yet, unfortunately, diversified our agriculture in the South as it has been diversified in some other sections of the country. When the price of cotton falls, then there comes to us poverty, impoverishment, and bankruptcy in the South. When we have a fairly reasonable and profitable price for cotton in that section, our people are able to pay their debts, they are able to pay the interest on their mortgages, they are able to buy some food and clothing for their children, and have some reasonable comforts in their homelife. Without it they are desperate and hopeless. When the price of cotton goes down it not only breaks the purse of the American cotton producer, but, what is infinitely worse and more tragic, it breaks the heart and spirit of those men. That is what we have been going through with down in that section of the country in the last 3 years, and here is the reason for it illustrated on the chart.

Here is the production of cotton for 1931. That column in black represents the production. This symbol here represents the carry-over, and this line, which I call to your attention particularly, represents the price that the cotton producer of the South got for his product, and I want you to note its variation. I want you to note, for instance, that in the year 1932-33, when we had a production of only 10,000,000 bales of cotton, the price of cotton began to mount. The next year, with a small production and a small carry-over, the price of cotton attained 31 cents a pound.

Follow across the chart here, gentlemen, and see the production and the carry-over for this year, when we had nearly 18,000,000 bales of cotton and that large carry-over, and the price line fell to about 14 cents a pound. Then mark it all the way through and come over here to this end of that chart and that brings us back to the beginning of the crop here in 1933. There was your production, and the extreme range there showed you the carry-over of some 13,000,000 bales in addition to the ordinary demands of production for that year and see where the price fell with that situation down to 6 cents a pound.

You cannot produce cotton under the average conditions in the South at any profit possibly for less than 10 cents a pound, and it takes a pretty successful business man to do it. I mean in the average cotton belt. There are exceptions to it, of course, in the more favored sections.

What are we seeking to do by this bill? We are seeking to eliminate those violent fluctuations in the price of cotton, which are caused by this production and these carry-overs, and seeking to run a straight line of price across it there at the parity price, now, at about 15 cents a pound. What does that mean? It means that a farmer will know with some degree of certainty what he is going to get for next year's crop, he will know, with some degree of certainty, in all human probability, that it will not go down to 6 cents a pound if we can control the production and the carry-over and the surplus. He will know that he is going to get a reasonable and profitable price, not a run-away price for cotton, because we do not want that, we think that is just as bad as it can be in the long-range results, but what we want to do is to stabilize it where it ought to be in comparison with the price of other commodities in this country.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

getting rid of this surplus is to get rid of this processing tax. We hope by the reduction of this surplus to get the carry-over and production back to what it was in the pre-war period and keep it there. We will then get rid of the processing tax, as I say, and let the cotton industry stand as it ought to stand under ordinary, legitimate, economic conditions upon this law of supply and demand.

Here is the situation with which we are confronted. In 1929 the carry-over was four and a half million bales; in 1930 it was 6,000,000 bales; in 1931 it was 8,900,000 bales; in 1932 it was 13,228,000 bales; and the last crop carry-over is estimated at nearly 12,000,000 bales. There is the insuperable thing that is hanging over this price of cotton.

Mr. MAY. Is that the surplus?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes. That is what was produced over and above the world and domestic demand for American production of cotton, and it is stored everywhere, and hangs

Production, World Consumption, Carryover and price of American Cotton

* WHAT SUPPLY WOULD HAVE BEEN WITHOUT ACREAGE REDUCTION, 1933

DISTRIBUTED BY COTTON SECTION, PRODUCTION DIVISION, AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ADMINISTRATION

Mr. BANKHEAD. I regret to say to my friend that I cannot yield, and I mean no discourtesy by that.

Mr. HOPE. I appreciate that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. There is the basic principle of this bill. Some gentlemen say that the voluntary program ought to be let alone. In all candor those of us who have benefited by the voluntary program—and the cotton producers have benefited by it, admittedly—hope to continue to benefit by it this year; but it must be remembered that last year, if we had not had that plow-under after the crop was pitched, after it was in some sections almost in a state of maturity, we would have been in much worse condition this year than we are. The cotton farmers wanted to accomplish this thing that we are seeking to accomplish by this bill voluntarily, and said, "We will plow up so much of the acreage if the Government will pay us for plowing it up"; and under the Agricultural Adjustment Act that agreement was entered into, and I have forgotten how many million dollars was paid to the farmers for that voluntary reduction—a large amount—but it was paid for by a processing tax, which was carried on to the consumers of the country and which still is in effect. One of the objectives we have in like the sword of Damocles over the legitimate price of cotton.

Now, we are undertaking to carry out in this bill the principles of voluntary reduction. We do not propose to displace by this bill the present voluntary reduction program for this year or for next year, but the justification for compulsion, as stated to us by the farmers themselves, is that they feel it is necessary, in order to carry out this program, to have governmental restraint as to the amount that can be produced and put into commerce. We are trying to reduce the acreage from 45,000,000.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have declined to yield to other gentlemen. When we get under the 5-minute rule I am sure the committee or myself will be very glad to undertake to clear up anything the gentleman may be in doubt about.

Mr. SNELL. I appreciate the situation.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Forty-five million acres has been the maximum amount of acreage put into production of cotton. Last year, if it had not been for the voluntary plow-up program, for which the farmers were paid by the Government, instead of producing 13,200,000 bales, as we did produce, the Department of Agriculture estimates the cotton producers of the South would have raised nearly 18,000,000 bales, which, with the existing carry-over, would have burdened the world market for cotton with 30,000,000 bales of cotton. If that had happened, I pledge you my word, I do not believe cotton would have brought 3 cents a pound in the public squares in the Cotton Belt.

Now, that is the situation with which we are confronted, and those men who are most interested come to this Congress, as shown by all the evidence before the committee, and ask for this legislation. Those men, whose happiness and whose hopes and everything else that is dear to them, is wrapped up in the price they get for cotton, come to this Congress, through the evidence that has been submitted, through resolutions, through petitions, through mass meetings, through the referendum taken by the Department of Agriculture—not just a few isolated cranks, if you please, who have some conception that this is a wise thing to do, but 95 percent of the men who are most interested, say to this Congress, as they said to the Committee on Agriculture, "We favor the compulsory method of control." They have their reasons. Gentlemen who do not know anything in the world about cotton, who do not know anything in the world about the conditions of the cotton planter, but out of their great solicitude and anxiety for sustaining and maintaining the liberties of the American people, tell us that we are running to our own destruction. These cotton producers have thought this thing through.

It is impossible for 2,000,000 cotton farmers in this country, scattered from Virginia to California, with different climatic conditions, with different soil conditions, with different social conditions, by voluntary action to get together. They have tried it for 25 or 30 years, and they failed; but they have awakened to the fact, under the impulse, under the direction of this voluntary program, that they can cooperate to a degree, and they have further awakened to the fact that they are willing to have this Congress make that cooperation compulsory by the arm of law. That is what they are asking here. That is all they are asking. Is it not a reasonable request? We people in the Southern States appreciate the problems of you gentlemen from other sections of the country, who are interested in agriculture, and we want to go along with you in your programs. God knows you have enough problems at the present time. I refer to the man who gets out and plows with a mule or who runs a tractor. That is the kind of farmer I am talking about. I know we have some theoretical farmers, some of them in Congress.

Mr. McFARLANE. The gentleman means agriculturists?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I refer to the real, honest-to-God, bona fide farmer, the man who gets out in the field and sweats. He is the man who is for this legislation. They have thought it through and they have come to the conclusion that there is no other salvation for them.

Some have said that was not a referendum that included all the farmers of the South. True, we did not have an opportunity to get that, but, gentlemen, it was a very representative cross section of the cotton farmers of the South, as much so as could have been obtained. They were mostly committee men who went out on this voluntary-reduction program; practical, intelligent, conservative farmers who know their own business and who know their own interests. Of the thousands of questionnaires sent out to them, 22,000 replies have come back, or there were that many tabulated when the hearings were held, and a great many more have come in since, but 95 percent of them say, "We are attempting to go along with the voluntary program, but we want you to protect us from the chiselers, the noncooperative, and we want you to protect us from ourselves." I am bold enough to say that, because human nature is just the same all the world over.

One of the reasons why the farmers have not been able to cooperate and get results heretofore is that when we have made these efforts to reduce one man's neighbor says that he is going to reduce his acreage and the other man says,

"Now is my chance. I will get in and make a killing." That is the truth about it. Why do we say we cannot control them? The evidence shows that all over the Cotton Belt fertilizer sales as compared with last year have increased more than 100 percent. In some sections of the country they have increased as high as 300 percent. I had the figures here somewhere, but I have mislaid them. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE] undertook to show there had been no general increase in the sale of fertilizer over a long range of years, but the figures that were furnished by Mr. Hester, of New Orleans, showed there has been an increase of approximately 100 percent in the sales of fertilizer this year, as compared with the sales for last year.

Mr. HOPE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am sorry. I do not have time.

Mr. HOPE. The gentleman questioned my figures which I gave the other day as to fertilizer sales, and I would like to have him give the authority he is using for his figures.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will insert them in the RECORD. I thought I had them available, but I will insert them in the RECORD as a basis for my statement.

H. G. HESTER, Secretary Emeritus.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Agriculture has given the most thoughtful consideration to this bill. I doubt if any committee in Congress in a long time has gone more thoroughly or more exhaustively into every feature of a bill to iron out imperfections and make it equitable in application. Not only has the effect on landlords been taken into consideration in this bill but likewise the effect on tenants and share-croppers; and every reasonable precaution has been taken in the preparation of this bill to see that all interests are properly, fairly, and humanely protected. When you come to consider the bill in its various sections under the 5-minute rule, you will see with what care, with what meticulous and prudent care, gentlemen, this committee has worked out all the details of this bill to make it fair, to make it equitable, to make it just, not only to each individual but to the aggregate producers in each State.

One proposition about which there has been some confusion is how much the cotton production in each particular State is going to be reduced by the terms of the bill. If you will examine the hearings, and they have been incorporated in the RECORD, you will see that in order to limit the present crop to 10,000,000 bales it is proposed to take the average production in each State over a period of 5 years and give to that State its ratio as compared to the total production of all the States in the Cotton Belt for such 5-year period.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman be good enough to put the chart in the RECORD?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to incorporate the chart in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is advised that the chart cannot be printed in the RECORD unless permission is granted by the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that with the permission of the Committee on Printing the chart may be incorporated in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

That in order to relieve the present acute economic emergency in that part of the agricultural industry devoted to cotton production and marketing by diminishing the disparity between prices paid to cotton producers and persons engaged in cotton marketing and prices of other commodities and by restoring purchasing power to such producers and persons so that the restoration of the normal exchange in interstate and foreign commerce of all commodities may be fostered, and to raise revenue to enable the payment of additional benefits to cotton producers under the Agricultural Adjustment Act—

It is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress to promote the orderly marketing of cotton in interstate and foreign commerce; to enable producers of such commodity to stabilize their markets against undue and excessive fluctuations, and to preserve advantageous markets for such commodity, and to prevent unfair competition and practices in putting cotton into the channels of interstate and foreign commerce, and to more effectively balance production and consumption of cotton.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, which is "cotton"; and I propose to stick strictly to cotton, but I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes on this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I may say to the gentleman from New York that we are very anxious to finish this bill today. There is to be a session this evening at which bills on the Private Calendar are to be considered. If we can finish general debate on an appropriation bill tomorrow, I understand it is the intention to adjourn over Saturday. I am afraid we may interfere with the program if we start in extending the time.

Mr. FISH. I am not going to filibuster in any way. I have a big subject, one which it is hard to cover in 5 minutes.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I shall not object in this instance, but I hope the gentleman will not take further time.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman intend to talk on air mail or the Lindbergh telegram?

Mr. FISH. No; not at all.

Mr. TRUAX. Then, I shall not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, as I say, I intend to speak on the last word, which is "cotton."

One of the greatest hoaxes that was perpetrated upon the American people was by Dr. Cook when he claimed to have discovered the North Pole. About the biggest hoax that has since been put over on the American people, and particularly upon the cotton producers of this country, was perpetrated by those adherents of recognition of Soviet Russia, such as former Senator Brookhart, who said that such recognition would bring us a billion dollars' worth of trade annually and that we would do a cotton business running up into the hundreds of millions of dollars through Soviet Russia buying her cotton requirements from us. This statement was repeated and amplified by numerous southern Senators in their respective States. Naturally, the people in the Southland who were not very friendly to the Russian form of government and communism and many things that happen in that country were led astray by this large and tempting bait, that recognition of Russia would result in the cotton farmers of the South selling vast quantities of their surplus crop for export to Soviet Russia.

Former Representative Eslick, of Tennessee, one of the ablest Democrats who has been in this House for many years from a cotton-growing State, made a careful study of this question 4 years ago. We served together on the House committee to investigate Communist propaganda and activities, and he wrote that part of the committee report that dealt with cotton, and he had this to say:

The 5-year plan in agriculture may most seriously affect the southern cotton farmer. Russia now imports from the United States and Egypt more than half of the cotton used there. It is proposed under the plan to irrigate the cotton-growing lands in central Asia so as to largely increase the cultivation of cotton. Seven hundred and fifty thousand hectares were planted in cotton in 1927-28. The plan calls for the planting of 2,040,000 hectares in 1932-33. The capital invested in this project will be 500,000,000 rubles. It is intended to meet all the Russian requirements for cotton and to produce cotton for sale in the world markets. A recent report from Russia refers to a Soviet decree being just issued to the effect that no more cotton is to be bought in 1931 from the United States.

Boiled down to a reasonable conclusion, if the 5-year plan succeeds, the Soviet Union is to become a great money-making machine that it may finance communism and world revolution. To undersell the rest of the world in agricultural and industrial products is a part of the scheme to create unrest, ripening into revolution.

This activity would affect us ultimately in the destruction of our grain and cotton markets; especially is this true of wheat and cotton produced by peasant labor on Government owned and controlled land, practically without cost, and with which American labor cannot compete.

Now, 4 years ago Representative Eslick made the definite prediction that no more cotton would be bought by Soviet Russia from the United States, and he cited figures in regard to the proposed cotton production in Soviet Russia, every one of which has materialized.

Not only was that part of the committee report dealing with cotton written by him, but he made a speech in the House of Representatives in which he said, "The cotton industry is being challenged by the expenditure of $250,000,000 in central Asia, developing and irrigating the richest cotton lands in the world. The order has gone out that the Soviet people are not to buy a bale of American cotton in 1931. This year's cotton acreage will be three times that of last year."

I know how dangerous it is for a politician to predict anything at all, but every one of these predictions, made over 3 years ago by Representative Eslick on the floor of the House and in a committee report, has proved to be exactly correct. I hold in my hand the last report, dated February 1934, of cotton production in Soviet Russia, published in the Economic Review of the Soviet Union, and issued by Amtorg. It gives the production year by year for the last 5 years, and it is in exact accordance with the statements of Representative Eslick.

Last year shows a cotton acreage in excess of 5,000,000 acres, and it is proposed to expand this acreage rapidly for the next 5 years while we are reducing ours. In 1933 the Soviet Union attained higher cotton yields over a larger area than any other country. As regards average yield for the country as a whole, it ranks second, after Egypt. In total output and area it holds third place, after the United States and India, as against fifth place before the war. Output in 1933 exceeded the 1913 figure by about 80 percent. The output of Egyptian cotton cultivation of which was started only a few years ago, amounted to 30,150 tons last year. The cotton procurements program was fulfilled by January 15, 2 months earlier than the preceding year. State and collective farms accounted for 90 percent of the total.

Skillful propagandists in favor of recognizing Soviet Russia held out this enormous bait to the people of the South of a billion dollars of trade and hundreds of millions worth of cotton to be sold to Russia. The only cotton bought in the last 3 years by Soviet Russia was three and a half million dollars in 1933, and this money was loaned by us through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to our own exporters to sell cotton with our own money to Soviet Russia. In the years 1931 and 1932 there were no shipments whatever. In the year 1933 there was $3,500,000 worth of cotton shipped to Russia, but this is the money given by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. There were no further shipments in 1933. There were no shipments in the months of January and February 1934. I have not the time to discuss the issue of recognition of Soviet Russia. That is an accomplished fact, and I am not largely concerned with it, provided the Communists leave us alone and stop their revolutionary propaganda from Moscow.

I am only making the statement that one of the main reasons for recognition was the bait of an enormous market for cotton in Soviet Russia which was dangled before the Southland and resulted in its being seduced by this fraud. The cotton people down there were told that this was the greatest market in the world for their cotton, when there was not a word of truth in the statement from the beginning to this very minute, because Soviet Russia has increased their own cotton production 100 percent in the last few years and intend to increase it another 100 percent in the next few years. They need little or none of our cotton—and the proof of the pudding is in the eating—they have bought scarcely any. The friends of Soviet Russia and their paid agents, unable to deceive the northern business men by their trade propaganda for recognition, took advantage of the fact that cotton is king in the South, seduced the people down there, particularly the church element that wanted nothing to do with Soviet Russia and did not even want to trade with them; but, of course, when it came to the question of cotton, that was a different issue, and the southerners marched right up and supported recognition, or it could never have been put through. Former President Coolidge made his position clear when he said, "I do not propose to barter away for the privilege of trade any of the cherished rights of humanity. I do not propose to make merchandise of any American principles." It took a Democratic administration to recognize Soviet Russia, and it is now proposing to lend them money, when our own people are in need and want.

The R.F.C. authorized an expenditure of $40,000,000 for the sale of cotton to China and $10,000,000 for the sale of wheat. They were going to take care of the South and the cotton producers.

What happened? Of the $40,000,000 that they told the country they were going to buy cotton with to send to China they have used just $4,621,000, because China did not want our cotton for some reason or other. I have not the time to go into this matter, but may I say that of the $4,621,000 advanced on cotton, China has been good enough to pay us only $404,000 so far. Of the $3,500,000 that the R.F.C. advanced to export cotton to Russia, we have not received anything on account. This is due on the 1st of July, and we can tell better when that date is reached. In the meantime what has become of the billion dollars' worth of trade that was so glibly used by the Democratic administration to promote recognition? Why, nothing at all—like many other of their radical promises. The total amount of goods imported by Soviet Russia from all over the world last year was well under $200,000,000, and of which approximately 0.1 was our share. A new Export Bank, however, has been devised to sell American goods, with our money, to Soviet Russia. Is it not time to call a halt to the radical activities of the "brain trust", so enamored with all things Russian, and save our money for the benefit of the American people instead of the Communists in Russia?

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, my interest in this legislation comes to me from that natural love for the land of one's birth. I first opened my eyes to the wonders of this beautiful world down in Dixie. On a one-horse cotton farm in the old Palmetto State, South Carolina, and in a neighborhood where Confederate money was legal tender long after the surrender at Appomattox Court House. Since the day that Gen. Robert E. Lee laid down his sword and championed the cause of peace relatively little immigration has taken place in this section of our country from foreign countries or from other sections of our Union. I am indebted to Peter Molyneux for the following salient facts: There are nearly half a million more people of native white parentage in the cotton States than 10 of our other populous States, with more than 12,000,000 more people. In the cotton States the population is rural, because 90 percent live outside of cities of 100,000 or more. In this section, which comprises 23.7 percent of the area of the United States, live 22.2 percent of the population of the country, yet this area represents only 12.5 percent of the total wealth of the country. The per capita wealth of the rest of the country is twice that of the cotton States. Some may argue that this discrepancy is due to the fact that over 7,000,000 Negroes reside in this area. If you were to assume that all of the wealth was held by the white population, which is an unwarranted assumption, the per capita wealth of the South would be far less than the other 38 States. The real reason for the difference is the extreme poverty of so great a number of the farm population. These people, though poor, have the real American spirit. They suffer but do not howl.

During the 5-year period between 1924 and 1928, the annual average income amounted to $242 as against $493 per capita in the other 38 States. In 1930 there were 729,200 cropper families in these 10 States, of which 338,800 were white and 390,400 were Negro families. A cropper is a man without property, without a home. He is the forgotten man.

For a century they have planted cotton to be sold in an unprotected world-wide market, and for more than a half century they have purchased in a protected market.

May I say that there is no bill in this Congress that will do more to relieve and to prevent child labor than this control bill? I have preached to the farmers of the South for 20 years that if they would raise less cotton they could produce it and gather it without working their children through the fall months and not have to keep them out of school. The poor child in the South, white or colored, has to spend its days in the fall going down the cotton rows picking cotton, for which he gets nothing. He stays out of school. The best thing this Congress can do is to control the cotton production of the South.

Some gentlemen have charged Mr. Tugwell with this legislation. You can charge him with a lot of things, perhaps, but you will have to lay this on someone else's shoulders.

In 1926 I introduced in Congress a cotton control bill, and it is printed in the RECORD. When I proposed this matter before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, prominent Members from the South seemed shocked at the plan of control of cotton production when I proposed this law.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for an additional 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to object at this time, but I give notice that I will object to any further extensions of time.

There was no objection.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, we have to protect these small farmers, and may I compliment the chairman and the gentlemen of this committee on the fact that they have written legislation into this bill taking care of the croppers and the tenants on the small farms of the South, because this is the only bill that will protect these people from the big landowners. The people opposing this bill are the big planters and the big landowners of the South. This bill will protect the little fellow who will get the benefits.

In the South the greater production of cotton is by the cropper. He owns nothing on earth. He has no home. He owns nothing at all; but a good landlord furnishes him the land, the team, the seed, and furnishes him food and clothing during the crop year in order to produce his crop of cotton. May I say that the colored croppers of the South are the happiest people on God's green earth when they are under the care of some good planter who really looks after their needs, because they know when they go to him and say, "I have got to have some money today, Captain", that they are going to get it. He knows if he goes to town and gets into a little trouble and comes back and says, "Captain, I got to have a little money to get out of trouble", that he will get it.

We should pass this bill, because, if we do not, you will have the little fellows all signed up and large planters will ruin the market. I know a certain part of this country where there are six or seven million acres of land available for the planting of cotton. One man can cultivate 160 acres. He will not chop it out. He will get a sled when it is ripe and gather it with his sled and will ruin these little fellows in all the other States. I do not see how any man in this country can vote against this bill when you have a chance to control the big fellows that produce the great quantities of cotton which destroy the little fellow.

The fundamental reason for the poverty in the South is the fact that for a century their fathers and their forefathers planted to the one crop of cotton. They shipped it abroad to foreign markets, and what has been the result? They sold it in an unprotected foreign market and during all these years they have bought in a protected market, which has caused the poverty that has existed in that country.

Mr. ARENS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. I yield.

Mr. ARENS. The provisions of this bill would tend to prevent corporation farming or large-scale farming.

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes; and that is one of the things that is needed most in this country. I compliment the committee upon the fact that it had the foresight to provide for a balanced agriculture in this country. In other words, there is no reason to stop one man from using certain acreage if you are going to turn around and put that acreage in something that is produced in another part of the country and in this way destroy the equilibrium in the production of that product. If you take it out of cotton, you should not put it in wheat to destroy the wheat man. You should not put it in dairying to destroy the great dairying industry. The time will come in the United States when we will have sense enough to get plenty of farm experts and economists to go out in every county every year and lay down a crop program for every farmer, so that we will have balanced control in this country.

I want to tell you now that this bill will do more to put the South back to where it ought to be than any other one thing. The farmers cannot do this by themselves. Why can they not do it? Because the banker who lends him the money tells him that he has got to put so many acres in cotton and the landlord also tells him that he must put so many acres in cotton. [Applause.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, I do this only for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a number of questions. If I remember correctly, the present carry-over of cotton is about 13,000,000 bales.

Mr. JONES. That is the present world carry-over of American cotton. The present carry-over in America is around 9,000,000 bales.

Mr. DIRKSEN. If the gentleman will concede the correctness of the statement that there has been a slight increase in cotton production in Egypt, in the Argentine, and in Russia, next year will there not be a substantial carry-over even in view of the limitation of 10,000,000 bales that might be placed upon cotton in interstate commerce?

Mr. JONES. No one can state that for a certainty, but it is estimated that the 10,000,000 bales will just about adjust itself to the world market with the average carry-over.

Mr. DIRKSEN. In other words, there will be a visible carry-over.

Mr. JONES. There will be a carry-over of cotton if normal conditions prevail throughout the world.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The reason I have asked that question is because my attention was forcefully directed to the observation made by the gentleman from Alabama that this bill is designed to make the law of supply and demand work. I assume the gentleman who is chairman of the committee was a Member of this body at the time we had the most unfortunate debacle with the Farm Board, and the gentleman will remember the representations that were made that the Farm Board was going to enable the law of supply and demand to work. This Board started in at the higher brackets at 80 and 90 cents and began to buy, and finally they closed out their holdings at lower prices and they lost a net of $190,000,000 and did not enable the law of supply and demand to work particularly. Now, it may be pointed out that there is no analogy between the two, because the Farm Board was a free instrumentality and there was no limitation on production as there is under this bill; yet I want to recite to the gentleman a most painful experience that will bring out what is definitely in my mind: I happen to be a baker, and every time I said to a flour salesman, "What is the price now and what is it going to be a month from now?" he would say to me, "If you can tell me what the Farm Board is going to do with the hundreds of millions of bushels of wheat it has, I can tell you what flour is going to be worth 60 days hence."

Now, we are going to have a visible carry-over, and the excess over 10,000,000 bales cannot be placed in interstate commerce unless the 50-percent tax is paid. Is that correct?

Mr. JONES. That is correct.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Then, let me ask, can there be any prevention of bootlegging of cotton particularly, and is not this visible supply of cotton going to be an instrumentality in the hands of those who play on the bear side of the market to run the market down and ultimately defeat the very purpose designed to be achieved by this bill?

Mr. JONES. Let me state to the gentlemen that the part that will be taxed will be but a very small part, we hope, of the visible supply or the carry-over. We hope that the 10,000,000 bales, in large measure, will account for the carry-over that is left in this country. The tax is for the purpose of letting the farmer who is not in the program and the farmer within the program who is disposed to use excessive fertilizer know that they will not accomplish anything by so doing. The carry-over that arises from the excess production will be very small if this bill is passed. There will not be much of that, and the other will not be held by a Farm Board, so that it will not be dumped on the market all at once. That was an entirely different proposition, and I may say to the gentleman that I did not vote for the Farm Board bill for the reason I did not feel it would work, and a good many others did not think it would work. It was an entirely different philosophy, but in this case no one agency is going to control this carry-over. It is going to be in the normal market just like the rest of it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Cotton production, or shall I say the yield per acre, depends, after all, upon favorable weather conditions and efficiency of cultivation.

Mr. JONES. That is true, but that averages up pretty well. Usually when you consider the cotton production, not only in this country but throughout the world, there are some variations which must be allowed for, of course, but the variation in the normal carry-over of from 4,000,000 to 6,000,000 is not very bad, one way or the other.

Mr. DIRKSEN. But there is no assurance in the bill, in spite of the fact that it is desired, that both acreage reduction and a limitation upon the number of bales that can be put in interstate commerce, will be so approximated that producers will only raise about 10,000,000 bales.

Mr. JONES. I may state that their estimate for this year in the plow-up is pretty good. They got it just about right, and I believe they can do it again.

Mr. DIRKSEN. It is conjectural, however.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I was particularly interested in the remarks of my friend from Oklahoma, who spoke a moment ago, and said that the small farmer is taken care of by the bill. The small farmer is not taken care of. Section 7 is the section that provides for the allotments. This section does not by legislation provide specifically how the Secretary of Agriculture may grant these individual allotments. It is legislation so far as providing the allotments for State and county, but beyond that it does not legislate. The bill leaves it to the Secretary of Agriculture to grant individual allotments by regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture.

So when you get to the individual, we are in the same position in this bill that we have been in the Agricultural Adjustment Act. Allotments issued on wheat, corn, and cotton have not been fair. They have discriminated against the small farmer and played into the hands of the large producer.

Then after having made a gesture of legislating for the individual allotment at the bottom of section 7 we have this:

Upon such basis as the Secretary of Agriculture deems fair and just, and will apply to all farms to which the allotment is made under this paragraph uniformly, within the county, on the basis or classification adopted.

That is not different from the present Agricultural Adjustment Act. The Agricultural Adjustment Act has given the greatest benefits to men who were financially able to produce during the past few years with unfavorable prices, while the individual who could not produce during the past few years, due to his limited financial ability, cannot fairly participate in the benefits.

There is a farmer in my district who knows something about the Agricultural Adjustment Act and who recently wrote something about it. It is short, and I read from the Altamont Journal, of Altamont, Kans.:

By Fred Brown, an actual farmer

It is about time some of the professors begin to hear the call of their classes. Professor Tugwell has about come to the end of his usefulness as Assistant Secretary of Agriculture. In fact, it is doubtful if he knows one thing about actual farming, or farm conditions, or the American farmer in general. He evidently thinks it looks fine for the big farmers to bore with big augers, therefore he would remove enough farmers so as to leave nothing but the big ones. His reasoning is rotten. Instead of taking 50,000 farmers off the farms, the large farms should be divided into smaller units and fifty to one hundred thousand families come back to the farm and do more intensive rather than so much extensive farming.

But the Russianizing of the American farmer is distasteful and if attempted may produce considerable trouble.

The irony of the whole situation is that the big hog raisers, the big wheat raisers who have been most responsible for producing the much-discussed surplus that has brought prices down on all of us, are the very fellows who are now getting the big hand-out from the Government. And the small farmer, who has had little to do with creating the surpluses, gets so little out of this so-called "Government aid" that it is scarcely worth while for him to get it at all. I wonder if the Secretary of Agriculture will give the small farmer his chance later on or whether he intends to freeze the small ones out entirely?

These remarks of Mr. Brown disclose a knowledge of the farm question which excels the knowledge which is being exercised by the Agriculture Department in administering the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

This bill does not change the situation at all. It has the same camouflage in it. In actual practice there has been so much discrimination against the small farmer that considerable protest is coming up against the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

I am aware that the bill is going to pass; there is no question about that. But I want to make this prophecy: If this bill is enacted, it is not going to bring those benefits to the South which some of the Members are promising. I think that many Members who advocate the passage of this bill, who come from the Southland, will live to rue the day that it was enacted. [Applause.]

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. I yield.

Mr. KELLER. I have a letter similar to the one the gentleman has read. It has a specific remedy. The suggestion is that the benefit shall accrue more and more to the small man on a sliding scale.

Mr. McGUGIN. Certainly. If this bill were based upon the principle of the graduated income tax, with a fair exemption to the small producer, and then increase the tax on the large producer, there would be some reason in it.

Mr. KELLER. Why not propose an amendment to that effect?

Mr. McGUGIN. To make such a provision in a sound manner it would require much time and consideration. Therefore, I doubt at this late moment if we can accomplish this purpose by amendment. Again, those who are forcing this bill through the House are voting down all amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I am not a cotton farmer any more than the two gentlemen who preceded me, but I recall somewhere sometime hearing some sage make this observation, that no one knows so well how to handle a husband as an old maid, and that the confirmed bachelor can give the father of a village pointers on how to raise boys. I am interested in the cotton producers because I used to sell hogs into every cotton-producing State in the South, and the highest-priced hog that was ever sold in the United States—it was not mine, unfortunately—went to the State of Mississippi, to Columbia, Miss., and it brought $32,000. They paid for that hog with 30- and 40-cent cotton.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], my esteemed friend, asked some questions of the chairman of this committee. When the gentleman can explain satisfactorily why in 1931 and 1932, in 1931 particularly, when wheat was selling for an average of 47 cents a bushel in this country and bread for 7 and 8 cents for a pound loaf to the consumer, at the same time in France and Germany wheat was bringing an average of $1.60 a bushel and the bakers were selling the same pound loaf of bread to the people there for 3 and 4 cents—when he can explain that situation then I think that all of the questions that he has asked can be satisfactorily answered. Of course there will be some bootlegging, as we have bootlegging in liquor and narcotics and every other commodity practically. If the law of supply and demand be a good thing to follow, why not adopt it to the public utilities and the railroads, to the interest on the loans that we farmers have to make, and to every commodity that we buy?

I am not censuring these gentlemen or criticizing the A.A.A. for some of its actions and procedure, but this bill is designed to remedy the very defects that they mention, to plug up the holes they are complaining about. The program of the A.A.A. is voluntary. It worked eminently well and satisfactorily with the cotton producer last year, but with this huge surplus, a year's supply on hand, in order that they may hold the price where it is, it is absolutely necessary that the amount that moves to market, not the amount that is produced on the farms, be controlled and limited to a point which, in their judgment, represents a maximum of 10,000,000 bales. That is the old principle of the McNary-Haugen bill, which sought to control and regulate the surplus on the farms and control and regulate the amount of the crop moved to the market. In the case of wheat we would have regulated the amount that was consumed domestically. For instance, we produce an average of 850,000,000 bushels of wheat. We consume only 600,000,000 to 650,000,000 bushels of wheat. Therefore we would pay the higher price for that amount which we consume domestically, and would have sold at that time the surplus on the world market at a less price. That condition does not exist today. Because of the retaliatory tariffs of other nations we have no world market for wheat today. But now we could apply this very principle to the wheat crop with equal success to that achieved with the cotton crop, because of the fact that the farmer in the Wheat Belt can take his extra 20 or 25 percent and feed it to his hogs, feed it to his cattle, feed it to his sheep, or to his poultry.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 2. The provisions of this act shall be effective only with respect to the crop years 1934-35 and 1935-36, but if the President finds that the economic emergency in cotton production and marketing will continue or is likely to continue to exist so that the application of this act with respect to the crop year 1936-37 is imperative in order to carry out the policy declared in section 1, he shall so proclaim, and this act shall be effective with respect to the crop year 1936-37. If at any time prior to the end of the crop year 1936-37, the President finds that the economic emergency in cotton production and marketing has ceased to exist, he shall so proclaim, and no tax under this act shall be levied with respect to cotton harvested after the effective date of such proclamation.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Brown of Georgia: Page 2, strike out beginning with line 16 down through line 4 on page 3 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Sec. 2. The provisions of this act shall be effective only with respect to the crop year 1934-35, but if at any time prior to the end of such crop year the President finds that the economic emergency in cotton production and marketing has ceased to exist he shall so proclaim, and no tax under this act shall be levied with respect to cotton harvested after the effective date of such proclamation."

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, this amendment limits the application of this bill to 1 year. We can reenact this bill next January, if it is necessary. This will be the first experience with the compulsory program, and we will know definitely whether or not the cotton farmers of the South will want to extend the provisions of this bill this fall. The most independent man on earth is the cotton farmer of the South, in action and in thought, and I think if the provisions of the bill work all right the farmers will know it and we will know it. I cannot see that any harm can come from the amendment which I have offered to this bill. We can extend the provisions of the bill during January of next year.

Mr. HOPE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. HOPE. I should like to ask the gentleman, who very ably represents a great cotton-producing section, if he thinks the farmers of his district would be in favor of this legislation if they knew what it actually contained?

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. I can only say they are in favor of it now.

Mr. HOPE. Do they know what is contained in the bill? How many of them have read the bill?

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. They have a general idea of the bill. If they do not understand it thoroughly, they will have an opportunity to find out. We can try it out for 1 year.

Mr. FULMER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. FULMER. Inasmuch as this bill is being passed rather late to put into operation completely this year, we ought to have a 2-year limit. There will have to be quite a lot of tolerance under the rules and regulations this year because of the lateness of the bill, but it will give us an opportunity for the next cotton year to put the bill into complete operation and accomplish what we hope to accomplish under the bill. In the meantime the bill cannot be put into operation unless two thirds of the farmers, including the share croppers and tenants, who have a right to pass on it, will state to the Secretary that they want it continued.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. My reply to that is that all the benefits can be extended next January if the cotton producers want it, and for that reason I think it is better to limit the provisions to 1 year.

Mr. BROWNING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. BROWNING. Is it not the plan to systematically reduce the surplus, instead of trying to take it all off in 1 year?

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Yes; perhaps so.

Mr. BROWNING. Does not the gentleman think that if we confine it to 1 year, we would not be planning through to a reduction of the surplus? We would only be taking off a part of what we are going to have to get rid of if we relieve the situation on the market?

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. My reply is that this is emergency legislation, and I think 1 year at a time is sufficient.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I am wondering whether or not the amendment in the form in which it was offered by the gentleman from Georgia expresses the idea he has in mind. It provides that this bill shall be in effect for only 1 year. Then it provides that if the President shall determine at the end of the year that it is not needed for a longer period, then the tax shall not be applied.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. It is true my amendment limits the provisions of the bill to 1 year.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. It seems to me that the two provisions of the amendment are inconsistent, one with the other, because one imposes a definite limitation of 1 year upon the operation of the act, and the second part of the amendment presupposes that the bill would continue to operate, because except for that presupposition, what would be the object in saying that if the President finds it is no longer needed, then there shall be no tax imposed for another year? I think the gentleman should reform his amendment.

Mr. PARKER. The gentleman misunderstood the language of the amendment. The amendment does not provide what the gentleman says.

Mr. BOILEAU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. BOILEAU. The provision in the bill at page 2, line 24, reads:

If at any time prior to the end of the crop year 1936-37, the President finds that the economic emergency in cotton production and marketing has ceased to exist, he shall so proclaim, and no tax under this act shall be levied with respect to cotton harvested after the effective date of such proclamation.

Does that not take care of what the gentleman has in mind?

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. My amendment provides that no tax shall be levied in respect to cotton harvested after the effective date of the President's proclamation during the first year.

Mr. BOILEAU. Oh, yes. It provides that at any time prior to the end of the crop year 1936-37—

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Brown] has expired.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. GLOVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. GLOVER. The gentleman understands we must take it off so that it will not affect and depress the price?

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. GLOVER. There are at least 10,000,000 bales of cotton carried over. We can only get rid of 5,000,000 bales a year. The gentleman's amendment would absolutely thwart the purpose of this bill in getting the surplus out of the way.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. I do not think so. That is not my intention.

Mr. GLOVER. If it was continued for 1 year, it would do that.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. But why can it not be extended for another year? This is an emergency measure, and if the emergency continues, the plan could be continued next year.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. ALLGOOD. I know the gentleman wants his people to get the best price possible for cotton.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. ALLGOOD. If the gentleman's amendment is adopted, then the general public will know there is doubt again about this bill being continued for another year, and it will possibly cause cotton to sell for 8 or 10 cents a pound this fall.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Brown] has again expired.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There being no objection, the Brown amendment was again reported by the Clerk.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I know the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Brown] is interested in this, as all people from the South are. If the gentleman had heard the discussion in the committee and the statements of those who are administering the act, he would not have offered this amendment. If this is only carried for 1 year, it does not run as long as the program which they have already outlined under the voluntary plan, which is for 2 years. We are trying to make this dovetail, fit in, and supplement the voluntary program and make it effective. The Congress does not meet until January. It is necessary for the administrative officers to make their plans before that time. If the measure does not work out, 30 days after this goes into effect, as suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin, the President may end the whole thing, and we want him to. It cannot go into effect the second year unless the people working two thirds of the land want it to go into effect.

Even then it cannot go into effect if the President finds that the emergency has ended.

If we are going to try the experiment, let us not so hedge it about, handicap it, and hobble it that it cannot succeed. This is what will happen if we undertake to put the program into effect for 1 year only, because the whole philosophy of the bill is to adjust this carry-over covering a period of probably 2 years. At least this length of time will be necessary to have it done right.

The bill is safeguarded in every possible way so that nothing will be saddled onto those people that they do not want, and nothing will be saddled onto them that is ineffective. Suppose the law is made effective for 1 year only, that it is working beautifully; Congress meets in January, but it might be impossible to renew it in time to make it applicable to the planting for the ensuing year because of other emergency propositions and matters of great importance coming up.

I hope the gentleman will not insist on his amendment in view of the plain provisions of the bill.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, by all means this amendment to limit the operation of this bill to 1 year ought to be adopted.

This so-called "Bankhead cotton bill", in its present form, is the most drastic and probably the most dangerous piece of legislation that has ever been proposed in this House, so far as cotton growers are concerned—at least since carpetbag days.

In my opinion, it will do more to demoralize the southern cotton farmers than any other measure that has been enacted by Congress in your day and mine. Unless it is radically changed by the House or by the Senate, I fear it will do the southern cotton farmers infinitely more harm than it will good. Without adding materially to his income or promoting his prosperity it will hamper him in the free and full enjoyment of his own property, place him under the arbitrary dictatorship of a Government bureau, and subject him to the most drastic penalties of fines and imprisonments for violations, not only of the law itself, but for the violation even of regulations issued under this act.

Listen to this; let me read you some of the penal provisions of subsection (d):

Any person who violates any provision of this act or any regulations promulgated under this act—

And so forth—

shall on conviction be punished by a fine not to exceed $5,000 or by imprisonment for not exceeding 2 years, or both.

If he violates even a regulation promulgated under this act he is subject to indictment in the Federal court, and upon conviction shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 or by imprisonment in the penitentiary for not more than 2 years, or both.

They tell us that 90 percent of the cotton farmers are for this measure as it now stands. The facts are that the farmers have not been fully informed as to what is in the bill. If they were, I don't believe 1 out of 10 of them would favor it.

They think it is a measure to compel all farmers to cooperate in reducing cotton acreage. They do not understand that it puts all cotton growers in a "strait-jacket", subjects them to the arbitrary control of some bureau, imposes a tax on cotton that is unwarranted and unreasonable, and imposes penalties all out of proportion to offenses alleged to have been committed.

Personally, I do not believe in the ruthless destruction of property of any kind. But if this bill is going to be tried out at all, there ought to be some amendments adopted. I represent a dairy country. We are building up our dairying industry there. You have asked us to diversify, and we have done it. Now you come along and say that if we plant diversified crops, the things prohibited by the Department of Agriculture, or some regulation thereunder, feed those crops to our dairy cows and sell the milk or cream, in violation of one of these regulations, we will be subject to a fine not to exceed $5,000 or be sent to the penitentiary, or both.

Listen to the following provision of the bill. In section 6, on page 8, it is provided that—

No certificate of exemption shall be issued and no allotment shall be made to any producer unless he agrees to comply with such conditions and limitations on the production of agricultural commodities by him as the Secretary of Agriculture may, from time to time, prescribe to assure the cooperation of such producer in the reduction programs of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration and to prevent expansion of competitive production by such producer of agricultural commodities other than cotton.

If a person raises 1 pound of cotton and sells it without a certificate of exemption, then the penalties apply.

What is the object of that provision? It is to prevent us from using our surplus acreage to grow dairy feed. Its object is to prevent the expansion of the dairying industry in the South. Every regulation made under that provision is to be enforced, if necessary, by the drastic penalties to which I have just referred.

Some of you talk of reducing these penalties, as if that would change the principle involved. No matter what the penalties are, whenever you tell a farmer that if he violates a law or a regulation by attempting to use his own land for his own benefit, and the benefit of his family, he is subject to be dragged into Federal court and prosecuted as an ordinary criminal, you will do him more harm than all the good that could ever come from the boasted benefits of this legislation. You destroy his initiative, hamper him in the enjoyment of the use of his own property, and deal a blow to the liberties of our people from which they may never recover.

Mr. STUDLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a friendly question?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. STUDLEY. Is the gentleman convinced that 95 percent of the cotton growers of the country are in favor of this bill?

Mr. RANKIN. No. Ninety-five percent of the Members of the House, even on the Democratic side, do not know what is in this bill, much less 95 percent of the farmers. I say that with all deference. The cotton farmers do not know what is in the bill. They are not aware of its drastic provisions. If they were, they would flood this Capitol with protests.

If I thought this measure would relieve the present distressed condition of the farmer without injuring him, God knows I would vote for it. He needs help. Under the N.R.A. and the codes adopted thereunder, the price of everything the farmer has to buy has been raised all out of proportion to the slight advance in the prices of cotton, wheat, and other farm products—and all out of proportion to any advance in the price of cotton which could possibly result from the passage of this bill, even if it worked perfectly and produced the results its advocates claim. The object of this bill seems to be, not to raise the price of cotton but to stabilize it at its present price. The farmer cannot survive under the present inequalities between the prices of what he sells and the prices of what he buys. With all the plowing up of crops, with all the artificial stimulations that have been applied, cotton is cheaper today than it was in 1912, during the Taft administration, when the agricultural States revolted because of the unjust burdens imposed upon them by a high protective tariff, which raised the prices of what they had to buy without raising the prices of what they had to sell; yet today the cotton farmer is selling his cotton for less than he did in 1912 and is paying three or four and, for some articles, five times as much for what he buys as he paid then.

Yet we are asked to pass legislation that merely tends to stabilize him in his present misery. You cannot fool the farmers of this country by such gestures.

The way to help the farmers is to expand the currency, put more money into circulation, thereby raising the prices of farm commodities back to what they were when he contracted his debts or incurred his obligations, including his taxes, and then let him run his own affairs.

The trouble is that we are in a money panic, and have been for 4 or 5 years. It is true that we have cut the gold content of the dollar to about 60 percent, thereby broadening the base for the issuance of currency; but, so far, no new currency has been issued. We have simply cut the gold content of the dollar, collected up all the gold in the country and locked it up, and are now depending upon such legislative or bureaucratic necromancy as this bill provides to bolster the falling prices of farm commodities. I understand they now propose to bring in a bill to reduce the production of milk, with children starving for milk in the congested centers of the country.

I make the bold assertion, without the slightest fear of successful contradiction, that you cannot increase the farmers' income by compelling him to reduce the amount of his production, especially when you deny him the right to raise substitute crops on the land formerly planted in the crop reduced.

I seriously doubt if the passage of this bill will raise the price of cotton 1 cent a pound. The market is now falling on the prospect of its passage. If it should give it a temporary boost, the big cotton factors would clean up millions on the stocks of cotton they now have. Even if it should give the price a permanent impetus, it would stimulate the production of cotton in other countries, and we might soon find that we had driven the cotton-producing industry to other lands, thereby killing the goose that laid the golden egg—for our balance of trade has always depended upon cotton.

By the way, that reminds me, the chief advocates of this policy want to continue to reduce until we get our cotton production down to the American consumption. That would simply devastate the South. Every country in Central and South America can raise cotton. Brazil can raise as much cotton as we can, probably more. She has more territory than the United States has, and it is all in a warm climate. I saw cotton stalks in Haiti a few years ago that were said to be 15 years old. They were higher than a man could reach and had large limbs spreading out in every direction. I was told that in those tropical countries it is not necessary to plant cotton every year, since the stalks live on indefinitely. I examined the staple of that cotton and found that it easily measured up to the short-staple cotton grown in this country.

South America, and especially Brazil, is filling up with people who are thrifty, industrious, and resourceful. Provoke them into a program of cotton production on an extensive scale by such legislation as this, and America will lose her balance of trade which cotton has given her for the last hundred years; and the South will pay the penalty.

Remember, too, that cotton is raised in both Asia and Africa, as well as in Australia.

In my opinion, this is the most dangerous experiment from the standpoint of the southern cotton growers that Congress could indulge in at this time.

Some men talk about getting a world agreement on the limitation of cotton production. Our sad experience in trying to get some international agreements on the limitation of armaments ought to be sufficient to convince anyone of the impossibility of ever getting an international agreement on the reduction of cotton production.

Besides, our most potential competitor in the production of cotton in the future is Brazil. I do not believe Brazil would ever attempt an experiment of this kind again. She tried it a few years ago with reference to the production of coffee. Her experiment not only proved to be disastrous to the coffee producers in the long run, but it provoked so much resentment that it burst into the flames of a revolution which swept over Brazil in 1930, overthrew the administration in power, and placed at the head of the Government the present Chief Executive, President Vargas, probably the ablest President Brazil has ever had.

If we will stop trying to run everybody's business from Washington and expand the currency to meet the present emergency, and put that money into circulation, the prices of farm products will soon rise to their normal values and nobody will be hurt. Cotton should be selling for 20 cents a pound to justify the prices now paid for industrial commodities under the N.R.A.

We promised the American people to put agriculture on a parity with industry. That can be done by an expansion of the currency. We have the gold to do it. We have a sufficient amount of gold that is unassigned to furnish a reserve for the issuance of $7,000,000,000 of currency. If we will only issue two and a half billions of additional currency and put it into circulation, whether by paying off the soldiers' adjusted-service certificates, by paying the running expenses of our Government, or by promoting public improvements, or otherwise, the moment we put this amount of new money into circulation the price of cotton will leap back to where it was before this panic began, and so will the prices of wheat, corn, hogs, land, and other raw materials. Then it will not be necessary to change our form of government or abolish American institutions; then it will not be necessary to pull up the sheet anchors planted by Washington and Jefferson and cast the old ship adrift upon uncharted seas to be guided by dangerous and untried experiments, in order to bring back prosperity.

Mr. Chairman, the provisions of this bill are such that I cannot support it, and the shorter length of life you give it the better chance you will have to overcome the objections to it when you go home. When you get home the people are going to want to know why, since you have been trying to induce them to engage in diversified farming, you are now trying to keep them from doing so by law. This is the first time in this country a man has ever been threatened with a jail sentence for planting peas in his own field or for planting corn on his own land and using the crops for his own benefit in violation of a regulation of someone in the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. DOXEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. DOXEY. Section 26 of this bill does not prohibit a man from planting whatever he wants to plant, so long as it does not go into the markets of trade.

Mr. RANKIN. Of course. But if he plants soybeans or other feed crops on his land to feed his dairy cows to produce milk to send to the condensary or to the creamery in order to produce butter to sell, in violation of a regulation promulgated under this act, then he would be subject to fine and imprisonment.

Mr. DOXEY. Will the gentleman permit a further observation?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. DOXEY. The man that allows his acreage to lie idle will receive benefits from the Government. Does the gentleman think that he should be deprived of these benefits?

Mr. RANKIN. Whenever we demand that he turn his land out and let it grow up in weeds, and he has to pay taxes on it, all the remedial legislation we can put on the statute books will not do him any good. He will ultimately lose more than he could possibly gain.

Mr. DOXEY. Is the gentleman in favor of the benefits he is now receiving or does the gentleman want the farmer to be denied these benefits?

Mr. RANKIN. No. My opinion is that you can at least strike out the penalties. You could at least limit it to 1 year so the people can get rid of it as soon as they find out what it will do to them. You could at least say to the farmer, "You can do as your please with your own land."

Mr. DOXEY. The penalties are in there in order to have some regulation. It is fair to put in something in order to restrict the acreage.

Mr. RANKIN. You have been very liberal with those penalties. May I show what the penalties are?

Mr. DOXEY. I am talking about principle.

Mr. RANKIN. So am I. Here are the penalties:

Any person who violates any provision of this act or any regulation promulgated under this act—shall on conviction be punished by a fine not to exceed $5,000 or by imprisonment for not exceeding 2 years, or both.

And so forth—

Think of a farmer being dragged to Federal court, a hundred miles from home, to be tried by a mixed jury for having raised feed on his own land, fed it to his dairy cows, and then sold the milk to buy shoes for his children, in violation of a regulation issued under this act to aid agriculture.

Or if he happens to make more cotton than the amount allotted to him, and sells it without first paying a tax so heavy that no man can afford to pay it, then he will be subject to these drastic penalties.

By all means this tax provision ought to be stricken from the bill. Better to follow the volunteer reduction plan a thousand times than to force the cotton farmers' heads into this halter.

The power to tax is the power to destroy. Whenever you establish in this Government the right to levy a direct tax on a bale of cotton for one purpose, you establish the right to tax it for all purposes. I cannot think of a more dangerous step the people of the South could take at this time. We have always denied this right, relying upon the Constitution, which plainly prohibits it.

There are more than $68,000,000 in the Federal Treasury now that was taken from the cotton farmers of the South through direct taxation during reconstruction which we have always contended was collected in violation of the Constitution. For nearly 70 years we have demanded its return to the people from whom it was taken. Concede this right of taxation now, get it confirmed, and estop ourselves from protesting in the future—who knows what an unfriendly Congress may do to us in the years to come?

What does this tax amount to? Fifty percent of the value of the cotton, but in no case less than 5 cents a pound.

In the words of Hamlet, we had better—

* * * bear the ills we have
Than fly to others that we know not of.

Mr. Chairman, I want to do everything possible to help, and not to hurt, the cotton farmers. My honest opinion is that this bill in its present form will do them more harm than it will good. It violates the very fundamental principles upon which our free American institutions are founded and embarks us upon a policy which I fear will bring disaster to the very people it is designed to help. We had better pause and ponder now before it is too late.

If a man grows more cotton than his allotment under this bill he cannot sell the surplus without paying the enormous tax to which I have referred. If he does, then the penalties apply. Heretofore our farmers have prayed for an abundant crop in order that they might meet their obligations. I wonder if their prayer in the future is to be "O Lord, send me a crop failure, in order that I may not be more heavily taxed or sent to jail." [Applause.]

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, may I speak a few minutes about some of the assumptions that have been made here in connection with the advocacy of this bill, and they are pure assumptions. I have not attempted to offer an amendment that would affect the bill because you cannot amend a fundamental principle. No amendment to this bill could help the bill and do away with the objections in connection with the fundamental principles involved.

I do not impugn the motives of anyone. I know these gentlemen of the South who are advocating this bill are just as sincere as I am, and they are trying to improve the terrible condition that confronts the people of the South. They assume, however, that because the Secretary of Agriculture has sent out a few questionnaires, that 95 percent of the cotton farmers are in favor of the bill. These questionnaires never went to one half of 1 percent of the cotton farmers, yet the advocates of the bill claim that 95 percent of the cotton farmers favor the bill. They do not have the approval of 1 percent of the cotton farmers. I have not received a single telegram or letter advocating this bill, but I have had a number of them opposing the bill.

Mr. HOPE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. HOPE. Is it not a fact that this bill had not been introduced when the questionnaires were sent out?

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. I presume that is true. I should like to have the Clerk read two telegrams which I have received. I did not bring the letters because they were very lengthy. I received one letter from the former commissioner of agriculture of Texas, one of the greatest students of farm problems I know of, denouncing every principle involved in this bill, and I say that the people of the great State of Texas do not favor this legislation. It violates every principle of liberty and human rights. I have a letter from W. L. Clark, of Douglassville, Ga., denouncing the bill in the strongest terms.

The Clerk read the telegrams, as follows:

FORT WORTH, TEX.

HON. GEORGE B. TERRELL,

Member of Congress:

Not impugning motive Bankhead bill, but consider most inimical attempted legislation against interest of South since the infamous Force bill. If enacted into law would throw 1,000,000 people engaged in growing cotton out of employment. Remedy proposed is 1,000 times worse than disease to be cured.

JOHN M. SCOTT.

GREENWOOD, MISS.

Representative TERRELL of Texas:

Congratulations on your stand taken on the enslavement bill of the South which bears BANKHEAD's name. Neither cotton farmers nor the South want this type of legislation despite the fact that the Agriculture Department's hand-picked answers to 50,000 questionnaires show to the contrary.

A. H. GEORGE.
D. S. WHEATLEY.
B. B. PROVINCE.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question? Mr. TERRELL of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Texas for a brief question.

Mr. PATMAN. Does the gentleman believe in the voluntary plan that we have now in effect?

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. I did not support that plan until after it was enacted. I went home and plowed up 25 percent of my cotton and advocated the plowing up of other cotton in order to reduce the surplus, and I stand for the voluntary principle today. The Secretary of Agriculture has announced that the cotton-production quota allotted for this year has been signed up. Why not let us continue under this voluntary plan?

Mr. PATMAN. Does the gentleman favor some kind of a plan that will make these farmers cooperate who are not now cooperating with their neighbors?

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. You cannot make them cooperate nor make them join any organization in the world, under the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. PATMAN. The gentleman says this is unconstitutional?

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. It certainly is. This bill starts out and says that when two thirds of the cotton farmers favor this bill it shall become effective, and you provide no method of finding out when two thirds favor it. You confer upon the Secretary of Agriculture the right to levy a tax conditioned on the fact that somebody is going to sign a petition to do a certain thing.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. I do not have the time to yield. This tax is either a production tax or it is an export tax and you cannot charge an export tax on anything, because the Constitution, section 9, article 1, says: "No tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State."

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. TERRELL] is a former commissioner of agriculture and a student of these problems. The gentleman takes very little time in the House and I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I thank the House for this extension of time. I feel this situation very keenly. I cannot follow what seems to be the logic of a majority of the House on a measure involving such great fundamental principles.

I say to you that the trouble is not overproduction, it is underconsumption, and I have figures here to show that for the period of time from 1925 to 1929 there was more cotton produced in the world and more produced in the United States than there has been during the past 4 years, and yet the price was almost 20 cents from 1925 to 1929, while during the last 4 years the price has averaged only 12 cents. This shows conclusively that a short crop does not always produce the most money, because in this period the larger crop produced the most money. The world's production during the past 4 years was 4,400,000 bales less than it was during the preceding 4 years, and the United States production during the last 4 years was 2,819,000 bales less than during the previous 4 years.

The average price of cotton during the past 4 years, with 4,400,000 bales less produced than the previous 4 years, was 12.35 cents per pound, with a loss of 7.35 cents per pound and a total loss of $2,050,650,000 to the cotton growers. The same ratio of decline of all other farm products and of livestock can be shown, causing billions of dollars of loss to the farmers—and it is not caused by overproduction.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. Yes.

Mr. PATMAN. If this bill is in the interest of the general welfare, does not the gentleman think we can safely and consistently leave the constitutional part of it to the courts of the country?

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. I presume it would go there, but I am not certain about that, because a Federal court in Florida declared certain provisions of the Agricultural Adjustment Act unconstitutional, but the authorities refused to carry the case to the Supreme Court, and in my own State Federal judges have declared provisions of the N.R.A. unconstitutional, and those decisions have not been appealed to the Supreme Court. They try to enforce these things without giving the courts a chance to say whether they are legal or not.

I cannot subscribe to this kind of legislation. I may stand alone, but I am willing to stand alone in defense of a great principle.

I shall never give my consent to any measure that permits the Government to go into the States and say, "You cannot produce cotton, or you have got to pay a prohibitive tax if you produce more than a certain number of bales of cotton." If the Government can require a man to reduce his production, it can make him increase it and work longer hours, and that would be involuntary servitude. I say any man can produce all the cotton he wants to produce in any State of the Union and gin it there and manufacture it, and the Government has no right to touch him in any way, shape, or fashion under the Constitution. You cannot legally do it, and I do not believe the court is going to stultify itself on a proposition of this kind. I think the courts can be depended on if we can get the matter into the courts, but judging from past experience, it might be enforced 2 or 3 years before we can get a final decision on it. The R.F.C. has not been carried to the courts, and it has been several years since it was enacted. Under this and other laws the Government is lending money to individuals and corporations all over the country; and if it can tax the people to lend to some of them, it can tax them to lend to all the people, and that will break the Government if it is not already broke.

I tell you this is a very serious problem, and the whole trouble has not been overproduction of cotton or wheat or anything else, because during this panic there has been no money in circulation for the people to use to buy the things they need. If you correct the money situation and take its control out of the hands of the men who have run this system for years and years and wrecked it, we will get a good price for all these products. You are making no effort to stop the cotton exchanges from fixing the price from day to day, regardless of the laws of supply and demand. They sell more than a hundred million bales of cotton a year, when there are only twelve to fifteen million bales produced. Why do you not stop that practice?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I agree with the gentleman that the question has not been overproduction but rather underconsumption, but during the 5 years of underconsumption we have created this surplus, and we should not continue, through underconsumption, to increase that surplus.

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. I may say to the gentleman that if conditions get back to normal—as they were from 1918 to 1928 or 1929—in a few years, by taking up 5,000,000 bales of cotton a year, we will take up the surplus in 2 or 3 years; and how do we know but that there will be a failure of a crop? In 1921 there were only 8,000,000 bales grown, and we took up all the surplus and put the price back to 20 cents.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. But the gentleman realizes that there is a surplus which has been created by underconsumption, and this surplus must be disposed of.

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. There is no question about that, but there had never been any cotton destroyed for 150 years until last year. There have always been short crops to take up any surplus, and we can do that in 3 years anyway.

I have not the time, Mr. Chairman, to discuss other phases of the bill, but I am opposed to the principle involved, and for that reason I am against the bill.

Mr. BUSBY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. Yes.

Mr. BUSBY. A recent committee appointed by Columbia University has examined into the phase that we often hear, "Poverty in the midst of plenty", and they have determined that we have undertaken by legislative and administrative procedure to do away with the "plenty" and just leave the "poverty." Does the gentleman agree with that philosophy in connection with this kind of legislation that is doing away with the plenty?

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. Just permit me to say again that if you will control the money of this country and put money in circulation, you will have good prices and plenty of prosperity in this country instead of poverty. [Applause.]

Now in conclusion, if this law is enacted levying a tax on cotton and is upheld by the courts, it permanently establishes the right of Congress to levy a tax of any amount on every bale of cotton. The cotton-growing States have less than one third of the Membership in Congress and will be helpless to prevent the levy of any tax on cotton that the other States might levy to support the Government, and then the Members from the cotton-growing States will be getting what is coming to them by supporting this bill.

Before we adopt this Soviet system of government and Russianize this country, we should submit an amendment to the Constitution and permit the people to change our form of Government from a republic to a despotism, where no personal liberty or property rights are safe. [Applause.]

Mr. CASTELLOW. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words. Mr. Chairman, I desire to address myself particularly to this amendment. I listened very carefully to what has been said, and I have read the amendment carefully. It occurs to me that there is one provision that so far has been overlooked, and I address myself particularly to the author of the amendment.

That amendment reads that the provisions of this act shall be effective only with respect to the crop of 1934-35, but if any time prior to the end of such crop year the President finds that the economic emergency in cotton production and marketing has ceased to exist, he shall so proclaim, and no tax under this act shall be levied with respect to cotton harvested after the effective date of such proclamation.

This would be all right if the crop over the entire Cotton Belt was gathered at the same time, but you who live in the South know that the crop in the southern part of the belt has been often gathered and sent to the market before the crop in the northern part of the Cotton Belt has been gathered. Suppose the farmers in the southern part of the belt have gathered all their crop and paid the taxes, then the President by proclamation declares that the emergency had ceased and the tax consequently suspended. That would give those in the northern part of the belt the opportunity to market their cotton without paying the taxes.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASTELLOW. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. If the word "sold" or "marketed" is used instead of the word "harvested", it would meet the gentleman's objection, so the man who has the cotton in the bins and has not sold it would get the benefit of the proclamation. Will the gentleman suggest that amendment?

Mr. CASTELLOW. I think that suggestion would perfect the amendment, and, Mr. Chairman, I offer that amendment.

Mr. FULMER. The crop year is 1934-35, and that means from the 30th day of June to the 30th day of the next June.

Mr. BUCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASTELLOW. I yield.

Mr. BUCK. On page 21, line 20, of the bill, it says:

The term "crop year" means the period from June 1 of one year to May 31 of the succeeding year, both dates inclusive.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia offer an amendment?

Mr. CASTELLOW. I have offered the amendment, and it seems to be accepted by the author of the original amendment; but, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out in the second to the last line of the amendment the word "harvested" and insert in lieu thereof the word "marketed."

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASTELLOW. I yield.

Mr. JONES. I want to say to the gentleman that that will defeat the whole purpose of the bill. If the cotton has been sold, he would have paid the tax. This would last for only 1 year, and the man who does not sell will not have to pay the tax.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 25 minutes.

Mr. PARKER. I reserve the right to object. If the gentleman will modify his request so that it applies only to this amendment, I shall have no objection. If this amendment is voted down, then I have an amendment that I want to offer later, which I shall want to discuss for 5 minutes.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my request for the present.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I have great regard for the gentlemen who are sponsoring this legislation. I have made a rather casual examination but no very deep study of the proposed legislation. It is so out of line with anything that I have ever believed to be in accordance with the spirit of American Government that even though it is supposed to apply to the section of the country that I come from, I find myself up to the present time wholly antagonistic to it. I cannot, to save my life, see how we are carrying out that provision of one of the documents to which we like to refer when we speak of the greatness of our country which says:

We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, and among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

I think this bill is wholly antagonistic to that.

Mr. DRIVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. Yes.

Mr. DRIVER. Did the gentleman support the measure on authorizing the building of codes of fair practice?

Mr. BUSBY. I did not. I referred a while ago to an expression that is often used, when the gentleman from Texas [Mr. TERRELL] was speaking, that we have a great many people who are hungry and starving in a land of plenty, that we have want in the midst of plenty. Now we propose to remove the plenty and leave the starving, suffering, and want. It is very well understood that 15,000,000 people who are on charity and in the bread line are not to be counted in the purchasing and consuming class when we come to put into effect the law of supply and demand. They are taken out because they have no purchasing power, and I do not believe that the destruction of 5,000,000 pigs to prevent the production of pork will feed these people, nor do I believe that the destruction of four or five million bales of cotton will clothe them.

I believe we are traveling in the wrong direction. We can never pay our debts by borrowing nor can we feed and clothe the hungry and suffering by destroying food and clothing. If destruction makes prosperity, there was enough property destroyed in the World War to bring prosperity to all nations for a generation to come. Destruction is not the way to pay debts and bring the comforts of life to a destitute and suffering people. Destroying property is solely for selfish purposes and for no other reason than to hold up the supply and dig a little heavier into the pockets of him who has yet a little buying power remaining. I may vote for this bill—and gentlemen may be surprised to hear me say that—but I shall have to learn more about its merits than I know now. It is wholly antagonistic to our spirit of government; and if we are going to apply the provisions of this bill, we ought to go to Russia and get the whole program and put it into effect at once. This is worse in some respects than the practices in Russia. Why put it on by piecemeal? We ought to put it onto the wheat grower, the cattle raiser, and the butter producer. If we are going to apply the Russian program and take away from the individual the right he has to work to produce, we are leaving nothing of the principles of freedom of which Americans boast. I cannot conceive of a jury in my section of the country convicting a man for going out and producing cotton and selling that cotton on the open market to the best advantage. This bill is all wrong in principle, gentlemen. It hurts the little fellows.

The truth about it is that we are limited to such a short period of time in this bill that you can get hold of a fellow and do everything to him before the Supreme Court of the United States can say that the law is wholly antagonistic to the fundamental principles of our Constitution and Government. What has become of that amendment to the Constitution that reads—

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people.

What are you going to do with that provision of the Constitution when you come to enact this kind of raiding legislation, that will go into a man's home and drag him out with a criminal writ because he labored to produce that which is beneficial to mankind? I cannot see the principle. I am sorry that we have drifted into this sort of thing in order to experiment with a situation at the expense of the personal rights of the individual person. Slavery of a type will be forced upon us by this kind of legislation.

Mr. MAY. Does the gentleman feel—if we can control the number of bales of cotton by this bill that a man may sell—that we may by another bill control the number of carloads of coal that a coal operator may load?

Mr. BUSBY. There is no difference between that and this proposition. If you can put this into effect, you can do almost anything that will curtail labor and production. A Federal office will supervise every act of our farmers in a few years. Where will our boasted liberty and freedom be then?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last four words.

Mr. Chairman, the amendment that is offered is offered in good faith, but it will wreck this bill if it is adopted. The effect of it will be to destroy the bill and not help it, and I am sure the gentleman does not want to do that. Patrick Henry said, "Give me liberty or give me death." The cotton farmer has said, "If you give me 5-cent cotton again, you give me death"—financially, at least.

It is not the purpose of this bill to try to force anything on anybody. I am surprised at the argument made by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Busby]. The gentleman talks about cotton as though he thought it might be eaten like potatoes. It is a commodity which we have to sell partly in export trade. It is an article that we can carry over, and the principle of this bill has no compulsory feature about it. Does any man on the floor of this House, either Republican or Democrat, deny that the principle of democracy is that the majority should control? In this case it is not only a majority but a two-thirds majority must control.

Two thirds of the farmers growing cotton must say that they want this plan before it goes into effect. If you limit this to 1 year, what do you do? Anyone who has studied this bill knows that the real intent and purpose of the bill is to take off an orderly market about 10,000,000 bales of the surplus cotton. If you take off four or five million bales, the purpose of the act will fail. If you limit it to 1 year, that would mean absolute failure for the bill. If you take it off for 2 years, taking off 5,000,000 bales each year, and take off 10,000,000 bales, then you will make this an absolute success. It is the belief of the Department and it is the belief of those who have studied it and the belief of every cotton farmer and every representative, as far as I know, from the South who has studied this plan that with the acreage reduction we have reduced 40 percent, and we will have a normal crop next year, for that acreage will produce about nine and one half million bales, not exceeding 10,000,000 bales. This bill simply dovetails into the other reduction plan and makes it effective.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLOVER. I yield.

Mr. PARSONS. Is there any provision here as to how much money this will take from the Treasury of the United States to pay the cotton farmer for this reduction?

Mr. GLOVER. The gentleman certainly ought to know that it would not take a dollar from the Treasury. The gentleman should know, if he has studied the plan of reduction of acreage, that the processing tax put on produces a sufficient sum of money that will pay for every acre they have taken out, and more, as for that matter.

Mr. PARSONS. How much processing tax does it require?

Mr. GLOVER. It is now 4.3, and with the consumption of cotton in the United States it brings about $127,000,000.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLOVER. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. As I interpret the bill, it is limited for 2 years now?

Mr. GLOVER. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The amendment of my colleague from Georgia is to limit it to 1 year?

Mr. GLOVER. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The committee thinks that the phraseology, clothing the President with finding an emergency and a 2-year limit, protects it sufficiently to say whether or not this is a workable plan?

Mr. GLOVER. The farmer must pass on it first, and I think the President has a big job on his hands now, and we ought not load him down with this. We ought to legislate and put it into the bill and assume our responsibility.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. As a matter of fact, it is a limitation of 2 years, in any event?

Mr. GLOVER. Absolutely.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLOVER. I yield.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 more minute, in order to answer my colleague.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER. As a matter of fact, does not section 3 itself supply the answer to all the arguments for this amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia? Before the act can go into force next year there must be this referendum, and the Secretary must find that two thirds of these people want it. Will not that section serve the very purpose which this amendment seeks to serve?

Mr. GLOVER. Absolutely so.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLOVER. I yield.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. The act does not say that.

Mr. MILLER. Yes; it does; section 3.

Mr. GLOVER. I think it is the intent and purpose of the Department of Agriculture to submit the question on this bill before it goes into effect, and I hope it will, and will submit it again next year and let the farmers themselves say whether they want it or not. This gives them a way to control it themselves.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to address myself very briefly to a few of the practical aspects of this situation. I want to call attention to the fact that many cotton mills are now utilizing their looms—in fact, increasing the number of their looms—to weave rayon instead of cotton. There are mills now weaving rayon that prior to the N.R.A. never used rayon at all. One mill is now taking 50,000 pounds of rayon weekly, and it does not plan to utilize cotton from now on. Another manufacturer shifted from cotton to rayon and sold the new product from 300 looms in 1 month. This particular manufacturer claims that he could dispose of a much larger volume of rayon products if he could procure more looms.

This condition has been brought about by the program of the N.R.A. A fight has now been precipitated between the cotton and rayon interests. It is now sought to have a compensatory tax on rayons. The rayon interests are opposing this tax with great vigor. The situation is not difficult to visualize. Costs of garment manufacturers have been increased by the N.R.A.; also prices asked for cloth have been advanced. Buyers of garments—that is, the consumers—have shifted to the rayon garments which cost less.

Both cotton manufacturers and rayon manufacturers are suffering because of the uncertainty as to when and to what extent a compensatory tax on rayon will affect cost of production of these two important and competing industries.

I fear this bill will add just one more uncertainty to the many problems that have already been created by previous so-called "emergency measures."

Now, another practical side of this question. I am speaking, because I am very friendly and should like to be helpful, but there is another practical situation which confronts you people in the cotton section. Only a few years ago the price of hard coal was put up to a very high point.

I happened to be in New England, in the city of Worcester. Looking into the park I saw a little building around which a crowd had gathered. I inquired what was going on and was told that an expert was there teaching the people of Worcester how to use substitutes for hard coal, how to use soft coal. And I say to you, Mr. Chairman, as a result of that situation, the hard-coal people have never regained their market in that section, and they probably never will.

Now, what you are doing by these uncertainties is to educate the people to use rayon; and right before your eyes now in a practical way you are seeing your cotton looms used for the manufacture of rayon. Every day these uncertainties continue, more and more you are going to impinge upon the natural output of your cotton. I am speaking in the most friendly way, but the facts and figures demonstrate precisely what I am telling you here today.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, there is no more important bill pending in Congress to the farmers and to the South, including both the landowners and tenant or share croppers. Cotton is the principal farm product in the South over an extensive area and has been for a century. The price of cotton has been depressed for years. The fluctuations in the price of cotton unfavorably affect not only the producers of cotton but everybody that is dependent upon the money received from its sale. I own much farm land myself. Cotton is extensively grown in Oklahoma and in the district which I represent. A little more than a year ago cotton was selling around 5 cents per pound. The landowner cannot pay upkeep and taxes on his land at such a ruinously low price. The tenant farmers and share croppers cannot grow cotton at that price. The merchants and others who depend upon money coming from cotton suffer financially, as do all others depending upon the farmers.

This bill is temporary and experimental. After this year the Secretary of Agriculture must find that two thirds of the cotton farmers favor it. It continues for 2 years, and the President may extend it another year. It limits the amount of cotton that may be produced without a tax, and prorates that to States and counties, and finally to individual farmers. It gives the Secretary of Agriculture broad powers. Finally it places a heavy tax of 50 percent on the production in excess of the amount allowed. Congress passed the Agricultural Adjustment Act last year which provided for a voluntary reduction in the acreage planted to cotton. This bill provides for a compulsory reduction through an excise tax upon excess production. It fixes the maximum that may be produced, free of tax, for the 1934 season at 10,000,000 bales of cotton. It is estimated there are between ten and eleven million bales of carry-over cotton. There is therefore a real necessity for keeping the production of cotton down.

The question is asked, Why not follow the voluntary plan rather than this compulsory plan? The answer is that through the use of fertilizer the acreage, under the voluntary plan, can be reduced but the production greatly increased. It is easy to increase the production of cotton by at least one fourth, if not more, through the use of fertilizer, and the farmers able to buy fertilizer have an advantage. What we are trying to reach is reduction in production. This bill, therefore, changes the method adopted last year from a reduction in acreage to a reduction in production. That is exactly what we are trying to accomplish. If the production for 1934 can be held down to 10,000,000 bales, every farmer producing cotton can be assured of a fair price.

As I have stated, this bill is experimental. The cotton farmers as a whole who have studied the bill favor it. There may be a number of objections as to details, some of which may be changed.

I think that the proposed amendment to section 6 is rather broad and should be more clearly defined. It is the amendment that requires that before a certificate of exemption shall be issued that the producer must agree—

To comply with such conditions and limitations on the production of agricultural commodities by him as the Secretary of Agriculture may from time to time prescribe to secure the cooperation of such producers in the reduction programs of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration.

The Secretary of Agriculture must administer the act, but I should like to see these regulations made a sufficient time in advance so that the cotton farmers may be informed what they are, so there may be no abrupt changes in the regulations.

It is urged that the taxing provisions of the bill are unconstitutional. A brief has been inserted in the RECORD, prepared by an Assistant to the Attorney General of the United States, upholding the constitutionality of the bill. In view of this opinion and the authorities therein cited, I feel justified in voting for the bill.

By holding down production to 10,000,000 bales for the coming year a better price for cotton will be assured to the farmers, which, as I have stated, will result to their benefit and to the benefit of everyone depending upon them. Unfortunately, the farmers of the country have been unable to pay their taxes for several years, and this has resulted in the reduction of school terms. For my part, in these distressing times, I am willing to try this bill. It may need to be amended. I am willing to assist in perfecting it.

If this reduction of production plan is put into effect, the remaining land can be profitably planted to other crops, which will result in rotation and which will be helpful to keeping up or restoring the fertility of the land. If every farmer could own his own farm and acquire a team, tools, a few hogs and cows and chickens, raise a good garden, and be induced to diversify his crops, he will be on the road to better living. He should be encouraged to live off his farm as far as possible.

Of course, the farmers and those dependent upon them must be patient. Congress is trying to help them. Our steps of progress, which we hope will be continuous and upward, will be slow and beset with many difficulties.

The first step is to try to help the farmer secure a better price for his farm products. He cannot grow 5-cent cotton, 14-cent corn, 12-cent oats, 25-cent wheat, and he cannot sell his hogs, cattle, and poultry at such ruinously low prices. In the years that have gone Congress has enacted legislation that has discriminated against the farmers, and they are entitled to all the favorable legislation now that Congress can enact.

We must have a foreign market for cotton, as we export about two thirds of the cotton produced. We have through tariff legislation discriminated against the cotton farmers in the past, and this legislation will in a measure overcome that discrimination.

About one fourth of the people of the Nation live on the farm, but a very much larger number are dependent upon the prosperity of the farmers, and the farmers have been in deep distress for 10 years. Their purchasing power is gone. We experimented in the Agricultural Adjustment Act and measurably helped the farmers. I am going to vote for this bill, believing that it is a step in the right direction and an effort to be of further benefit to the farmers and those dependent upon them.

Much will depend upon the administration of this bill. Without additional legislation farm lands are of little value. The ad valorem taxes are too high and the price of farm products too low. This bill restricts cotton production, and it must result in an increased price for the cotton raised. We have enacted much legislation for the benefit of farmers during the past year. His condition looks better. I think this legislation will enable the cotton producer to secure a fair and better price for his cotton.

We passed the Agricultural Adjustment Act, which provided for the cotton-option plan and other benefits to agriculture, for which this bill is intended as a substitute so far as the production of cotton is concerned.

We amended the rural credit bill, which provides for long-time loans through Federal land banks at low rates of interest to the farmers, and recently amended it again by guaranteeing the principal of the bonds as well as the interest, so as to make available money out of which loans may be advanced.

We passed two crop-production loan bills. The more recent one, a few days ago, makes available $40,000,000 out of which loans may be made to farmers for crop production during the present year.

Congress, in the National Recovery Act, earmarked $400,000,000 for road construction, which is of great interest and benefit to the farmers for many reasons. In the first place, its purpose is to connect every community with a marketing center, which would reduce the cost of hauling crops to the market. Second, it will add permanent value to farm lands; and, third, during this time of the depression, when the farmers are so sorely in distress, it provided work for them with which to secure money to buy clothing, books for their children, and other necessities for the members of their families.

In the National Recovery Act we appropriated $3,300,000,000 for work of various kinds, much of it in the agricultural States will go to those who live on the farm.

Congress amended the bank act so as to insure bank deposits up to $2,500, and in a larger sum after July 1, 1934. This is for the protection of the farmers as well as all other depositors.

Recently Congress enacted legislation in aid of livestock and the dairy industry, adding these to the basic agricultural products.

As I have already stated, this bill is a further step in the direction of assisting the farmers. We increased the price of cotton through legislation enacted a year ago, and this legislation, if enacted, in my judgment, will further increase the price of cotton, so that the farmers of the South will be able to secure the cost of production plus a reasonable profit. It will result in encouraging a back-to-the-farm movement. If in the administration of this bill, when enacted, it is found that it needs further amending, we should have the patience and the courage to do it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Does the gentleman believe that the principles embodied in this legislation ought to be applied to all forms of agricultural commodities?

Mr. HASTINGS. I have not studied the principles as applied to other agricultural products, and the Committee on Agriculture has not considered the matter; but if two thirds of the producers of other agricultural commodities indicate they want to try it, I do not see any reason why they should not be given the opportunity.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last six words.

Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to make any extended remarks in regard to this legislation, because I am not sufficiently acquainted with the details of the bill or with the production, manufacture, and sale of cotton. On the other hand, I do not believe that I would be doing my duty as a Representative if I did not at this time protest against the fundamental principle of compulsion carried in this bill. In my judgment, this is entirely un-American in every respect and against every fundamental principle of the right of man to do with his own property what he sees fit provided he does no harm to his neighbor. This has been one of the boasted American liberties from the very beginning of our Government, and I am absolutely opposed to destroying or in any way abridging that principle.

As far as cotton itself is concerned, I am as friendly to that as I am to any other agricultural product; but my fear is that this is a part of a well-designed plan not only to apply this principle to cotton, but in turn, step by step, to apply it to every other agricultural product and eventually to industrial products. It is another one of the carefully devised and concealed plans of the present administration to drive us directly into a collective state; and I am opposed to that and shall oppose that principle in any legislation that comes before us for consideration.

I have read the hearings very carefully. In the first place, I do not see how it got out of the Committee on Agriculture, for the members of that committee took practically the same position I am taking at the present time; they were opposed to the compulsory provision of this bill. I read very carefully what Secretary Wallace said. About the only approval he gave to this bill was to state that if Congress passed the law and the South country wanted to submit themselves to the experiment he would be willing to try it out.

No matter how many questions you asked, you could not get him to approve of the compulsory principle that is carried in this bill. I read the testimony of some of the other gentlemen from the South who testified before the committee. They said the people that voted on these slips that were sent out were for some kind of control, but they wanted a control that would be left to themselves to decide upon each year. As far as the vote that was sent in in reply to the 40,000 letters is concerned, the Secretary of Agriculture himself testified that 1,036,000 men were on the rolls last year and the bulk of the reports that came in were from the committeemen who were doing the work for the administration. I claim that that is not a fair cross-section, and furthermore that the average cotton producer knows nothing about the compulsory provisions of this bill. I am not so much opposed to that, because it is up to the South to take care of themselves. It is the principle that I am opposing.

Furthermore, if I understand the condition of the cotton industry at the present time, it is in better shape than any of the other agricultural commodities. There is no special emergency. Your own committee brought out the fact that the present plan is working very well; and, according to Mr. Wallace's testimony, if the voluntary plan is carried out, he hopes that it will limit the crop to about 10,000,000 bales next year, which is practically all you are asking for under this law. In a general way, cotton is no worse off than any other industry; and while I am willing to aid it, you are in better shape today than the dairy industry of the North, and I can see no special emergency why at this time you should pass this bill. Certainly the hearings before the Agriculture Committee does not in any way justify its passage.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment and all amendments thereto close at the end of 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Chairman, we are now to consider the very illuminating principle and theory of raising less to have more. Because this policy is confusing, is the reason I am prompted to make these observations here today.

We are told that the people of this country are starving because we are raising too much food. We are told that the people are freezing and shivering in the cold and inclement weather because we are producing too much clothing material. We are told that the people are shelterless because we are providing too many roofs, walls, and houses for their protection against the chill, the rain, the snow, and the inclement extremes of temperatures.

Mr. Chairman, can all this be true? Are we ready to enter upon the wholesale destruction of food, clothing, and shelter material without more investigation before we take such step? I cannot endorse this principle. I do not approve of this policy. I do not believe that a superabundance of food will starve the people. I do not believe that a superabundance of clothing material will leave them shivering in the cold. I do not believe that a superabundance of building material nor the construction of too many houses will leave the people shelterless and exposed to the elements. There is something wrong, something overlooked here. There is some deficiency, some want of knowledge of the facts, some failure to realize the relation of cause and effect.

I am an individualist as far as I am personally concerned. I want to live my own life. I want to make my own world around me. The whole joy and pleasure of life is the right to live as we love to live and not as some other man chooses or dictates how we shall live.

This is a bill, a resort to law, by compulsion to control and direct farm operations. With the strong arm of the Federal Government reaching out to prescribe and direct, the kind of crops and the acreage are to be determined with Federal inspectors sent out to oversee farm operations and crop cultivation. Under a policy, system, or plan, farm values and prices are to be raised by creating a scarcity among the people and thereby to compel people to pay more for less, regardless of whether they have more to pay with. This is not only a policy of questionable morals and equity, it is a policy of questionable merit, to be tried out as an experiment, with no one to guarantee the results, that arbitrary control will raise the price level nor to assure it will not work a hardship upon those suffering for want of sufficient food and clothing.

But this will concern only cotton planters and their crop-sharing tenants. No cotton is grown in my district or State. I am therefore not personally concerned, except with the principles to be established. The claim is made here that southern Members and farmers are agreed and are a unit for this bill. While I am opposing the principles of this legislation, I am constrained to leave to the South what concerns only the people of the South. And while for this reason I may not vote against the bill, I will not vote for it in approval of the principle.

After all, this may be the more effective way to bring the farmers of the Southern States to a realization that they are surrendering their long-cherished principle of local self-government and inviting centralized bureaucratic control and powers to dominate over their personal individual affairs.

Mr. Chairman, all of the wars of the world have been fought over or resisting the claim of the right of one man to tell another man how he should live, what he loves best, and what is good for him. The liberty of one man ends only where the freedom of another man begins.

I practice law alone, and I would rather practice in the lower courts by myself than practice before robed judges constrained by arbitrary law-firm rules and to participate in fees earned without the sanction of conscience. I would rather do a small law business in an individual character than to do a larger law business in a firm without freedom to accept or reject an offer of employment or to determine the equity of the cause to prosecute or defend.

Mr. Chairman, I want to breathe and contemplate nature in my own way. I want to worship God, abiding by the dictates of my own conscience and my own heart, and not as some other man would have me worship.

I have a farm in Indiana where I go to live my own life, where I want to live and labor as I choose to live and labor, where I love to work in the open sunlight and earn my bread by the sweat of my brow. I want to live there abiding by my own determinations and without some other man's coming in, or claiming authority, to tell me what I shall do or how I shall live or how I shall labor to live. All that I ask of my Government is to safeguard me in the right to enjoy the fruits of my labor.

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe it is necessary for us to destroy all individual initiative or for us to destroy our free competitive system of industry to eradicate the evils that have come into our system.

Overproduction is not the cause of our trouble. I propose to ask time of this House some day to explain why it is that the people of this country are in want, suffering, and distress in the midst of plenty and great abundance. This is not a phenomenon, a mystery. This is the result of a financial conspiracy carried out under a secret gentleman's agreement and under the form of modern high finance.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for a few more minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAY. I do not believe our economic condition, resulting from a fall of values and the price level and brought on by the contraction of money and credit, calls for a surrender by the individual of his freedom, liberty, and right of initiative; his right to live his own life and make his own world around him.

I do not believe a remedy of our economic ills requires a reduction or suspension of our free competitive system of industry under which, under the laws of supply and demand, the human race has made such forward strides in progress and the means of production of all the vital and necessary elements in our economic life.

I do not believe that an eradication of the evils of monopoly and restraint of trade, nor a restoration of industrial peace and harmony, nor that a just, fair, and equitable apportionment of the earnings and income from industry among employers and employees of production, nor that safeguarding the welfare of the consuming public, require that we break down all the checks, restraints, and barriers provided by our forefathers under the Constitution to safeguard against tyranny and usurpation, the impositions of selfish human nature and personal ambition for place and power.

I do not believe that the bloody battles for individual liberty and freedom have all been fought in vain. I do not believe that we must surrender and give up all our forefathers won at sacrifice of life and treasure only to be fought and won over again by our posterity to gain back what we have surrendered.

I do not believe we must tear down the citadels of human rights; I do not believe that we must destroy our free competitive system of industry to eradicate the evils of selfish human nature. I do not believe that we must scuttle the ship of state to rid the vessel of the rodents of abuse of power.

I believe we can preserve all our cherished institutions of civil liberty, freedom and independence, the right and initiative of the individual man, our free competitive system of industry, under which human accomplishments have become a marvel, and our own system of free representative government and the right of individual, self-determination under which we have urged the peoples of the world to follow our example, to more complete fulfillment of the ideals of free institutions, and to the plane of a higher and a more exalted civilization.

We have fought our way through fire, carnage, and bloodshed at the cost of treasure and sacrifice of life to establish free self-government, to guarantee to every man an equal voice in public affairs, and to safeguard the individuals in liberty, freedom, and the rights of property. And to safeguard all these our forefathers have provided for the separation of powers as a check upon selfish human nature encroaching upon liberty and the rights of man. I appreciate their great sacrifice. I respect their wisdom and judgment. And I am opposed to breaking down by invasion, disregard, precedent, or otherwise these great safeguards of free institutions and self-government.

And after they have sacrificed all these and provided in the Constitution for a separation of the powers of government in order to safeguard against oppression and usurpation, I want to preserve the vital injunctions provided. I want to preserve the right of individual initiative, our free, competitive system of industry. I want to preserve our form of government as it is. I do not believe it is necessary for us to combine the legislative and the judicial and the executive in one body. The power will not be abused today by Presidents of our time, but it may be taken advantage of in the future under some other Presidents, who will take advantage to abuse and usurp such power. [Applause.]

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Chairman, it is a very practical question that is before us today, and in the brief time allotted to me I will give you the particular angle from which persons intending to vote for this bill view it.

I say, in all frankness, that as an old-fashioned individualist, believing in the law of supply and demand, hating the regulation of men's liberties, personal, political, business, industrial, or anything else, any further than absolutely and indispensably necessary, it punishes me to be for this kind of principle in a bill. I shall not undertake to answer the constitutional and the political arguments of my friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], and yet he is absolutely, while sincere here today, just as wrong as a man can be upon the practical aspects of this problem.

Cotton last year brought twice as much as it did the year before, and why? Purely because the Government paid the farmers of the South to plow up land they had already planted in cotton.

The Congress of the United States 50 or 60 years ago first humored the manufacturers of this Nation by throwing tariff bounties to their infant industries, and they have been on our necks ever since and they will never get off. Then it humored the banking institutions of the Nation, and they have all the privileges and legal rights and all the money in their control and now are doing nothing with it at all except buying United States bonds. Then we helped the wheat and corn farmers of the Northwest with a farm bill, and they are on our necks all the time; and last year we humored also the cotton farmers with large financial gratuities. And now it is quite evident that the Government will have as much difficulty in satisfying them as it has had with the tariff manufacturers, the wheat and corn farmers, and the bankers. It is absolutely impossible to begin experiments of regulation and prohibitions and financial benefits to any class and then end it at will. Last year the cotton farmers bought 11,000,000 pounds of fertilizer. Already this year they have contracted for 175,000,000. It is clear that multitudes are going to plant and intensively cultivate more cotton, in which event cotton will not bring 5 cents a pound or be worth picking down South if we do not meet the situation in a practical manner. Then they will come to Congress and the administration again and say, "We cannot pay our bills, we cannot pay our taxes and interest, we cannot run our schools—help us or we perish."

Since it is an indispensable necessity to attend to that matter, why not do the rational thing and tax the life out of any cotton raised on new land and tax the life out of any cotton raised on land we paid them with a bonus last year to plow up? The result will be about 9,000,000 or 10,000,000 bales of cotton, bringing 15 cents a pound, and then our people can maintain their civilization without a wreck and buy the products of your factories in the North, so that you will not suffer collapse.

Two months ago I put an interview in the papers of Texas, which was written in plain words, to this general effect.

I know that the farmers in my State of Texas have not written me even a postal card protesting against this bill, and I have had 609 letters and post cards approving of the measure.

Theoretically, this bill is wrong. Theoretically, during the last few years we have many times done the wrong thing. But we are still in the midst of this emergency; all we have done is to palliate, to hold up the status quo, and, unless we do a few other things, we never will get out of this depression. Let us pass this bill, and its effect will, we hope, be to raise less cotton, so that it will bring an adequate price and thus operate further to start up the hill of recovery.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who has just questioned the constitutionality of this bill and who spoke against the bill, nailed himself to the Constitution by stating that this bill is unconstitutional. He is nailing the cotton farmers of the South to poverty when he does it. I am no lawyer, but I am a farmer, and I know that my farmers are more interested in legislation that will guarantee a fair price for their cotton than they are in a technical discussion of the constitutionality of this bill. The adoption of this amendment to limit the operation of this bill for 1 year will absolutely destroy the program of our cooperating farmers to reduce the cotton surplus. The program is to reduce that surplus of 13,000,000 bales gradually, so that we can be assured a living wage for our people during the years we are reducing this surplus. Another southern gentleman who opposes the bill says that it will throw a million people out of employment. If he will go to the relief records of the South, he will see that there were a million people on the relief rolls in the South. Why?

The people who were on the relief rolls were on there because cotton sold at 5 and 6 cents a pound during President Hoover's administration. Five- and six-cent cotton brought our people to the relief rolls. Do you want to keep them there? Do you want to throw 10,000,000 more people of the South onto the relief rolls? If you do, defeat this bill. If my colleagues from the Northern States want to destroy our buying power in the South so that we cannot buy your manufactured products of the North, defeat this bill.

Cotton is the only money crop we have in the South, and at 5 and 6 cents a pound our farmers cannot live. I have seen my people wearing overalls, I have seen them go without the necessities of life, I have seen them go on the relief rolls of the Nation, something that was never done before. Do you want to keep them there? I am confident that 3 out of every 4 farm homes in the South were mortgaged when cotton was selling for $100 a bale or more. Thousands of our farmers have lost their homes and thousands more stand to lose their homes if we fail to reduce this surplus of 13,000,000 bales and cotton goes back to 5 cents a pound. There has been no sale for cotton farms during the last 4 years, but the passage of this bill will cause our people once again to go to buying homes.

The passage of this bill insures reduction of the surplus, prevents chiseling, guarantees fair play as regards the production among the various cotton States, and will restore confidence. With this program of control our people can pay their debts and buy farm homes. In 1928 the export of raw cotton was $900,000,000.

Why? Because it brought 20 cents a pound. Last year there was only $395,000,000 exported because it only brought 10 cents a pound. This results in a national loss of a half billion dollars in 1 year.

Do you want to restore the balance of trade? Do you want to restore the prosperity of the country? I want to see not only the South but the North, the East, and the West, and every section of this country prosperous. I want prosperity to come to all the people in the Nation, and if we prosper in the cotton States our prosperity will be reflected in other sections of the Union.

We are here pleading for this bill because we believe that we know the needs of our people better than those from other sections. If our people did not want it, gentlemen, we, as their Representatives, would not be here asking for it.

The reason this legislation is here is because a Senator from Alabama, Hon. JOHN H. BANKHEAD, last year put an amendment on to a bill securing $100,000,000 for the cotton growers who cooperated in the plow-up campaign. The plow-up was so successful and the cotton farmers were so well pleased that the people throughout the Cotton Belt appealed to him and their various representatives in Congress to enact legislation that will limit the number of bales that can be produced. This law is in addition to the volunteer reduction program where the farmer is being paid rent to keep 40 percent of his lands out of the production of cotton. I know that 3 years ago you could not have made a cotton farmer in the entire South believe that the Federal Government would ever pay a rental for him to take his land out of cotton production so as to reduce the surplus. Yet there are those who will not cooperate. We cannot reduce this surplus without this bill. The lure of high-priced cotton has already caused an increase in the sales of fertilizer over last year. Farm mules have been shipped into the South by the thousands.

In my own State they have increased the fertilizer sales by 100 percent, and in Arkansas they have increased sales 400 percent. In one section of Texas they plowed up 200,000 acres of land that has been in grass, and half of it is going into cotton. We will produce fifteen or sixteen million bales of cotton this year if this bill is not passed, and cotton will go down to 5 cents.

If we did not plant an acre of cotton this year, nor buy a pound of fertilizer nor gin a single bale this fall, there is enough surplus cotton to keep the spindles of the world running until the summer of 1935. The surplus is our enemy and determines the price. The patriotic farmer is willing to make a sacrifice. Regardless of the number of bales he grew last year, you will find he will be willing to cooperate with the Government by growing only his part of the 10,000,000 bales, so as to hold up the price and reduce the surplus. The farmer would rather grow one bale and get $75 for it than to grow two bales for $75. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I hope the friends of this bill will not help to wreck it. I conceive a man being doubtful about the underlying philosophy of the bill, but if you are for the bill, let us give it a chance at its white alley. The thing is safeguarded in every way. It is only for 2 years, and in order to have it go into effect the second year two thirds of those engaged in the production must join in the request, and the third year two thirds must join in the request, and there must also be a proclamation by the President, and then it is safeguarded further by a provision that the President may at any time during any of the period end this bill. I think that is pretty good protection. If it is not working, there is not any question about ending it. If it is working, let us not handicap it now but give it a chance to work. I admit that it is a far-reaching bill, but I have noticed that many of these men who have been criticizing it apparently have not read the bill. My own colleague, for whom I have high regard, said there was no provision with respect to drought or flood. There is a direct provision for that so that the allotment may be fair, and the Secretary of Agriculture is given authority to take all those things into consideration. If you defeat this bill, I predict that cotton will fall 2 cents a pound within 24 hours. I believe that as firmly as I believe that I am standing here. Whatever might be its results as a long-range program, that undoubtedly would be the temporary result of a failure to enact it.

There has been a good deal of demand for cotton throughout the world, and a larger demand this year than usual, because of some tendency to warlike preparations. But with 9,000,000 bales of American cotton in America and additional American cotton abroad and still additional millions of foreign cotton, to put that alongside a program that is going to produce a lot of cotton is likely to produce 4- or 5-cent cotton, and today it looks as if those who live in the South who are supposed to be friends of the South must take the responsibility, and I know at whose feet it will lay. They talk about the program of last year. That was a plow-up program, but it was too late to use additional fertilizer. I have an Associated Press account in my hand in which it says that indicated sales of fertilizer in eight Southern States in January, embracing the chief cotton-growing section, are estimated to have been the largest for that month in 4 years, or since the first month of 1930, and that tag sales for the past month call for the labeling of 276,000 short tons, more than double the 129,000 tons in the first month of 1933.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I am sorry. I know what the gentleman is going to say, that back in certain other years there was more fertilizer sold. True. That happened to follow up a period when it was natural to have more fertilizer and when there was more money for that purpose. To answer one other question raised by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN], about who is responsible for the price of cotton, I shall put in a chart showing that for 10 years there is a vital relationship between the carry-over and the price of cotton. This chart shows the price ranges from 5 cents a pound to 23 cents a pound depending upon the carry-over, and today we have one of the largest carry-overs in the history of the Nation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. Without objection, all pro forma amendments are withdrawn. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CASTELLOW] to the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have the amendment again reported.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RANKIN) there were—ayes 14, noes 55.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BROWN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RAYBURN) there were—ayes 21, noes 56.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. PARKER moves to amend section 2 by striking out all the language of the section, beginning with the word "but" in line 18, page 2, and ending with the figures "1937" in line 24, page 2. Also, substitute the figures "1935-1936" for the figures "1936-1937" in line 25 on page 2.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 6 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment merely provides that the legislation be enacted for 2 years. Its language is plain and certain. It means that the provisions of the bill are to apply to the crop years 1934-35 and 1935-36. It also provides that, if the President finds the economic emergency in cotton production and marketing has ceased to exist, he shall so proclaim and that no tax, under the act, shall be levied with respect to cotton harvested after the effective date of such proclamation.

In other words, it does not change the bill, except that it cuts out the third year. I hope the committee will agree to let the legislation be enacted for a period of 2 years. I am certain that we can test it out thoroughly in 2 years' time, and if it is good legislation we can continue it. If it is not good, and if it is not going to do what we hope it will do, in 2 years we will certainly know it, and I do not believe it is necessary to continue it in force longer than a period of 2 years, especially since there will be two Congresses here within the next 2 years' time, and it will be possible, if expedient, to have it continued year after next.

I certainly hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Is it not true it will not be in force more than 1 year unless two thirds of the landowners ask for it to be continued for the second and third years?

Mr. PARKER. That is probably true, yes; but I want to make it certain that we are not going beyond the 2-year period now. I do not think it is necessary to do it, and I hope we will not undertake it.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, of course, this amendment is not anywhere nearly as important as the other, but inasmuch as the continuation for the third year must have the approval of two thirds of those engaged in the business and must be proclaimed as necessary by the President, I think it is very well safeguarded, and it might be desirable to continue it another year. I am sure the President would not continue it a third year unless it was eminently successful. It could not be continued unless two thirds of the farmers wanted it. So why should we say no?

I ask for a vote, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PARKER].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. (a) When the Secretary of Agriculture finds that two thirds of the persons who own, rent, share crop, or control land in the United States on which cotton is produced favor a levy of a tax on the ginning of cotton in excess of an allotment made to meet the probable market requirements and determines that such a tax is required to carry out the policy declared in section 1, the Secretary shall ascertain from an investigation of the available supply of cotton and the probable market requirements the quantity of cotton that should be allotted, in accordance with the policy declared in section 1, for marketing in the channels of interstate and foreign commerce, from production of cotton during the succeeding cotton crop year, exempt from the payment of taxes thereon.

(b) The allotment so ascertained shall be proclaimed by the Secretary of Agriculture at least 60 days prior to the beginning of such succeeding crop year and shall be apportioned by him as herein provided.

(c) For the crop year 1934-35, 10,000,000 bales is hereby fixed as the maximum amount of cotton of the crop harvested in the crop year 1934-35, that may be marketed exempt from payment of the tax herein levied. Except as provided in section 2, the allotment plan and the tax is hereby declared to be in effect for the crop year 1934-35.

With the following committee amendment:

On page 3, in line 6, strike out "two thirds of the persons who own, rent, share crop, or control" and insert in lieu thereof "the persons who own, rent, share crop, or control two thirds of the."

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute for the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MILLER as a substitute for the committee amendment: On page 3, lines 7 and 8, in lieu of the committee amendment, insert the following: "two thirds of the persons who own, rent, share crop, or control."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order that that amendment is already pending. That is the original language of the bill, and to vote down the committee amendment would have the same effect as the amendment which the gentleman offers and it is merely a repetition. The amendment is in the exact words of the original language of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HILL of Alabama). The point of order is sustained.

The question is on the committee amendment.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the committee amendment.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this particular amendment and all amendments thereto shall close in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES]?

There was no objection.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, many of the Members on the Republican side and Members from sections other than the Cotton Belt have not felt disposed to take any active interest in amendments pertaining to this bill. Many of us are going to vote against the bill because we are opposed to the bill on fundamental principles.

I want to discuss this section of the bill and I think every Member of this House, irrespective of whether he comes from the Cotton Belt or not, should give serious consideration to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

In the first place, section 3 deals with providing for a referendum to find out whether or not the cotton planters want to carry on this program. It sets up no machinery for an honest, fair election. So most of this talk that we have heard in the Congress about this bill not being put into operation unless two thirds of the cotton producers want it is just so much talk. You have not set up the machinery for any sort of an honest and civilized election.

Mr. GILCHRIST. How could we get one in Louisiana? [Laughter.]

Mr. McGUGIN. In any event, if we are going to have some sort of an election, then let human beings vote, and not land. Throughout the discussion of this bill it has been said time and time again that this bill would not be put into operation unless the cotton producers wanted it; but you are not providing for any vote by cotton producers. You are providing for a vote by those who control the land. It is those who control two thirds of the land, not two thirds of the cotton producers, but those who control two thirds of the land.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the gentleman can imagine any type of cotton producer in the South who does not come within one or the other of those classifications, who either owns, rents, share crops, or controls land, I should like the gentleman to point it out. That includes every possible producer.

Mr. McGUGIN. The gentleman is only begging the question, and I cannot help but think the gentleman knows it.

If this amendment is accepted, persons who own, rent, share crop, or control two thirds of the land—two thirds of the land make the decision. The vote is based upon two thirds of the land, not two thirds of the individuals engaged in the raising of cotton.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. I cannot yield. If a man owned and operated 1,000 acres of land, his vote would count for 10 times as much as the vote of the man who operated only 100 acres. You are basing the right of suffrage in this matter upon the ownership or control of land, not upon individuals.

Basing suffrage upon land is a feudal system that has no place in a civilized democracy, has no place in a country which sets human rights above property rights. This bill should be left as it is without the committee amendment. It will then read that the election will be determined upon two thirds of the persons who own, rent, share crop, or control cotton land, not upon those who own or control two thirds of the land.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. I yield.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. If the primary purpose is to reduce production, is not the amount of land cultivated, after all, the factor that will very largely determine the production?

Mr. McGUGIN. I look at the problem from the standpoint of government. We should be just as solicitous for the welfare of the poorest cotton share cropper in the South as we are of the welfare of the largest planter. Therefore, if you are going to take a vote, base it upon the number of people engaged in the business of producing cotton. Let each vote count the same, whether the voter owns or operates 1,000 acres or 20 acres. That is the true American principle of suffrage.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized in opposition to the amendment. The Chair informs the gentleman that the committee amendment is pending and that debate on the amendment has not been exhausted.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, when I asked unanimous consent for the closing of debate on the amendment I had expected the gentleman from Arkansas to be recognized.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MILLER] be recognized for 5 minutes, the time not to be taken out of that assigned to debate on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, the statement has been made many, many times during the course of the debate on this bill that 95 percent of the cotton producers of the South are in favor of the bill. Of course, I have no way of knowing, and I assume no Member of the House has any way of knowing, whether that statement is correct, because I do not know how one can ascertain the sentiment of all cotton producers on this particular question. I have no doubt, however, but what the statement is based upon the answers received to a questionnaire sent out by the Department of Agriculture which is dated the 26th of January, and which, I assume, was sent out about that time.

That letter, of course, went out more than 2 weeks before the bill which the committee considered was even introduced. So it is perfectly ridiculous, of course, for anyone to say that there has been a referendum upon this particular piece of legislation because, in addition to the fact that the bill had not been introduced at that time and was not introduced until the 14th day of February, the bill which was introduced on that date has been amended by the committee until it has been changed very much, not only as to form but as to purpose and content.

The letter and the questionnaire which were sent out by the Department of Agriculture for the purpose of ascertaining the sentiment of the cotton producers on the subject of compulsory control did not refer to any particular piece of legislation but, rather, referred to amendments to the Agricultural Adjustment Act; and I want to call attention to the first paragraph of that letter because it indicates that there was not submitted to these producers a referendum on this or any other bill, but there was submitted to them simply the proposition of whether they thought it was well to propose amendments to the Agricultural Adjustment Act which would have for their purpose the bringing into the program of those who had not voluntarily cooperated.

The first paragraph of that letter reads as follows:

Many cotton producers and others in the Cotton Belt have proposed that amendments to the Agricultural Adjustment Act be enacted to compel the cooperation in the cotton-reduction program of every producer who is eligible to participate. These proposals have been caused in large part by the tendency of some non-cooperators to maintain or even expand their cotton production at the same time that reductions are being made by cooperators who act for the best interests of a majority—

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. I should like to finish reading this letter first.

Mr. JONES. I may say to the gentleman that after consulting with other members of the committee we have decided not to press the committee amendment. We all liked the original terms of the bill better than the suggested amendment. The only reason for suggesting the change was that those who would have charge of the administration of the act felt it would be much more difficult to ascertain when they had gotten the two thirds of the individuals, than it would be when they had gotten representatives of two thirds of the acreage. In view of the sentiment expressed by Mr. MILLER, of Arkansas, and others in favor of the original terms of the bill, I shall ask unanimous consent to withdraw the committee amendment, so that the proposal suggested by Mr. Miller may be adopted and he has agreed not to speak on the amendment to expedite the proceedings.

Mr. HOPE. My time has not expired; I should like to finish my statement. The gentleman should not take me off the floor in this manner.

Mr. JONES. I beg the gentleman's pardon. Will the Chair kindly inform me how much of the gentleman's time I used?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman consumed 1 minute.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Kansas be extended 1 minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOPE. This letter was sent to 40,000 individuals in the Cotton Belt, some of whom I assume were farmers and some of whom were not, because they included 30,000 crop reporters, some of whom I understand are not farmers.

It was also sent to those who participated in the campaign for the voluntary-allotment program. The questions that were submitted with this letter were not questions concerning any particular piece of legislation. The first question submitted was as follows:

Do you favor a plan of compulsory control of cotton production to compel all producers to cooperate in cotton-adjustment programs?

There is of course nothing in this question to even remotely suggest the bill which we have before us with its drastic provisions.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the pending section and all amendments thereto close in 3 minutes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Reserving the right to object to ask one question: Subsection (b) on the bottom of page 3 says:

The allotment so ascertained shall be proclaimed at least 60 days prior to the beginning of each succeeding crop year.

Can the gentleman inform us what proportion of the crop has already been planted down there?

Mr. JONES. That would not apply to this year. There would be practically none. There may be a little, but not much.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas to withdraw the committee amendment?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 5, after the word "fines", insert "for the crop year 1935-36" and insert at the end of line 19 the following: "the provisions of this subsection shall apply with respect to the crop year 1936-37 in the same manner as in the case of the crop year 1935-36."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, this is simply a clarifying amendment. It is intended that they shall be required to vote before the succeeding year, and this simply states it without question.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. (a) There is hereby levied and assessed on the ginning of cotton hereafter harvested during a crop year with respect to which this act is in effect, a tax at the rate per pound of the lint cotton produced from ginning, of 50 percent of the average central market price per pound of lint cotton, but in no event less than 5 cents per pound. If the cotton was harvested during a crop year with respect to which the tax is in effect, the tax shall apply even if the ginning occurs after the expiration of such crop year.

(b) The average central market price per pound of lint cotton shall be the average price per pound of basis $\frac{3}{8}$ -inch middling spot cotton on the 10 spot-cotton markets (designated by the Secretary of Agriculture) as determined and proclaimed from time to time by the Secretary of Agriculture. The average central-market price determined and proclaimed shall be the base for determining the rate of the tax until a different average central-market price for lint cotton is determined and proclaimed by the Secretary of Agriculture.

(d) When the Secretary of Agriculture does not proclaim an allotment of cotton for a crop year, as provided in section 3 of this act, the tax shall not apply with respect to cotton harvested during such crop year, but shall apply to cotton harvested during the next crop year for which, with the approval of the President, the Secretary makes an allotment under such section.

(e) No tax shall be imposed under this act with respect to—

(1) Cotton harvested by any publicly owned experimental station or agricultural laboratory.

(2) An amount of cotton harvested in any crop year from each farm equal to its allotment.

(3) Cotton harvested prior to the crop year 1934-35.

(f) The tax shall not be collected upon the ginning of cotton which is to be stored, for the period of 1 year after such ginning, by the producer thereof either on the farm or at such other place as may be permitted by regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Treasury. In such cases the payment of the tax shall be postponed, but shall be paid at the time when bale tags are secured for such cotton. Bale tags may be secured for any of such cotton at any time after ginning (1) upon the payment to such person as the Commissioner may direct, of the amount of tax which would have been payable at the time of ginning, or (2) upon the surrender of certificates of exemption covering an amount of cotton not less than the amount of such cotton. Until bale tags are secured for such cotton, such cotton shall be subject to a lien in favor of the United States for the amount of the tax payable with respect to the ginning of such cotton. The right to postponement of the payment of the tax under this subsection shall be established in accordance with such regulations as the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe. The Commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe regulations providing for stamping the containers of such cotton so as to indicate the time of ginning and the amount of tax payable with respect thereto.

(g) The right to exemption under paragraph (2) of subsection (e) shall be evidenced by a certificate of exemption issued as herein provided, which certificate of exemption shall be conclusive proof of the right to such exemption.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. JONES: Page 6, lines 8 and 9, strike out "for the period of 1 year after such ginning."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, this is simply for the purpose of liberalizing the storage provision. It is in a strait-jacket now. This does not alter the bill in any material way.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the amendment, but it is not a committee amendment.

Mr. JONES. This is not a committee amendment. I consulted with a number of others about this amendment. This is not a committee amendment, and if I stated it was a committee amendment I did so inadvertently. This is an amendment that I am offering, after consultation with others.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 21 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I asked to strike out the last word, "exemption," for the purpose of making certain observations. I do not believe there is anyone from New York State, where I come from, or from the northern and eastern States, that does not want to see the Southland prosperous and particularly to see the cotton growers make a reasonable profit. I think it is only fair in discussing bills of this character to make certain observations and point out that much of the money that comes from the Federal Treasury for the cotton producers for reduction in the amount of their crops must necessarily come from the northern States. I am going to cite for example one southern State that has received $15,000,000 from the Federal Treasury for reduction of its cotton crop. This particular State pays into the Federal Treasury in income taxes, $255,000 a year. It takes out of the Federal Treasury $15,000,000, $10,000,000 for reduction of the cotton crop and $5,000,000 in cotton options.

Mr. BLANTON. What State is that?

Mr. FISH. I will mention it if the gentleman wants me to.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. FISH. It is no reflection on the State, because other southern States are in the same category. It is the State of Mississippi, and I assume the gentlemen from the State of Mississippi in this Congress should be commended by their people back home if they are able to get such a large sum of money out of the Treasury for their own State.

Mr. FULMER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I cannot yield, as I have only 5 minutes and I want to make a few more observations.

If the State of New York, for example, which pays $144,000,000 a year in income taxes, were to receive money on the same basis for its dairymen or any crop or any industry that might be in need in our State, it would receive back from the Federal Treasury $8,000,000,000—not $8,000,000, but $8,000,000,000. This huge sum is estimated on the amount of income taxes paid by the State of Mississippi and the income taxes paid by the State of New York.

I can carry this observation further. The State of Mississippi has received $35,000,000 or more from the Federal Treasury for different purposes during the last year. If we carried the analogy further, on the basis of what the State of New York should receive based on income-tax payments, it would mean that we would get from the Federal Treasury $20,000,000,000 this year. Of course, I admit I am a piker and the other Members from New York State are plain, ordinary pikers. It is about time we tried to get something for our State when the Federal Government is so generous with our money in the way of subsidies and doles.

I may say to the southern Members we would like to see the whole country prosperous and we hope the Southland will be prosperous, but I think it is only fair that your people appreciate, what you know already, that most of the money for your cotton-crop reduction program is coming out of the State of New York and some of the other northern and eastern States.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I know what the gentleman is going to say, but I cannot refuse to yield to my friend from Texas. I yield for a brief question.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Does not the gentleman realize that most of this money that goes into Mississippi for the payment of this plowed-up cotton, finds its way back to New York in the purchase of goods?

Mr. FISH. I do not realize that; no. I think the cotton producers get most of this money for the reduction of their crops and use it for fertilizers which do not come from New York, and for local labor and amusements. I have only risen to say that our taxpayers are being bled white in New York State and they are overburdened now with taxes and I, at least, hope the cotton producers and the people from the Southland will recognize the fact and have a little sympathy for them and not make any more assessments on them in the future, and, at least, be a little grateful to us for what we have already done for you.

As former Senator Ben Tillman said of his Democratic colleagues, "the Democratic wild donkeys will break into the green corn whenever they get into power." There is no doubt but that the South is in the saddle and that the Southern States are making the most of their opportunities and that king cotton leads all the rest.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I did intend to speak on the limitation in paragraph (c) of section 8, which limits the time of drought to 3 years only. There are 60 counties in central west Texas which, in 1929 and 1930, had a complete drought. There were many places where there was not a sprig of grass growing and, of course, this bill would be unjust if it did not include those 2 years. However, the chairman of the committee has agreed to accept an amendment to the bill making it 5 years instead of 3 years and will himself offer the amendment tomorrow, hence it will be unnecessary for me to discuss it. Therefore, I am willing to devote my time to answering our good friend from New York [Mr. FISH].

The speech of the gentleman from New York is amusing. He mentioned Mississippi as a State that got $15,000,000 out of the Treasury for cotton but paid only a small income tax. Why, every time they build a schoolhouse in Mississippi they have to go to New York to sell their bonds and let you New Yorkers clip the interest coupons every year. Every time they build a new jail, or a courthouse, or a water system, it is on bonds that are sold in New York and the interest clipping is done there. You New Yorkers reap the harvest. You do not have time to fool with a mere matter of $15,000,000, because you are so busy clipping billions of dollars in interest coupons. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. PERKINS and Mr. STUDLEY rose.

Mr. PERKINS. How would the gentleman like it if the men in New York would not let them have the money?

Mr. BLANTON. I am very glad they have the money to lend to Mississippi, but the men who do the interest-clipping ought not to complain; and I want to tell my friend from New York I can mention some of his silk-stocking New Yorkers there who get as much returned to them by way of refunds on their income-tax payments in 1 year as the whole State of Mississippi got for cotton.

Mr. FISH. I wish the gentleman would name them, since he has stated he can name them.

Mr. BLANTON. There are so many of them it would exhaust all my time. I can mention some up there in New York, also, who are worth millions of dollars, and who paid last year and the year before and the year before, less income tax than I paid or the gentleman from New York paid. They are using their millions to escape paying taxes to this Government. They pay nothing to the Government in the way of taxes on income.

The gentleman from New York went to war and did valiant service in France to defend the property rights of these multimillionaires in New York who do not pay taxes to the Government. They employ high-salaried lawyers to advise them how to get around paying taxes to the Government.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman favor a tax-exemption amendment?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes, certainly; every year since the war I have advocated that. I have been fighting constantly for such an amendment.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman knows that Members from the South have voted it down.

Mr. BLANTON. I have not been one of them. The gentleman knows that for 17 years I have been preaching that.

Mr. STUDLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. STUDLEY. What would Mississippi do for a market for her bonds if you close the stock exchange?

Mr. BLANTON. I want a market for her bonds, but I do not want to make them tax exempt. I do not want any income to be tax exempt. I want every man in the United States to pay his just proportion of the taxes to the Government according to his income.

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; I yield to the new leader of the Republican Party.

Mr. McGUGIN. As long as you have the iniquitous chain stores you will have that situation in Mississippi and elsewhere.

Mr. BLANTON. Why have not you run them out during all these years?

Mr. McGUGIN. I have been here but 2 years.

Mr. BLANTON. In conclusion let me say, Mr. Chairman, that I hope sincerely that this Government will never provide for another tax-exempt bond or any other kind of tax-exempt security. I hope also that we will find some way in this session of Congress to tax the income from the tax-exempt securities that are now outstanding. We must not permit any longer the multimillionaires of this country to evade paying their just part of the expenses and upkeep of this Government.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, I want to call the further attention of the Committee to the questionnaire which was sent out by the Department of Agriculture, which is made the basis for the statement that 95 percent of the cotton producers of the South are in favor of this bill.

The specific question which is asked in that questionnaire was:

Do you favor a plan of compulsory control of cotton production to compel all producers to cooperate in cotton-adjustment programs?

That was sent out to approximately 40,000 individuals in the South, some farmers, some nonfarmers, but most of them men who had cooperated in the voluntary program. I venture to say that there is not any question at all but that if you were to ask any cotton farmer or wheat farmer or hog farmer who has cooperated in the voluntary program if he thought something ought to be done to compel the non-cooperating farmer to come in, he would answer "yes", and that is all that this questionnaire asks.

It does not ask the man to whom it was sent whether he favors a bill of this kind, which would authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to give every man a definite allotment of cotton, above which he could not sell any cotton unless he paid a prohibitive tax. This questionnaire does not call attention to the fact that in this bill it is provided that if a man violates any of the provisions of the bill or any of the hundred or more regulations which the Secretary of Agriculture might make for its enforcement he is subject to a fine of $5,000 or 2 years in prison. No; this questionnaire does not even suggest any of the drastic features which are contained in this bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Has the gentleman since this whole controversy in his committee or anywhere else, from any reliable source representing the real producers of cotton, except one or two instances of large operators, heard of any objection to this bill?

Mr. HOPE. Gentlemen from the cotton sections have spoken this afternoon in opposition to the bill and have indicated their objections, and there are telegrams in the hearings sent by cotton producers in opposition to the bill, but whether or not there is general opposition to the bill, the fact remains there is not one in 10,000 of the cotton producers of the South who has ever seen this bill or who knows anything about its provisions. Therefore, it is ridiculous to say that they favor or do not favor the bill. I venture to say to the gentlemen who are here representing the South, that if they would submit this bill with its penalties and with its drastic provisions to their people and then ask them if they favored this type of legislation they would not find anything like 95 percent in favor of it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman talks a good deal about penalties. I believe I asked this question before of the gentleman. The gentleman must know that in order to make a bill of this sort effective, it must carry the ordinary and usual penalty provisions to secure its enforcement. These are not unusual regulations or unusual penalties, and I dare say that practically all bills affecting agriculture, and we have had a lot of them coming out, undertaking to give power to issue regulations, have carried penalties of a nature exactly similar to this. It is the ordinary and usual procedure for the enforcement of legislation.

Mr. HOPE. I think if the gentleman is going to enforce this legislation and compel the cotton farmers of the South to conform to it, he is going to have these penalties, and he is going to have to apply them in a great many cases. That is exactly what you are up against when you start to enforce a drastic piece of legislation like this. Certainly you will have to have these penalties which go so far as to provide that a man shall go to jail or pay a large fine if he violates not only the law but the regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture or if he hauls his cotton across a county line or does any of a hundred other things which he might innocently do and still violate the provisions of this act.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question, and this is inspired by the remarks of the gentleman from Texas the other day with respect to Lynn Talley, who was seeking to compel a movement of cotton to warehouses in Galveston and Houston. Does not paragraph (f), on page 6, make it possible for the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Treasury by regulations to actually deny to a farmer the right to store on his own farm if he so desires?

Mr. JONES. Oh, he has the right to do that.

Mr. DIRKSEN. It says:

May be permitted by regulation prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. JONES. The difficulty about Mr. Talley is that he is not in the A.A.A., but is over in the R.F.C.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is true, but does the gentleman believe he would do it as he is now?

Mr. JONES. Oh, there are some natural questions that arise in connection with that, but I do not care to go into the merits of that discussion.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Under paragraph (f), however, it would be possible to compel actual warehousing of cotton, to pay warehouse charges, and take it from their farms if they so desired?

Mr. JONES. I do not think the language is susceptible of that construction. I think it gives the farmer the option to do either.

Mr. DIRKSEN. It can be done, however.

Mr. JONES. It can be done; yes. The farmer can do it himself.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina: Page 6, under subsection (e) add the following subdivision:

"(4) Cotton to be consumed in the State where it is produced."

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, that subsection undertakes to enumerate the exemptions from the tax, and subdivision 4, which I have offered, merely designates that this tax shall not apply to cotton that is consumed in the State where it is produced. For instance, under the terms of the bill as written, if a man should care to take a bale of cotton to some mattress factory and have it made into mattresses, before he could do that he would have to pay a tax on it. If he should choose to make it up into ropes for plow lines on his premises or for use within the State where it is produced, he would have to pay a tax. If this bill has any force in it at all, it comes under the provision permitting or authorizing the regulation of interstate commerce, as I see it; and clearly no authority presumed under this bill would undertake to say to a man who produced cotton that he could not consume it within the limits of his own State. Before it passes into the channels of interstate and foreign commerce it must pass beyond the confines of the State where it is produced.

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. I yield.

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. North Carolina manufactures more cotton than she produces. Can this tax her?

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. If you took it to a textile institution within the limits of the State, of course it passes into interstate commerce.

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. The products of it might, but the cotton itself does not.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. But if it is consumed on the premises it must pay a tax.

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. If it does go into interstate commerce, the tax is an export tax, and an export tax cannot be levied.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. That is another question, but I am talking about the interstate commerce feature of it.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. If the gentleman's amendment is adopted, would it not have the effect of bringing every cotton mill into the States where cotton is produced?

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. No; because it goes into interstate commerce.

Mr. SNELL. If the gentleman comes from a cotton-producing State, I think he is fixed forever.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. Forty-six mills are in my district.

Mr. SNELL. I think the gentleman is all right.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. This has nothing whatever to do with it. I am simply asking about these things that are consumed on the premises, such as, for instance, mattresses and ropes, and things like that.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. I yield.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Has the gentleman had his attention called to the decision of the Supreme Court on February 5 of this year, local 167, regarding interstate commerce?

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. In 3 minutes I will not have time to read it.

Mr. GILCHRIST. I commend it to the gentleman's attention, because it runs contrary to the gentleman's views.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. Does the gentleman vouch for the constitutionality of this?

Mr. GILCHRIST. I vouch for it because it is from the Supreme Court of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TAYLOR] has expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I had intended to answer the statement along the lines suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], but that has been brought out very clearly. I think the South is asking for this and is asking for no particular advantage. Of course, we do not want any provision that would force the mills of any other section out of business.

I ask that the amendment be rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TAYLOR].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. (a) When an allotment is made, in order to prevent unfair competition and unfair trade practices in marketing cotton in the channels of interstate and foreign commerce, the Secretary of Agriculture shall apportion to the several cotton-producing States the number of bales the marketing of which may be exempt from the tax herein levied, which shall be determined by the ratio of the average number of bales produced in each State during the 5 crop years preceding the passage of this act to the average number of bales produced in all the States during the same period. It is prima facie presumed that all cotton and its processed products will move in interstate or foreign commerce.

(b) The amount allotted to each State (less the amounts allotted under section 8) shall be apportioned by the Secretary of Agriculture to the several counties in such State on a basis and ratio, applied to such counties, similar to that set forth in subsection (a).

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. JONES: Page 7, line 20, strike out "5 crop years preceding the passage of this act", and insert "crop years 1928-1932, both inclusive."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, that is simply to make definite the years.

Mr. TARVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. TARVER. I notice in the hearings on this bill that the amendment offered by the gentleman will reduce the allotment to my State from 870,000 bales to 850,000 bales. It occurs to me, in view of the fact that our Representatives from all of the southern States have been advised through the medium of the hearings and the form of the bill as reported, that the ratio of distribution was to be determined by the 5 preceding crop years, which, of course, included the year 1933, it is unfair now, in this sudden way, when we are considering the bill under the 5-minute rule, to undertake to change the basis of apportionment to our States.

Mr. JONES. May I state the original bill was for 10 years and gave the State of Georgia much less?

Mr. TARVER. No; I am referring to this bill which I call the original bill, as far as this discussion is concerned.

Mr. JONES. But the original bill was 10 years.

Mr. TARVER. This is the original bill, H.R. 8402. When introduced it was original, so far as its proposals go. I care nothing about bills introduced prior to that time. In the hearings is set out what each State would receive.

Mr. JONES. No. This bill was introduced after the hearings were concluded.

Mr. TARVER. Yet in the hearings, which I have just read, there is set out a discussion of the basis of apportionment provided in this bill, H.R. 8402, and under that my State would receive 8.7 percent of the 10,000,000 bales. Now it is proposed to reduce that apportionment to my State by 20,000 bales, without any discussion. I say it is unfair and the committee ought not to indulge in such practices.

Mr. JONES. The only reason I had for offering it was that the year 1932 was included, and this jibes with the allotment.

Mr. TARVER. You should adhere to the basis upon which you have sought and secured the support of members of our delegation.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman is entirely wrong. The propaganda went out, and the information went out on the 10-year basis; and this bill was introduced after the hearings were closed.

Mr. TARVER. I have within only the last few minutes read the hearings and I saw from the statistics published in the hearings that the basis provided in this bill would credit to my State 8.7 percent. The basis now proposed by the gentleman would, however, credit my State with only 8.5 percent of the 10,000,000 bales, reducing Georgia's allotment 20,000 bales.

Mr. JONES. The hearings were not printed until last week; they did not go out. That is not what the gentleman's suggestion is based on.

I do not know that it makes any particular difference to me; my State is not substantially interested one way or the other. The gentleman from South Carolina wanted this changed and some members of the committee discussed it. I have no particular reason to press it unless the Members want it.

Mr. BUCK. If the gentleman withdraws it I will offer it.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I now offer an amendment upon which I do insist.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES: On page 8, line 5, before the period, insert a comma and the following: "except that for the purposes of this subsection there shall be excluded from the calculation of average production of cotton in any county an amount of cotton produced in said county during any crop year or years during which the Secretary of Agriculture finds that production of cotton in such county was reduced so substantially by unusual drought, storm, flood, insect pest, or other uncontrollable natural cause that the inclusion of the cotton produced in such crop year or years would result in an apportionment to said county based upon an abnormally low production in said county, and in such cases the average production shall be calculated on the basis of crop years and the production of the years remaining of the period set forth in subsection (a)."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I can explain this amendment in a minute, and I think it meets the objection of the gentleman [Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina] who offered the other amendment. This amendment simply provides that where there has been an unusual drought or an unusual flood or pest in any 1 of the 5 base years which are used as the basis of allotment, which condition reduces the average so that it is abnormally below the real average production, that year shall not be counted, but insofar as that county is concerned the average of the remaining years shall be counted in arriving at the county's allotment.

This will not interfere at all with the allotments between the States, but applies to certain counties—and they exist in practically all the States—where in one or two of the basic years there was a drought, flood, or insect infestation, and this amendment provides that such a county shall not unfairly suffer thereby.

Mr. BUCK. That will not interfere with the allotment to the various States?

Mr. JONES. No; the State allotment will be the same as provided in the original bill.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question on another matter while he is on his feet?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman explain to the House what this sentence means?—

It is prima facie presumed that all cotton and its processed products will move in interstate or foreign commerce.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman will recall that in the so-called "Grain Futures Act" we wrote a great many provisions which were criticized, the critics stating that we were trying to write facts into law when we asserted that all commodities that directly affected interstate commerce should be presumed to be connected with interstate commerce. This is simply an effort to further legalize the bill.

Mr. SNELL. But the gentleman does not necessarily mean that it will do so.

Mr. JONES. No; I do not say that it necessarily makes it so.

Mr. SNELL. I think the gentleman is right on that.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 16 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed in principle to this class of legislation, for the reasons that it is unconstitutional and that there is no emergency which demands legislation of this kind at this time.

I repeat that in the enactment of this particular legislation the Constitution of the United States is being violated, and because of this fact I direct the attention of the Membership of this House to the oath which each and every Member has taken. It is as follows:

I do solemnly swear that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion, and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter. So help me God.

In support of what I have just said, I wish to call your attention to the last paragraph of the minority views in the report on this bill, as follows:

This measure constitutes a definite step down a strange, unfamiliar, and dangerous road leading to regimentation of agriculture and industry. It initiates for the first time in America compulsory control of production in place of the freedom of action which has always been considered an inherent right of our American citizenship. While earnest attempts have been made in this bill to meet constitutional objections which may be made to a measure of this kind, yet we are convinced that in view of the decisions of the courts this measure is unconstitutional. Although in form a taxing measure, the entire purpose and effect of the bill negative the fact that it is expected to produce revenue. Rather it is a regulatory measure, going beyond any authority which Congress possesses in that regard, and using the taxing power as a subterfuge.

The particular section of the bill that is now being discussed should be considered in connection with section 23 of the bill which gives the President authority to enter into agreements with foreign countries in relation to the sale of cotton.

This particular piece of legislation is a part of the program to establish in this country a new form of government, and it is my understanding that this bill is to be followed by other legislation of a similar nature which will endeavor to control the entire acreage on the farms in the United States, and will attempt to control the products from these farms, and will make violation an offense punishable by a fine of $1,000, and will make every district attorney in every county in the United States a Federal officer to enforce this law.

It is right in line with the plan which is now being worked out in England. I want to point out to the House that there is a concerted movement not only in England but in the United States. In the United States this movement is in charge of certain men now engaged in writing legislation in the Department of Agriculture. I refer to Mr. Tugwell, Mr. Mordecai Ezekiel, and Mr. Frank, and their immediate associates, some of whom are in other departments and some of whom are outside; and I may even go so far as to say that they are aided and abetted in this matter apparently by the Secretary of Agriculture. Their action in this matter is also assisted and aided through the agency of the Foreign Policy Association of the United States, which is directly connected with the Fabian Society, or a branch of it, in England, which at the present time is attempting to take over the control of agriculture and its operation in England, as well as the industries therein located. I call your especial attention to the recent article, America Must Choose, by Secretary of Agriculture Wallace, a syndicated article put out under the auspices of the Foreign Policy Association of New York and copyrighted by them. This article is quite in keeping with the plan of the British offspring of the Fabian group.

One of the stalwarts against the move in England is Stanley Baldwin. Mr. Baldwin issued a statement which was printed in the United States recently. It was a statement made over the radio, and, if I have time, I will read it to you, because he is standing today against the movement in England that I am speaking against now, and that movement is evidenced by this legislation and any other kind of legislation following, which have for their purpose the regimenting of all production in the United States, leading up to an absolute dictatorship.

The quotation I refer to from Mr. Baldwin is as follows:

Our freedom did not drop down like manna from heaven. It has been fought for from the beginning of our history and the blood of men has been shed to obtain it. It is the result of centuries of resistance to the power of the executive and it has brought us equal justice, trial by jury, freedom of worship, and freedom of religious and political opinion.

Democracy is far the most difficult form of government because it requires for perfect functioning the participation of everybody. Democracy wants constant guarding, and for us to turn to a dictatorship would be an act of consummate cowardice, of surrender, of confession that our strength and courage alike had gone.

It is quite true the wheels of our state coach may be creaking in heavy ground, but are you sure the wheels of the coach are not creaking in Moscow, Berlin, and Vienna, and even in the United States?

The whole tendency of a dictatorship is to squeeze out the competent and independent man and create a hierarchy accustomed to obeying. Chaos often results when the original dictator goes.

The rise of communism or fascism—both alike believe in force as a means of establishing their dictatorship—would kill everything that had been grown by our people for the last 800 or 1,000 years.

The plan in England to which I am referring is the "political economic plan", drawn up by Israel Moses Sieff, the director of a chain-store enterprise in England called Marks & Spencer. This enterprise declared a dividend of 40 percent for 1933, and was enabled to do so by the fact that it has until now handled almost exclusively all imports from Soviet Russia, which has enabled this house to undersell competitors.

Some of this plan was set forth in a newspaper called the "Week End Review," at which time Lord Beaverbrook was cooperating. It is fair to say that Lord Beaverbrook disapproved of their plans. Such persons as the following are members of the political economic plan: Ramsay MacDonald, Premier of England; Mrs. Leonard Elmhurst, formerly Mrs. Dorothy Willard Straight; Sir Basil P. Blackett, of the Bank of England; Sir Henry Bunbury; Graeme Haldane; I. Hodges; Lady Reading; Daniel Neal; H. V. Hodson; Sir Arthur Salter; Sir Oswald Moseley; Lord Eustis Percy; Lord Melchett; Sir Christopher Turnor; Malcolm MacDonald, son of the Premier.

This political economic plan organization is divided into many separate and well-organized and well-financed departments, for instance, town and country planning, industry, international relations, transport, banking, social services, civic division, and an agricultural department. The head of the agricultural department is Leonard Elmhurst, whose wife was formerly Mrs. Willard Straight, who manages a school for agriculture on political economic plan at Dartington Hall, Totnes, Devonshire.

May I point out to you that this is a secret organization with tremendous power? The definition of their organization is as follows:

A group of people who are actively engaged in production and distribution in the social services in town and country plan, in finance, in education, in research, in persuasion, and in various other key functions within the United Kingdom.

The political economic plan is in operation in the British Government by the means of a tariff advisory board. This organization has gathered all data and statistics obtained by governmental and private organization in administrative, industrial, trade, social, educational, agricultural, and other circles. Air-force statistics are in their hands, as well as those of the law and medical professions. This organization or group have had access to all archives of the British Government, just as the "brain trust" here in the United States have had access to the archives of our Government departments.

Through the tariff advisory board, which was created in February of 1933, and headed by Sir George May, the control of industry and trade is being firmly established in the British Empire. This tariff advisory board works in direct connection with the Treasury, and together with it devises the tariff policy.

In this bill and the tariff bill which follows it is proposed to set up just such a board, under the direction of the President, as the tariff advisory board in England.

The tariff board in England has been granted the powers of a law court and can exact under oath that all information concerning industry and trade be given it. Iron and steel, as also cotton and industrials, in England have been ordered by the tariff advisory board to prepare and submit plans for the reorganization of their industries and warned that should they fail to do so, a plan for complete reconstruction would be imposed upon them. May I suggest to you the similarity of this plan with the N.R.A., and also suggest to you that the tariff advisory board in England has been granted default powers and can, therefore, impose its plan.

The tariff board is composed, in addition to Sir George May, of Sir Sidney Chapman, professor of economics and statistics, and Sir George Allen Powell, of the British Food Board and Food Council. And it is a well-known fact that this particular political economic group has close connection with the Foreign Policy Association in New York.

I wish to quote from a letter from a correspondent of mine abroad, as follows:

It appears that the alleged "brain trust" is supposed to greatly influence the present United States policy. Neither you nor I are particularly interested in what takes place in England, but what should interest us both, it seems to me, is that there is a strong possibility that certain members of the "brain trust" around our President are undoubtedly in touch with this British organization and possibly are working to introduce a similar plan in the United States.

I understand the "brain trust" is largely composed of Professor Frankfurter, Professor Moley, Professor Tugwell, Adolph Berle, William C. Bullitt, and the mysterious Mordecai Ezekiel. I think there is no doubt that these men all belong to this particular organization with distinct Bolshevik tendencies. So it is quite possible that should this political economic plan be developed in the United States, if this alleged "brain trust" has really a serious influence over the judgment of our President, this plan may be attempted in our country.

Need I point out to you, who have been observing the activities of the so-called "brain trust" in the writing and sending to the Congress of legislation, that this legislation has for its purpose the virtual setting up in the United States of a plan similar to that which is being worked out in England.

I am assured by serious people who are in a position to know that this organization practically controls the British Government, and it is the opinion of those who do know that this highly organized and well-financed movement is intended to practically sovietize the English-speaking race.

I wish to quote again from my correspondent, as follows:

Some 2 months ago when Israel Moses Sieff, the present head of this organization, was urged to show more activity by the members of his committee, he said, "Let us go slowly for a while and wait until we see how our plan carries out in America."

I shall also quote a paragraph from Freedom and Planning, which is issued by the Inner Council of the members of the political economic plan as affecting the producer:

The position of the farmer and the manufacturer under a system of planned production can only be sketched in broad outlines. He may be conceived of as remaining in full control of all the operations of his farm or factory, but receiving from the duly constituted authority instructions as to the quantity and quality of his production, and as to the markets in which he will sell. He will himself have had a voice in setting up his constituted authority and will have regular means of communicating with it and influence its policy. He will be less exposed than at present to interference from above. He will be less free to make arbitrary decisions as to his own business outside the region of day-to-day operation of plant or farm.

It is further suggested that these plans are not very different from that which already occurs in particular organized industries, but must be conceived of as applying generally to most, if not all, of the major fields of production and as a part of a consciously and systematically planned agricultural and industrial organization.

There is to be a national council for agriculture, a national council for industry, a national council for coal mining, a national council for transport, and so on; a series of statutory or chartered corporations; for example, a cotton-industry corporation, a steel-industry corporation, a milk producers' corporation, organized on the lines of public-utility companies, serving at least to federate in suitable cases to own the plants, factories, and so forth, engaged in production.

There is an interesting paragraph—Compulsion and Private Ownership of Land—in which it is stated:

From the standpoint of encroachments upon freedom, apart from the denial of the tenets of individualism, the most obvious targets for attack are perhaps the proposed grant of powers to compel minorities and the probable necessity for drastic changes in the ownership of land.

Another paragraph says:

What is required, with only a view to equitable treatment of individuals, is transfer of ownership of large blocks of land, not necessarily of all the land in the country, but certainly of a large proportion of it, into the hands of the proposed statutory corporations and public-utility bodies and of land trusts.

This proposal is quite in keeping with the recently announced plan of Mr. Tugwell in dealing with the farmland situation in the United States.

It is not possible for me to quote the full text of this plan, but I have touched upon enough of it to indicate to any fair-minded person that what is proposed in this bill and in the other various steps that have been taken and that are now immediately in contemplation is a plan to be set up here by the "brain trust" quite similar to the one I have outlined that is in operation in England today and is the one to which I have heretofore referred as being opposed by Stanley Baldwin. It is unconstitutional. It is un-American. And as one Member of this House who reveres his oath of office and believes in the Constitution of the United States, I shall not be a party to this scheme.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BUCK: Page 7, line 22, after the period, strike out the period and add "," and the following words: "Provided, That no State shall receive an allotment of less than 200,000 bales of cotton in any 1 crop year."

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, this amendment, frankly, is directed to taking care of those cotton-producing States of the West which have recently entered into the production of cotton and which cannot be adequately taken care of under the quota provisions that are inserted in this bill.

May I say, first of all, that if the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas to freeze the quotas at the 1928-32 level had been adopted, it would have cost the State of Arizona and the State of California a great many more bales of cotton than under this bill. Even under the latitude of the bill the quota allowed the western cotton-producing States is going to be below their average production, and my amendment is merely to stabilize this small insignificant amount of the total cotton production of the United States at 200,000 bales per State. I think this is a fair amendment, and you gentlemen of the South must remember that the State of California produces very largely the long-staple cotton which is not competitive with the cotton of the southern States, but under this bill the long-staple cotton is going to be governed by the same rules that govern all other cotton.

I am in receipt of a letter from the State director of the Department of Agriculture of the State of California advising me that it is the opinion of the State department of agriculture that I should oppose the Bankhead bill in its present form and that I should try to secure a modification that will be more just and equitable to the cotton industry of my State. I do not know of any method that will be fairer than this. I have considered the question from every possible legal angle, and I believe this is a fair amendment to offer.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Can the gentleman tell me what the quota of California is under the present bill?

Mr. BUCK. I have not revised these figures under the new suggestion offered by the gentleman from Texas, but under the old method of computation, taking a 5-year average, 1929 through 1933, the allotment to California would be 122,787 bales of cotton. The average production was 204,000 for the past 5 years.

Mr. ALLGOOD. How about Arizona?

Mr. BUCK. I have not the figures for Arizona.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. The gentleman did not take into consideration that all States are reduced. You do not expect to raise as much cotton as you have been raising?

Mr. BUCK. I am very glad the gentleman called this to my attention, because I omitted an important point. In the years 1931 and 1932 the State of California started a voluntary-reduction program which brought its figures down from a previous average of 256,000 bales of cotton to 171,000 for 1931 and 124,000 for 1932. Therefore when you take into consideration these years during which there was no corresponding reduction in the South, I think a great injustice has been done the State of California.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Is it not a fact that the production of cotton in California either 1928 to 1932 or 1929 to 1933 has been larger than any other State in the Union, so that the gentleman's State would profit more by the terms of this bill than any other cotton-growing State?

Mr. BUCK. Does the gentleman mean by the terms of this bill?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I mean the production has increased more in California than in any other cotton-producing State.

Mr. BUCK. No. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I call attention to page 34 of the hearings, which show that for a 10-year period you had a production—

Mr. BUCK. I will concede what the gentleman is about to say. As I stated a moment ago, if you go back 10 years in the case of these newly developed cotton-producing States of the West, of course, the further back you go the greater injustice you do the State.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Your production in the last 5 years has increased more than any other State I know of.

Mr. BUCK. No. Our production in 1929 was 254,000 bales and in 1930, 256,000 bales. Then followed the 2 years of reduction that I just cited, and last year the production was 216,000 bales. So I do not see why the gentleman should say there has been an increase.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. JONES. I understood the gentleman to say his quota was only 122,000 bales. You have an allotment of 150,000 bales, according to the estimates of the Department. You had an average of 204,000 bales for the 5 years. In 1933 and 1934 you had 129,000 bales. Your average is around 200,000 and this gives you 150,000 bales.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUCK. The figures I obtained were furnished by the State Department of Agriculture. If they are in error, I am in error. In addition I checked these figures with the gentleman from Alabama, the author of the bill, on the sheet that they showed to me yesterday in the cloakroom, and they showed 122,000. I submit the amendment on what I have stated. I think it is a fair amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. BUCK].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BUCK) there were—ayes 33, noes 46.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I want to correct a wrong impression about the amendment that has just been voted upon. Of course, it is a small matter, but if you make an exception for one State, then all the States would want an exception and you would be offering a premium for every marginal State to produce at least 200,000 bales of cotton. You would give them a $50 premium for every bale of cotton produced in such border States, and there is always a little cotton produced in such States.

California is treated in an abundantly fair fashion. The Department of Agriculture will administer this bill. According to the figures of the Department, the average production for the State of California for the 5 years is 204,000 bales, which would give an allotment of 150,000 bales instead of 122,000 bales; and if this bill passes and is effective, they will get more for their 150,000 bales than they would be able to get for 200,000 bales.

Mr. STUBBS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STUBBS: On page 7, line 22, after the period, insert:

"Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture be allowed such latitude in the application of the allotment system as to provide him discretionary powers to permit reasonable treatment and equitable adjustment of cotton-production allotments where the exact application of this act would work undue hardships and unfair financial penalties on the individual producers or geographical unit."

Mr. STUBBS. Mr. Chairman, I may state that the object of this amendment is simply this. We feel we have a new industry out there, especially in my part of the State. There was a time when only the Imperial Valley grew cotton in California, but like the Indians, the cotton industry is more or less nomadic and so it has traveled up into the San Joaquin Valley, a part of which I represent. It is a young industry and if we base our ratio on a 5-year basis or if we are allotted on a 5-year basis, our cotton growers are going to get into trouble, because they are just beginning to produce and are just getting their land in shape and getting their pumps going, and so forth.

We feel we will have a case in court if we are privileged to give the Secretary of Agriculture discretionary powers instead of mandatory powers, so that he may consider this and in his discretion give to our particular section of the cotton-growing States some consideration. So the purpose of this amendment is to give the Secretary of Agriculture discretionary powers instead of mandatory powers in dealing with a new industry in the far West. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. STUBBS].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. A producer of cotton desiring to secure a tax-exemption certificate may file an application therefor with the agent designated by the Secretary of Agriculture, accompanied by a statement under oath showing the approximate quantity of cotton produced on the lands presently owned, rented, share cropped, or controlled by the applicant during a representative period fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture, and also the number of acres of land in said lands in actual cultivation for the 3 preceding years, and the quantity of cotton, in the best judgment of the applicant, said lands would have produced if all the cultivated land had been planted to cotton. Said application shall state any other facts which may be required by the Secretary of Agriculture.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 8, line 20, after the word "Agriculture", insert the following: "No certificate of exemption shall be issued and no allotment shall be made to any producer unless he agrees to comply with such conditions and limitations on the production of agricultural commodities by him as the Secretary of Agriculture may, from time to time, prescribe to assure the cooperation of such producer in the reduction programs of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration and to prevent expansion of competitive production by such producer of agricultural commodities other than cotton."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 11 minutes.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I hope the gentleman will not press that request. This is one of the most important amendments in the whole bill and affects more of us.

Mr. JONES. I think we should perhaps let it go over until tomorrow.

Mr. RANKIN. I would be willing to let it go over until tomorrow.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON] may have 3 minutes in which to make a statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I desire to thank the gentleman from Texas, the distinguished Chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, for his kindness in permitting me to speak out of order at this time. And yet it seems entirely fitting that an announcement should be made of the passing of America's outstanding farm leader during consideration of this debate on an important agricultural measure. I have a very sad announcement. Word has just come of the sudden death of Hon. John A. Simpson, national president of the Farmers Educational and Cooperative Union of America. Mr. Simpson was well known to many Members of this body, having long been interested in farm legislation. I am sure that the untimely passing of this great beloved farm leader will be keenly felt, not only by members of that great organization to which he had devoted his every energy so faithfully for many years, but by every Member of both Houses of Congress, as well as others who knew him. Our hearts go out in sincere sympathy to the grief-stricken members of his family.

I have known John Simpson and have been intimately associated with him for nearly a quarter of a century. It so happens that for many years he resided on a farm in my home county of Caddo. He was loved, honored, and respected by his neighbors and friends who knew him. For more than a score of years I have worked and counseled with him concerning legislation affecting the farmers of Oklahoma. I came to know and appreciate his unusual ability, courage, and fidelity to the cause of the farmers during the eighth session of the Oklahoma Legislature, at which time I was a member of the committee on agriculture of the Oklahoma State Senate and he was State president of the Farmers Union. Since then I have conferred with him many times concerning legislation affecting the welfare of the farmers of the State and Nation.

John Simpson literally died in his tracks today fighting for the cause of the downtrodden and tax-burdened farmers of this country. Although a few of us have known that he was laboring under physical difficulties for the past few months, he never complained nor slackened his pace in his fight for national legislation that he believed to be right and just in order to bring needed relief to the tillers of the soil. His zeal and enthusiasm for what is known as the National Farmers Union program was only excelled by his determination to have that program enacted into law.

Our great farm leader knew not how to be afraid. He never took his stand until fully convinced that he was right and that his cause was just. When thus convinced he never backtracked nor evaded an issue. He asked no quarter and gave none. Yet he was mild speaking, lovable, and had the happy faculty of making real, lasting friends wherever he went.

There is hardly a community in any county in the Sixth Congressional District of Oklahoma nor in any community in the United States where the name of John Simpson has not been revered by many with whom he has come in personal contact. Millions of farmers with whom he labored so devotedly the greater portion of his life are deeply grieved today as they read the sad story in every paper of the land announcing the sudden and untimely passing of this great soul.

Our great and beloved farm leader has passed to his reward, but the principles, ideals, and policies for which he actually gave his life will go on and on with undiminished power. John Simpson was a staunch Christian character. He had an abiding faith in the fundamental principles of Christian brotherhood. His personal life was one that all might well emulate. His friends in and out of Congress will renew their allegiance to the great unselfish program for which he stood, and bind themselves anew in a solemn pledge to carry on the fight until the farmers of America have been delivered from economic bondage. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee now rise out of respect to the death of Hon. John A. Simpson, national president of the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of America.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HILL of Alabama, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill H.R. 8402 and had come to no resolution thereon.

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A further message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H.R. 7513) entitled "An act making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the Judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes", disagreed to by the House; agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. McKELLAR, Mr. RUSSELL, Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. HALE, and Mr. NYE to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate disagrees to the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 6663) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes, nos. 14 and 22, requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. GLASS, Mr. BYRNES, Mr. RUSSELL, Mr. HALE, and Mr. STEIWER to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

OLD-AGE PENSION

Mr. ARENS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD the radio address delivered by the Honorable MAGNUS JOHNSON, a Member of this Congress, in behalf of old-age pension legislation, on Wednesday, March 14, in Washington, D.C.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ARENS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

Ladies and gentlemen of the radio audience, I am deeply indebted to Dr. J. E. Pope, president of the National Old Age Pension Association, for the opportunity he has afforded me in addressing you this evening and expressing my sentiments toward the aged and infirm citizens of this great Nation.

The rugged individualism of past administrations is on the wane. All around us we are finding leaders who share the views of the worker and the man on the street, and who in sharing these opinions carry with them the desire and wish to aid them and better their lot. The old saying of the "survival of the fittest" must go. The sooner that the disciples of that school of rugged individualism realize that this fallacy that has kept millions in want, starvation, misery is relegated to the past and that the people of this, the richest Nation in the world, want a government that will watch and care for them in their declining years, then just that soon will we have Nation-wide laws that will protect and care for our aged people who have been honest and good citizens during their productive years.

Under the leadership of our able and distinguished leader in the White House we have been watching, with a rapidity that has startled this country, the changing trend of government toward giving adequate protection to our people. In my own State of Minnesota we have been trying to stamp out those false leaders who have placed property rights above human rights. Liberals have banded together, and under the Farmer-Labor Party we have been constantly striving to better the conditions of our farmers and working people.

We have had to fight the selfish and vested interests as well as the reactionary conservative leaders in the legislative halls. Much yet has to be done before we can accomplish the work we have set out to do. But out of it will come laws that will protect and care for our aged. No longer will anyone, during their declining years, be forced to face the horrible thought of old age without the means of support. This awful worry of being alone with no one to care for them, with no one to watch and provide, will vanish. Truly the responsibility of this great, human, and wonderful step forward should have the enthusiasm and endorsement of the youthful leaders now in Government and business, and the true picture of our present plight, because we are lacking in courage and vision, should be painted for them.

More and more people are beginning to realize that under the present system of government, pensions to our old people are an absolute necessity if we are to progress and move forward. In past years our aged people, who had no visible means of support, were looked upon in the sense of a necessary evil, and for that reason the poorhouse and almshouses came into being. Here elderly people who had earned their own living and had worked hard during their productive years and through no fault of their own were unable to continue to support themselves, were placed in the institution and taken away from their homes and families to spend their last days in a sort of punishment and penalty for, perhaps, as some people have looked upon it, for living too long.

Our Government cannot continue to ignore this most vital problem. The States that are now operating under laws providing old-age pensions are finding that a real good has been accomplished. However, this is not entirely a problem for the State government alone. Successfully it must be a program that will have the cooperation of the counties, State, and Federal Government where each unit of government will share a portion of the cost of protecting our worthy citizens who have become too old to serve in private industry any longer.

When one stops and considers the cost of providing pensions for persons over 65 years of age under the Federal old-age pension measure as introduced by Congressman DISNEY, of Oklahoma, as compared to charges made by the present system as set up by the States and counties we find the latter is far more expensive in two ways. First, it does not meet present conditions and secondly the per capita cost is far out of proportion to the tax plan proposed by the Disney bill. The Disney plan is a contributory system where everyone is called upon to participate and provides for Federal control cooperating with the State agencies. It is simple in operation and its passage will once and for all guard and protect our elderly people from facing the declining days of their life in constant fear of extreme poverty and privation. I am, however, an ardent advocate of any workable measure that will give a man, when in the prime of life, the assurance that his declining years, were he unable to meet the demands that society placed upon him be adequately provided for in the autumn of life. And this system which he helped to maintain during his productive years would provide for his old age so that he might live the remainder of his days with his family and friends, rather than to be whisked away to a charitable institution for the aged to be pitied and scorned by society.

Government owes all its citizens, who are willing and able, the right to work, and in fulfilling this obligation to its people it must also promote the public good and the public welfare. To this end it must, and I am sure that it will, establish in carrying out the public welfare a broad and adequate system of old-age pensions. A system that will take in every State in the Union, the benefits which will be participated in by every aged person that comes within the classification as set down by the Federal and State laws. The Federal Government employees and many States have for their workers pension-and-retirement plans and these are all along the contributory system, very similar to that projected in the Disney bill. Also certain industries realizing the benefits that are derived by a system of old-age pensions and the mental reaction it has had upon its employees have inaugurated such pension funds. And now under a wise and adequate program of a pension-and-retirement plan for loyal employees who have served their companies for years, the transportation industries are presenting to Congress for passage a splendid plan.

I have seen enough of misery and suffering. I have witnessed thousands of persons who have worked hard all of their lives and who have, because of economic conditions over which they have had no control, lost their homes and their savings. I have visited with these people and know of their conditions, and I have found that their greatest fear after these sudden and tragic reverses was the fear of poverty in old age. Just think, my friends, what a blessing it would be if all of these people who have worked their entire lifetime and have lost their property and homes during these trying years could look into the future knowing that through a system established by a wise and providential Government they would have no cause for fear and worry. What finer mental relief could our elderly people carry with them during their declining years than this?

In awakening the great mass of the citizens to a realization of the need of old-age pensions, may I say that we are not asking that Congress participate in any radical change in the present social order, nor are we in any way calling upon Government to change its present system. I believe that with a Federal old-age pension law, one that would be operative in all States alike and would demand the same requirements from those participating that a great good would be accomplished. Capital should realize this, and those who have been so selfish and stubborn in the past and who look to old-age pensions as a dole or gigantic step toward granting charity to our aged must realize their error.

Caring for those who have toiled faithfully during the best days of their life is not charity but a duty of government, and a function that should be met with squarely and honestly by legislators. Congress can do no more worthy act than pass out a fair and adequate old-age pension law. In the State of Minnesota, the Farmer-Labor Party, of which I am a member, has a plank in the platform that demands old-age pensions. Our party long ago realized the necessity of such a measure and although we have never been in control of both branches of the State legislature, members of our party did pass in the 1933 session such a measure.

May I review briefly what the Disney measure proposes:

First. That a pension of $30 monthly be paid to every resident American citizen of 65 years of age or over.

Second. That those persons 65 years of age or over who do not, or refuse to, accept retirement from active competitive earnings will not be allowed to participate in such pension until they actually retire.

Third. That any American citizen above the age of 40 and under 65 shall, if he is physically or mentally unable to earn a livelihood, be paid the sum of $20 per month.

Fourth. The Congress of the United States shall require each and every person, male or female, between the ages of 21 and 45, on and after the passage of the old-age pension act, to pay into the Post Office Department, through the Postal Savings Division, a very small percentage of all gross earnings from salaries, wages, hire, or from any other source, whether it be from salary, commissions paid, from dividends earned, or from profits arising from any transaction, the returns to be made monthly, together with the payment of assessments such as the Congress may levy against such earnings or income.

Fifth. The President of the United States shall appoint a director of pensions, to become the chairman of the United States pension board, the other members of the board to comprise the Postmaster General, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of Labor, the said board to have the power to scale downward the assessment of tax against earnings as the occasion and conditions of the pension fund may see fit to warrant. In other words, if it is found that less than one half of 1 percent of earnings of all persons over 21 and not over 45 will suffice, they shall then be authorized to reduce the scale of rate of assessments accordingly.

This, then, is briefly what the old-age pension law will provide. By the passage of this measure the Membership of Congress can win for themselves the everlasting respect and blessing of every humane and good citizen of this country. I am sure that wherever there beats a human heart and one that is interested in the general welfare of the people of this great Nation, you will find that they are heartily behind such a program that will provide retirement pensions for laborers in industry, farmers, and, as a matter of fact, anyone who has attained the age of 65 and does not have means of support.

I sincerely hope and trust that the majority of my colleagues will voice their approval of an old-age pension law and in finishing my short address may I say that I welcome any suggestions and letters regarding old-age pensions, and that if those who are outside the State of Minnesota will write to their Congressman, I am sure that he will appreciate knowing your views concerning this important question of the day. Let us meet this issue with the firmness that we have attacked the depression, and show the same courage and faith in our American institutions, and let us all, with the great brotherly spirit of helpfulness that has so exemplified the American people in meeting common problems, by giving the old, infirm, and aged people the pleasure and beauty of life that comes with old age. Let us not cloud their memories of their pleasant past when they were sturdy citizens, with the cold realization that their numbered days will be spent in privation, confined solitude, and mental torture.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. SWANK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SWANK. Mr. Speaker, it is with great regret that I announce to this House the death of Hon. John A. Simpson, president of the National Farmers Union of the United States.

Mr. Simpson lived in Bethany, Okla.; his office was in Oklahoma City; and it was an honor to have him for my constituent. I have been well and intimately acquainted with him for many years and am glad to have been associated with him in the great work in which he was engaged.

He was one of the leading citizens of Oklahoma and belonged to the United States. When he was called away, one of my best and most reliable friends left me.

He gave the active years of his manhood to the betterment of the conditions of the tillers of the soil. He always said that agriculture was the leading industry in this country and the one upon which all business depends. He maintained that the surest and speediest method of recovery was to rehabilitate agriculture.

He was the greatest farm leader in the United States, and when he died the farmers lost the most able and effective exponent of their rights. He was devoted to his family, his friends, and his country, and no words of mine could exaggerate his qualities of goodness and greatness. He was always unafraid, as brave as a lion, yet as tender-hearted as a woman.

Friends like him are not numerous, and when death let her curtain fall around him to hide from his view this which is called life I lost a good friend, indeed, and the country a great citizen.

John Simpson is gone, but his spirit lives, and nothing would please him better than to know that his friends in this House will carry forward the fight in which he laid down his life. Let us consecrate ourselves anew and carry on the great work for which he fought so valiantly.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, the independent offices appropriation bill, of which we have heard something within the last few days, was taken up in the other body today, and the two amendments adopted in the House disagreed to. The bill has been returned to the House and is on the Speaker's table. It will be my purpose tomorrow morning after the disposition of matters on the Speaker's table to call up the bill and make the usual motion that the House further insist on the House amendments to the Senate amendments. Of course, the usual parliamentary procedure will follow.

Mr. SNELL. What became of the other amendments?

Mr. WOODRUM. All the other amendments are in conference.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, in reference to the matter which the gentleman from Virginia has brought up, I wish to state to the House that tomorrow, if he asks unanimous consent that the House further insist and asks for a conference—if the gentleman makes that request, I shall be constrained to object. Then if he moves that the House insist on the amendments, I will offer a motion to recede and concur in the Senate amendments. I wanted to call that to the attention of the Members of the House so that they might know what would come up.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Does the gentleman think the House will reverse itself on its vote of yesterday?

Mr. CONNERY. I would not be surprised; several Members have told me that they did not know that they were voting to increase their salaries and cut the veterans.

Mr. BOILEAU. The gentleman knows that the House has reversed itself once.

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. BROWNING. Does the gentleman consider that it was a cut on the veterans?

Mr. CONNERY. From 90 percent to 75 percent.

Mr. BROWNING. They are not getting anything now.

Mr. CONNERY. It cuts them down from the Senate amendment.

Mr. BROWNING. Oh, no; they are not receiving anything now.

Mr. CONNERY. But the Senate is willing to give them 90, and the gentleman wants to cut them down to 75 percent. If you do that, are you pushing them up?

Mr. BROWNING. But they are not getting anything now, and I am not willing to have the statement stand that we have cut any veteran.

Mr. CONNERY. I consider it a cut. You want to give them 75 percent, and I want to give them 90 percent.

Mr. BROWNING. We have given them 75 percent, and they are not getting anything now.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. And the gentleman from Massachusetts knows that if he insists upon his motion they will not get anything.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H.R. 8134) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture and for the Farm Credit Administration for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill, H.R. 8134, the agricultural appropriation bill, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Is this agreeable to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. SINCLAIR]?

Mr. SANDLIN. I have talked this over with Mr. Sinclair, and it is agreeable to him.

Mr. SNELL. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Chair appointed the following conferees:

Mr. SANDLIN, Mr. HART, Mr. CANNON of Missouri, Mr. SINCLAIR, and Mr. THURSTON.

H.R. 8097

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record and to include therein a very informative letter concerning rural carriers and their work in my district. I do this for the information of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I feel obliged to object.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the gentleman withhold that?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. The letter deals simply with a bill before Congress, and I want to put this in the Record so that the Members may have information with respect to it.

There is no politics in it. It is solely for the information of the Members of the House.

Mr. TABER. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the Record, I include the following very informative letter concerning rural carriers and their work in my district:

WASHINGTON, D.C., March 14, 1934.

Re H.R. 8097.

To the honorable Members of Congress from Texas.

GENTLEMEN: We are advised that the above-numbered bill, H.R. 8097, introduced in the House by Hon. JOHN F. DOCKWEILER, of California, will soon come up for consideration.

We are also advised that this bill would materially reduce the compensation of rural letter carriers, in that it provides for a radical change in the basis of pay.

We are informed that this bill will have the approval of the officials of the Post Office Department.

At a meeting of the Grayson County (Tex.) Rural Letter Carriers Association recently held in Sherman, Tex., a committee was appointed to make a survey of conditions affecting the rural delivery system of the county and to communicate to you the result of its findings.

The committee sent questionnaires to each of the rural carriers of the county, and the figures given are tabulated from 27 answers to them and from information received from the commissioners' court of the county.

We find that Grayson County has 131 miles of concrete highways, and that only 39 miles of these roads are traveled by the rural carriers. It also has 375 miles of gravel roads which were constructed several years ago and at the present time are very little, if any, better than the common dirt roads, of which the county has 1,215 miles. Of these 375 miles of so-called gravel roads, the rural carriers travel only 194 miles.

As you well know, the soil of Grayson County is for the most part black land and clay, and the roads cannot be traveled during wet weather without great difficulty and much added expense, and during prolonged wet spells the roads get in very bad condition.

The average length of the 27 routes in Grayson County, upon the report of which the communication is based, is a little more than 36 miles. This length conforms to the average length of the rural routes of the United States.

The time consumed in rendering service on the routes in bad weather in some cases amounts to 14 hours per day, the average time being 8 hours and 15 minutes.

Under good weather and road conditions the average is 5½ hours.

The above does not take into consideration time spent in making minor repairs to equipment and in feeding and grooming horses, which is time necessary to continuous service, and which will probably require about 1 hour per day.

The rural carrier is prohibited by law from engaging in any other compensative work.

The investment in equipment used on the routes averages $1,078 per carrier.

The interest on this investment at legal rate is $107.80 per year. The automobiles used have had an average of 18 months of service and the depreciation averages about $500 per car.

The average monthly cost of serving the routes, which does not include interest, is as follows: Registration, tax, depreciation, etc., $52 per month. This does not include horse keep.

The average increased cost of serving routes has been 49 percent, this being in some measure due to the increased cost of gasoline to rural carriers, who were exempt from the State tax of 4 cents per gallon until the Federal tax of 1 cent per gallon was fixed and from which tax they were not exempt; and as a result of the Federal tax being imposed the carriers were then forced to pay the State tax of 4 cents additional.

The average number in family is 4 and the average of school age is 2.

The increase in the cost of living is estimated by the 27 as being 49 percent.

Several carriers have been compelled to take their children out of college and university as a result of the passage of the Economy Act, as they could not meet their other necessary obligations and keep their children in school. Any further reduction or a continuance of the Economy Act will necessitate other children leaving school, resulting in neglect of their education.

Several carriers own an equity in their homes and a number have found themselves unable to meet their payments, and as a result have lost their property since the enactments of the Economy Act.

Practically all have felt themselves compelled to let some of their life-insurance protection lapse, as they could not meet their premiums and take care of their other obligations, and as a result of the reduction of salary under the Economy Act $60,000 of such life-insurance protection has been forfeited on the lives of 30 carriers of Grayson County.

A number have been compelled to draw on savings accounts, or to dispose of property at a loss, in order to keep going.

None think they could continue their present life-insurance protection, which averages $2,500, if the proposed bill should become law, and a number think they would have to give up the equity they have acquired in their homes for a like reason.

It is the opinion of those answering the questionnaire, that actual cost of maintaining the equipment necessary to continuous service is 8½ cents per mile per day.

Rural carriers have, at the suggestion of the Department, at their own and much additional expense—in their effort to make this highly important branch of the Postal System more efficient—kept abreast of the times by the use of modern automotive equipment, when the service could have been performed at much less expense by the use of horse-drawn conveyance. As a result of this voluntary action on their part the Government has saved considerable money, as this action made possible the extension of routes from the standard mileage of 24 miles to the present average of 36 miles, which accounts for the saving of $45 per mile per year for the excess mileage.

The occupation of rural carrier is classed as hazardous by the health- and accident-insurance companies of the country, and if they can secure any such protection at all it is secured by the payment of a higher rate.

The basic salary of the rural carrier has always been under that of other postal employees performing like service, and the responsibility is greater, in that the rural carrier does every day on his route the work done by five men in the average post office of the first or second class. Any further reduction in pay, or a continuation of the present Economy Act would work a further injustice, an inequality, and a hardship on them.

During the World War those not engaged in the defense of the United States as members of the Army and Navy, as a matter of patriotism remained on the job at a salary less than the actual cost of rendering service, and providing a meager living for their families. Due to the prevailing high prices and the low salary received at that time many were plunged into debt that has borne heavily on them since. It is a well-known fact that cotton pickers during that time were making more money per week than the total compensation of rural carriers was per month.

The carriers of the country have been loyal to the Government and have made no complaint against the temporary reduction in salary as a result of the passage of the Economy Act, which they felt to be their necessary contribution toward helping the country back to normal. Now, with the normal prices prevailing, and further increase in the cost of rendering service and of living imminent, any reduction in compensation would work an undue hardship on them and would be a gross injustice, which we feel that you will not countenance after you have made your investigation of the true conditions affecting the service and so many of your constituents. We sincerely hope that you will use your influence against, and vote against, the passage of this proposed legislation when it comes up for action.

Assuring you of the deep appreciation of the carriers of Grayson County and of Texas, and of the consideration you have given such matters in the past, and praying for the same in the future, we are, with kindest regards and all good wishes,

Respectfully yours,

L. ANDREWS,
CARL YEAGER,
Committee, Sherman, Tex.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. CANNON of Wisconsin, for 10 days, on account of illness in his family.

To Mr. SABATH, for 3 days, on account of important business.

BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee did on this day present to the President, for his approval, a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 7808. An act to authorize annual appropriations to meet losses sustained by officers and employees of the United States in foreign countries due to appreciation of foreign currencies in their relation to the American dollar, and for other purposes.

RECESS

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House stand in recess until 7:30 o'clock p.m.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 21 minutes p.m.) the House stood in recess until 7:30 o'clock p.m.

EVENING SESSION

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker at 7:30 p.m.

PRIVATE CALENDAR

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the first bill on the Private Calendar.

INTERNATIONAL MANUFACTURERS' SALES CO. OF AMERICA, INC.

The Clerk called the first bill on the Private Calendar, H.R. 3460, for the relief of the International Manufacturers' Sales Co. of America, Inc.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object. This bill carries an appropriation of $968,748 and should not be passed. There is no excuse for taking $968,748.12 of the people's tax money out of the Treasury and paying it to the International Manufacturers' Sales Co. Inc., I cannot allow it to be passed, hence I object.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Is the gentleman going to persist in his objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I will leave it to my good friend from New York, who is one of the leading lawyers of his State, that if he were attorney in a case involving $968,748.12 would he try a case of this kind in less than a week or 10 days in any court?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Of course, I would like to argue it with the gentleman, but if the gentleman is going to object in any event, there is no use for me to argue.

Mr. BLANTON. Nine hundred sixty-eight thousand seven hundred and forty-eight dollars is too large an amount to take out of the Treasury, with only a few moments consideration, and pay it to a corporation. I object, Mr. Speaker.

PINKIE OSBORNE

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 3554, for the relief of Pinkie Osborne.

There being no objection, the Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Pinkie Osborne, of Elizabethtown, Hardin County, Ky., the sum of $2,500 in full settlement of all claim against the United States for injuries arising out of a gunshot wound inflicted by the discharge of a machine gun at Elizabethtown on April 6, 1918: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act shall be paid or delivered or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

WILLIAM SHELDON

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 3606, for the relief of William Sheldon.

There being no objection, the Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $5,000 be, and is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the relief of William Sheldon, former deputy United States marshal for the eastern district of Oklahoma, who was injured in the discharge of his duties: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorneys or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 2, strike out "$5,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,937.10."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

JOHN L. FRIEL

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 3621, for the relief of John L. Friel.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill appropriates $4,750 for contract work. The Secretary of War says that the filling of the main bank of the river and extension of garage were without Federal permission and in violation of the River and Harbor Act of 1899, and therefore, he does not recommend that the claim be paid. What does the gentleman have to say?

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. I yield.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. The author of this bill is the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY]. He called me a few moments ago and stated it was impossible for him to be here this evening, and he requested that if there was objection to this bill, and another later on the calendar, that they be passed over with the understanding that they might be returned to at some future calendar day.

Mr. TRUAX. I will be glad to consent to that.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the bill will be passed over.

There was no objection.

WARREN F. AVERY

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 6822, for the relief of Warren F. Avery.

There being no objection, the Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers Warren F. Avery, a private of Engineers, unassigned, United States Army, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of that organization on the 31st day of January 1929: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. HANCOCK of New York: At the end of the bill insert the words "or subsequent thereto."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

LOTTIE BRYANT STEEL

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 177, for the relief of Lottie Bryant Steel.

There being no objection, the Clerk read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Lottie Bryant Steel, remarried widow of Montgomery Bryant, who formerly served as a captain of the Sixth Regiment United States Infantry, and as a colonel of the Thirteenth Regiment United States Infantry, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,064, being the amount of pension due at the rate of $8 per month under the Pension Act of June 27, 1890, from May 22, 1892, date of filing claim, to June 26, 1903, date of her remarriage.

With the following committee amendments:

On page 1, line 9, strike out "the sum of $1,064, being the amount of pension due at the rate of $8 per month under the Pension Act of June 27, 1890, from May 22, 1892, date of filing claim, to June 26, 1903, date of her remarriage", and insert the following: "the sum of $105.07, being the amount of pension due at the rate of $8 per month from May 22, 1902, to date of remarriage of claimant on June 26, 1903: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CHARLES W. DWORACK

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 157, H.R. 666, for the relief of Charles W. Dworack.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Reserving the right to object, is that the gentleman that was burned?

Mr. HARLAN. That is the man that was burned.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. There was a specific understanding that we would return to that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. That was the agreement.

Mr. HARLAN. I have prepared a substitute, to strike out all after the enacting clause and substitute the bill, according to the recommendations of the gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HARLAN: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That sections 17 and 20 of the act entitled 'An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties and for other purposes', approved September 7, 1916, as amended (U.S.C., title 5, secs. 767-770), are hereby waived in favor of Charles W. Dworack, who was injured while in the employ of the Federal Government on February 12, 1922, at the time of the burning of the airship Roma, and said Charles W. Dworack is hereby granted the benefits of the other provisions of said act as amended: Provided, That no benefits shall accrue hereunder until the enactment of this act."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the agreement we had with the gentleman, if I remember correctly, was that this should be submitted to the Compensation Commission for their adjudication under this law.

Mr. HARLAN. That is exactly what this substitute does.

Mr. BLANTON. No, it does not; this adjudicates the matter right here and puts him on the pay roll under this act. That is the meaning of the language.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Mr. Speaker, if we insert the word "allegedly" after the word "who" it will cure the defect.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: After the word "Act", in the last line of the substitute, insert the following:

"Provided, Said Compensation Commission is to determine the merit and justice of this claim under the provisions of said Compensation Act."

The amendment to the substitute amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ANNA MARIE SANFORD

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 232, for the relief of Anna Marie Sanford.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the United States Employees' Compensation Commission is hereby authorized to consider and determine the claim of Anna Marie Sanford widow of William Richard Sanford, deceased, former furnace man, navy yard, Washington, D.C., in the same manner and to the same extent as if said William Richard Sanford had made application for the benefits of said act within the 1-year period required by sections 17 and 20 thereof, and notwithstanding the lapse of time between the injury sustained by the said William Richard Sanford at the Washington Navy Yard and his death: Provided, That no benefit shall accrue prior to the approval of this act.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MARY S. NEEL

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 3632, for the relief of Mary S. Neel.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. This also is a bill of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY], who is unable to be here tonight.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

GUSTAV WELHOELTER

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 3791, for the relief of Gustav Welhoelter.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

ANTHONY HOGUE

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 3793, for the relief of Anthony Hogue.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice because the same facts exist with reference to this bill as existed with reference to the other bill that has been passed over without prejudice.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I object to the request of the gentleman from Washington.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $600 to Anthony Hogue, formerly finance clerk of the Fox Creek post-office station, Detroit, Mich. Said sum represents the amount paid by said Anthony Hogue to the United States Government to make up the deficit in the accounts of the Fox Creek station, which deficit was caused by robbery or burglary of said post office.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I offer the usual attorneys' fee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOPE: At the end of the bill add a new paragraph reading as follows:

"Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GUSTAV WELHOELTER

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to calendar no. 184, the bill (H.R. 3791) for the relief of Gustav Welhoelter.

A bill involving the same situation has been passed; and if the gentleman from Kansas wishes to take the responsibility we will pass this one without objection.

Mr. HOPE. I may say to the gentleman from Washington I have no objection to the bill so far as I am concerned.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $900 to Gustav Welhoelter, assistant superintendent of the Fox Creek post-office station, Detroit, Mich. Said sum represents the amount paid by said Gustav Welhoelter to the United States Government to make up the deficit in the accounts of the Fox Creek station, which deficit was caused by robbery or burglary of said post office.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I offer the usual attorneys' fee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOPE: At the end of the bill insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ED SYMES ET AL.

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 3860, for the relief of Ed Symes and wife, Elizabeth Symes, and certain other citizens of the State of Texas.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. CROSS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will not the gentleman withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Mr. Chairman, I withhold my objection to permit the gentleman to make a statement.

Mr. CROSS of Texas. This bill was passed at the last session. It merely allows two or three poor families who live there on the river the right to sue and establish any damages they may have. At the time the bill was passed in the House my colleague, Mr. Blanton, or Mr. Stafford—I forget which—limited the amount. The Senate was not able to reach the bill and act on it before the session adjourned.

The bill does not give a penny to these people; it merely gives them the right to go into the Federal Court and establish any damages they may have suffered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Mr. Speaker, I shall have to insist on my objection.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

JOANNA A. SHEEHAN

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 3908, for the relief of Joanna A. Sheehan.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman have a heart and reserve his objection?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I reserve my objection. It is a question of not enough time having elapsed.

Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts. May I explain the situation? This unfortunate lady bought a Liberty bond some 12 years ago and paid $1,000 for it. The bond was lost when she was moving from one house to another. She is a perfectly reputable person. For 12 years she has received nothing. The bond matured 6 years ago. The Treasury cannot lose anything by this bill because before she can get any money from the Treasury for either principal or interest, she must put up a bond for double the amount, so the Treasury cannot lose anything at all.

Mr. BLANTON. She must put up an indemnity bond?

Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts. An indemnity bond. The only objection that was made to it was some 3 years ago when the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Ogden Mills, said that not enough time had elapsed.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Does the gentleman mention the name of Ogden Mills as being an authority?

Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts. He reported 3 years ago that he thought sufficient time had not elapsed, but 3 years has elapsed since then. She lost this bond 12 years ago. This lady is in very modest circumstances and has been without the interest on the bond or the principal of the bond since then. She bought the bond patriotically during the war and I do not see how the gentleman could have the heart to keep her from getting the money at this time.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. If the gentleman will repudiate the opinion of Ogden Mills at this time and say that Ogden Mills' opinion was not a good one, I will not object.

Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts. I agree to that insofar as this bill is concerned.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object. There is a statement in here of Mr. Ogden Mills under date of March 9, 1932, that is only 2 years ago.

Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts. I am mistaken then as to the number of years.

Mr. TRUAX. The Treasury Department does not approve payment. We would be establishing a precedent. The Treasury Department said that sufficient time had not elapsed.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, may I ask if it is not a fact that Ogden Mills does not know anything about the precedents if he makes that statement, because we have passed bill after bill here, which the gentleman knows about, to make good loss of bonds and other obligations that were lost where indemnity bonds have been given to protect the Treasury?

Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts. Yes. I have in my office a number of precedents of that kind.

Mr. TRUAX. If the gentleman will make the further admission that Ogden Mills did not know anything about the Treasury Department or bonds, I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts. For the purpose of getting the gentleman to withdraw his objection, I will make any admission.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. If this had been $500,000,000 belonging to some New York banker, it would not have taken this much time.

Mr. BLANTON. That would have gotten by Ogden Mills, but it would never get through this House at all because we would have seen that it was stopped.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Mills would hold that it would take a great deal longer for a person in mediocre circumstances to prove their claim than a multimillionaire from New York.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to redeem, in favor of Joanna A. Sheehan, of Haverhill, Mass., United States Liberty loan permanent coupon bond no. 321498 in the denomination of $1,000, of the third 4½'s issued May 9, 1918, matured September 15, 1923, with interest from the date of issue to the date of maturity, at the rate of 4½ percent per annum, without presentation of said bond, the said bond, together with coupons due September 15, 1922, to September 15, 1923, inclusive, attached, having been lost, stolen, or destroyed: Provided, That the said bond shall not have been previously presented and paid, and that payment shall not be made hereunder for any coupons which shall have been previously presented and paid: And provided further, That the said Joanna A. Sheehan shall first file in the Treasury Department a bond in the penal sum of double the amount of the principal of the said Liberty loan bond and the unpaid interest which had accrued thereon when the principal became due and payable, in such form and with such surety or sureties as may be acceptable to the Secretary of the Treasury, with condition to indemnify and save harmless the United States from any loss on account of the Liberty loan bond or the coupons thereof hereinbefore described: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MARY ELIZABETH O'BRIEN

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 4252, to extend the benefits of the Employees' Compensation Act of September 7, 1916, to Mary Elizabeth O'Brien, a former employee of the United States Veterans' Bureau.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York, and Mr. ZIONCHECK rose.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have the gentleman explain one or two discrepancies in dates that I notice in the record. It is alleged that this girl acquired tuberculosis while in the employ of the United States Veterans' Bureau.

Mr. BLOOM. That is correct.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. And that she acquired this tuberculosis in 1924?

Mr. BLOOM. Yes.

Mr. HANCOCK. I note that she was discharged from service in 1926 suffering from some disease of the eyes. No mention is made of tuberculosis at that time. This claim is evidently an afterthought and was made several years later.

Mr. BLOOM. My attention was called to this matter the last time we had the Private Calendar under discussion. I looked into the matter and got an affidavit from the young lady. On page 3 you will find her affidavit in which she says she left the service in 1924. I took this up with the Department and I find that they got the case of another person by the same name confused with this case. The affidavit sworn to by the young lady says that she left the service in 1924 when she was ordered by the doctor to go up to Saranac Lake, N.Y., or wherever she was sent, and has been there ever since.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. The statement of the Assistant Director of the Veterans' Bureau is to the effect that Mrs. O'Brien's separation from the Veterans' Bureau was effective May 4, 1926, and it should be noted that it was because of retirement for total disability for useful and efficient service by reason of disease of the eyes.

Mr. BLOOM. My attention was called to this matter the last time, I may say to the gentleman, and since then I have investigated. If the gentleman will look at page 3 of the report, he will find the affidavit of this lady which says, "I went away to take a rest cure; I went to Vineland, N.J., and later on, on or about August 5, 1924, arrived in Saranac Lake, N.Y., where I have been since that date under the care of Dr. F. B. Trudeau and Dr. Blumfiel." As I stated to the gentleman before, the O'Brien case as reported by the Department was another O'Brien—not this case. I investigated since I spoke to the gentleman about it, and I may assure the gentleman that the case of the lady who was discharged or left the Department later on account of trouble with her eyes was a different case entirely.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. As far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing that the Compensation Commission pass on the facts involved, provided the gentleman is willing to accept an amendment, which is usual in cases of this kind, providing that no benefits shall accrue prior to the approval of the bill.

Mr. BLOOM. If the gentleman insists on that amendment, I will accept it.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. That is our uniform practice.

Mr. BLOOM. She has been up there ever since and this case has been in Congress before.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Whatever we do for her is a pure act of grace.

Mr. BLOOM. I am willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. She has already received $886.08 from the Compensation Commission.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the United States Employees' Compensation Commission shall be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to extend to Mary Elizabeth O'Brien, a former employee of the United States Veterans' Bureau, the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes", approved September 7, 1916.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out everything after the enacting clause and insert the following: "That sections 17 and 20 of the act entitled 'An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes', are hereby waived in favor of Mary Elizabeth O'Brien, a former employee of the United States Veterans' Bureau."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HANCOCK of New York: At the end of line 8 on page 2, at the end of the committee amendment, insert a colon and the following proviso: "Provided no benefits shall accrue prior to the approval of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended to read: A bill for the relief of Mary Elizabeth O'Brien.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

LAURA GOLDWATER

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 4253, for the relief of Laura Goldwater.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I direct the attention of the gentleman from New York to page 2 of the report, the letter of the Post Office Department, dated March 20, 1930, which contains this statement:

The evidence disclosed in the investigation of this case shows that the mail truck was southbound and had reached a point a few feet south of an intersection of streets when the claimant, who was standing just south of an elevated pillar, stepped out toward the street-car tracks and in the general direction of the passing truck.

Unless I can be assured by the gentleman that the claimant was at a street intersection, I shall have to object. In other words, if the claimant was not at an intersection, quite naturally she would be charged with using just a little more precaution than otherwise.

Mr. BLOOM. The gentleman has read the report and I am sure understands the situation of the elevated pillars in the middle of the street.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Yes; I understand that.

Mr. BLOOM. This lady was standing between the two columns, and the street there is an eastbound or westbound street, and the truck came from the other direction. This lady did not expect the truck to come from the wrong direction, and she was struck by the truck. This, of course, is her claim, but the gentleman knows how some of these mail trucks go through the streets. There are no traffic regulations for them, and this lady was absolutely blameless. The Department always sends in a report of this kind. They never assume any of the blame. Their drivers are always right, and all the blame is upon the pedestrian. This lady, as the gentleman will note from the report, had hotel expenses amounting to over $7,000. She is disabled for life, and there is no reason based upon anything in the report why we should not accept part of the statement of the injured claimant, as well as any statement that may have been made by the driver of the truck. I know this location very well, and I am convinced that the truck driver should have exercised more care in the premises. The pedestrians have some rights, especially in a situation like the one involved here at this elevated station.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I appreciate that fact, and I withdraw my objection, Mr. Speaker, and will ask the gentleman if he is willing to accept the usual amendment.

Mr. BLOOM. I shall be pleased to do that, Mr. Speaker. There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Laura Goldwater the sum of $20,000 for damages suffered by her by reason of being struck and seriously injured by a Government mail truck.

With the following committee amendments:

Line 6, strike out "$20,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$5,000", and at the end of the bill insert the following: "Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANCHARD: In line 6, after the word "damages" insert "in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

JOE SETTON

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 4268, for the relief of Joe Setton.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask if the gentleman from New York is willing to accept the usual attorney's fee amendment?

Mr. BLOOM. I shall be pleased to accept such an amendment, Mr. Speaker.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Joe Setton, of New York City, the sum of $500. Such sum represents the amount of a bond forfeited to the United States by the said Joe Setton, such bond being conditioned upon the voluntary departure of his mother, Sabout Setton, from the United States at the expiration of 1 year after her admission to the United States as a non-immigrant alien. Due to illness, she was unable to depart, but the said Joe Setton made no application within the prescribed period for an extension of time of her temporary visit, having no knowledge that such extension was necessary.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANCHARD: At the end of the bill, page 2, line 4, strike out the period, insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ANNIE MORAN

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 4272, for the relief of Annie Moran.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from New York has had a very good batting average—

Mr. BLOOM. Please do not spoil it.

Mr. BLANCHARD. That is what I am about to do, but I shall reserve my objection if the gentleman cares to make a statement.

Mr. BLOOM. I should be pleased to offer any explanation of any matter the gentleman wants to be informed upon.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I am quite sure the gentleman cannot satisfy my objection, and I shall have to interpose an objection.

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman give me an opportunity to convince him of the merits of the bill?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I shall be glad to reserve my objection.

Mr. BLOOM. Is there any particular point about which the gentleman would like to be informed?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, I can only say to the gentleman from New York that I have made up my mind and I am perfectly satisfied the bill should be objected to. The report of the committee makes this statement:

It is hard to see on what theory the Post Office Department refuses to allow this claim, and the file indicates that the driver, while exonerated on the charge of manslaughter by the magistrate's court, was found guilty of running his vehicle with defective brakes and fined for this offense $50.

Of course, I cannot see where the matter of defective brakes enters into this at all. An examination of this bill does not disclose, in my opinion, that the driver of the truck was in any way negligent. I cannot find anything in the report or in the files to indicate that there is a shred of evidence to sustain any finding that the claimant is entitled to relief from the United States Government.

The fact of the matter is if the gentleman will examine the letter of the Postmaster General or the Executive Assistant to the Postmaster General, which is found on page 2 of the report, he will agree with me that it is quite conclusive, unless the gentleman can show that the facts stated are not correct.

Mr. BLOOM. May I paint the picture of what happened: This young boy was riding a bicycle, going along near the curb where he was supposed to be.

Mr. BLANCHARD. In the same direction in which the truck was going?

Mr. BLOOM. Absolutely. When they got to an intersection of the street, the boy going along near the curb, the driver was supposed to have stopped his car. He did not do that because his brakes were defective, so he pulled over toward the curb, which he had no right to do, and knocked the boy down and killed him. There is no question about that. The boy was in the right channel, he was on his bicycle in the path near the curbstone where he should be. He did not know the driver was going to pull over toward him. The driver pulled over so suddenly the boy did not know it, and he knocked him down and killed him.

Now, I am not pleading for a constituent, I am pleading for the mother. I should like to read a letter that I had from her. I want to say that in the last Congress this bill was passed, and the mother was allowed the sum of $3,050, but it died in the Senate. I think there should be some consideration given to this poor mother.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Does not the gentleman think that $2,000 is a high rate of interest for one year?

Mr. BLOOM. Yes. I would be satisfied to take the $3,050. I want to read this letter from the mother.

DECEMBER 1932.

DEAR FRIEND MR. BLOOM: Just a line hoping you won't forget to do the best you can for me. I have a sick boy this last 3 months, and I am crippled with rheumatism for the last 4 months myself. Hoping that things will turn in my favor and thanking you very much for your kindness.

Now, I want to say, gentlemen, that I do not believe you should always take the word of these mail-truck drivers, but give some consideration to the mothers or the widows, or someone else, and take all the circumstances into consideration.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLOOM. Yes.

Mr. KVALE. I know nothing about this individual case, but I want to say that these drivers of mail trucks as a class are the most reckless, careless violators of the traffic rules of any group of drivers I know of.

Mr. BLOOM. Let me say that I think it was wrong when they cut this down to $3,050, but if it is necessary to cut it down, to see that the mother gets something for the loss of her son, I am willing to take that amount.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The fact that it did not pass the Senate does not affect my judgment.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that I must insist on my objection.

Mr. BLOOM. Will not the gentleman accept a compromise?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I will compromise to this extent, that if the gentleman wants it passed over without prejudice, I will not object.

Mr. BLOOM. But it will be another 2 years before we reach it. Will not the gentleman give this lady the amount of the compromise?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I am not willing to do that on the testimony given by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BLOOM. What other testimony would the gentleman want?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I admit the gentleman made a very fine statement himself, but as far as I am concerned, it does not conform to what the report says.

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman let this go over without prejudice with the understanding that it will be the first bill called up the next time we call the calendar?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I am willing to do that.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice, with the understanding that it will be the first bill called on the next call of the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

FRANK WILKINS

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 4542, for the relief of Frank Wilkins.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. Is the author of the bill here?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, this is the celebrated horse bill of some time ago. If the proponent of this bill will agree to an amendment reducing the amount from $200 to $100, I think we can get away with a very difficult case.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I agree to that, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated and in full settlement against the Government, the sum of $200 to Frank Wilkins for the death of a horse caused by a shot on the military reservation at Fort McPherson, Ga., in December 1925.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ZIONCHECK: Line 6, strike out "$200" and insert "$100."

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

CHARLES T. GRANGER

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 4579, for the relief of Dr. Charles T. Granger.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object, to ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KVALE] whether he regards this amount as a reasonable charge for the services rendered?

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, I regard the amount as shamefully low in view of the charges, not only of the doctor but for the attendance in the hospital involved. I think this is a very modest request for an unusual service. I think it is a most meritorious bill in every detail.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection and the Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Department of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of funds of the Chippewa Indians of Minnesota and in full settlement against the Government, the sum of $290 to Dr. Charles T. Granger for hospitalization and medical services rendered Joseph Abbott, an Indian patient at the Granger Hospital, McGregor, Minn.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

AUGUSTUS THOMPSON

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 4609, for the relief of Augustus Thompson.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be paid out of the contingent funds of the House to Augustus Thompson, a former member of the House Office Building police force, the sum of $2,500 in full payment on account of personal injuries sustained by said Augustus Thompson in the House Office Building on February 27, 1930, while in the discharge of duty.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, in lines 5 and 6, I move to strike out the words "in full payment" and substitute in lieu thereof the words "in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States", and at the end of the bill insert the usual attorney's fee clause.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANCHARD: Lines 5 and 6, strike out "in full payment" and insert in lieu thereof "in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States."

At the end of the bill, strike out the period, insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The amendments were agreed to; and the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

MARY A. COX

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 4777, for the relief of Mary A. Cox.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I am constrained to object to this bill for the reason that the claim was not put in for some 10 years after the injury alleged.

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland. The gentleman notices that the claim was filed in May 1922.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Yes; but the injury comes from 1919.

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland. That is 3 or 4 years after.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. What has been done in the meantime?

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland. Nothing.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, for the time being, I object.

OSCAR F. LACKEY

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 4779, for the relief of the estate of Oscar F. Lackey.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. The Comptroller General recommends that this bill be amended, because the evidence shows that Mr. Lackey died after learning of the appropriation for his benefit 15 years later.

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland. I have no objection to an amendment if the gentleman will offer it. My understanding is that that has been corrected. As I understand it the objection of the Comptroller has been taken care of in the bill.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized to adjust and settle the claim of Mary Lackey Combs, of Riderwood, Md., as executrix of the estate of Oscar F. Lackey, deceased, for $1,500: Provided, That such payment to Mary Lackey Combs, as executrix, shall be in full satisfaction of all claims against the United States of the estate of said Oscar F. Lackey, for such injury received by him and to allow said claim under the appropriation made by the act of February 18, 1913 (37 Stat. 1372), for payment to the deceased for injuries received on November 21, 1905, while in the employ of the Isthmian Canal Commission as assistant engineer in the construction of the Panama Canal, he having died without receiving such amount.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Mr. Speaker I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk:

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the bill strike out the period, insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word merely to afford me the opportunity to call attention to the fact that our Panama Canal employees are some of the most highly favored in the world. That is the reason that constituents from our districts apply for positions there and stay on the waiting list, because vacancies rarely occur.

Panama Canal employees get high salaries, low rents, long vacations, and many privileges not enjoyed by employees elsewhere.

I want you all to read the testimony given by Col. Julian L. Schley, Governor of the Panama Canal, given before the Subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations handling the War Department appropriation bill, of which I am a member, which you will find on pages 78 to 133, inclusive, of the Hearings on Nonmilitary Activities. Having secured permission of the House to do so, I want to quote you some excerpts from same:

EXCERPTS FROM TESTIMONY OF COL. JULIAN L. SCHLEY, GOVERNOR OF THE PANAMA CANAL

The gold, or American, force of the Canal organization—aside from the Panama Railroad—was 2,462 at the end of December 1933, and the silver, or alien, force was 6,143, these figures being less than a year ago by 225 Americans and 1,422 aliens, not counting those temporarily engaged on P.W.A. projects.

During 1933 health conditions in general in the Canal Zone and the cities of Panama and Colon were good. No outbreaks of quarantinable disease occurred.

Mr. BOLTON. What is your passenger rate for Canal employees?

Mr. ROSSBOTTOM. $30.

Mr. BOLTON. Each way?

Mr. ROSSBOTTOM. Each way.

Mr. BOLTON. Why do you make it so low?

Mr. ROSSBOTTOM. That is the rate that was charged by the Panama Railroad Co. to its own employees and their families before the Government took charge of the property.

Mr. BOLTON. What do other lines charge for passengers to the Canal Zone?

Mr. ROSSBOTTOM. Most of the lines have a tariff rate of $125 between New York and Colon, and they allow the employees a 25-percent reduction; that is, the employees of the Panama Canal. So that they would get a 25-percent reduction from the $125 rate, and in some instances they have a $100 rate on some of the freight ships.

Mr. BLANTON. When they come to the States they have how long a leave?

Governor SCHLEY. It amounts to 52 days a year, which aggregates for 2 years 104 days.

Mr. BLANTON. They have 104 days off on pay every 2 years?

Governor SCHLEY. Yes; because they get no Saturdays or half-Saturdays off.

Mr. BLANTON. Every 2 years they have 104 days off with pay?

Governor SCHLEY. Yes, sir. Twenty-four days' annual leave and 30 days' cumulative leave are allowed each monthly employee and 24 days' annual and 20 days' cumulative leave are allowed each hourly employee. In addition 7 days' travel leave is allowed employees who travel on leave to points outside the Tropics not more frequently than once each year, making a total of 115 days which may be allowed monthly employees, and 95 days which may be allowed hourly employees every 2 years. Absence on account of sickness is charged to such leave allowances, no special sick leave being provided for.

Mr. BLANTON. They get a special subsidized rate of $30 on our ship to come back and forth?

Governor SCHLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. I mean in coming on their vacation?

Governor SCHLEY. They could not afford to come at $100.

Mr. BLANTON. But they do get a special subsidized rate of $30 in coming back and forth on their vacation; that is so, is it not?

Governor SCHLEY. Yes; they get a special rate.

Mr. BLANTON. They do not work on Sundays?

Governor SCHLEY. They work only 6 days a week and get Sunday off.

Mr. BLANTON. They work 6 days a week, 7 hours a day?

Governor SCHLEY. The office force, the same as in this country. Mr. BLANTON. They work 6 days a week, 7 hours a day, the office force?

Governor SCHLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. And the field force works 6 days a week, how many hours?

Governor SCHLEY. Eight hours.

Mr. BLANTON. Then they get their retirement feature, after 30 years' service?

Governor SCHLEY. Yes; they can retire after 30 years' service and at age 62.

RENT AND OTHER CHARGES MADE TO EMPLOYEES OCCUPYING PANAMA CANAL QUARTERS

Mr. COLLINS. Now, with reference to the employees of the Canal, you provide them with houses, do you, Governor?

Governor SCHLEY. We provide houses which they may use.

Mr. COLLINS. What percentage of the employees would you say occupy houses which you provide?

Governor SCHLEY. All gold (American) employees and 47 percent of all silver (alien) employees reside in Panama Canal quarters.

Mr. COLLINS. What about the rental for these houses? How is the rate determined?

Governor SCHLEY. The rentals were originally determined in about 1922 or 1923, when rent was first established. Prior to that employees were not required to pay for their quarters. At the time the rentals were established the entire square-foot area of the quarters was computed, and the value of the quarters, and then the one was divided by the other, taking into consideration the necessary repair costs.

Mr. COLLINS. You showed us the picture of a house a while ago, which seemed to be a four- or five-room house, with porches around it. What does that house cost you to build, plus your landscaping, and so on?

Governor SCHLEY. That house has about four rooms on each side. It is a two-family house and it is divided in the middle, and each one has about four rooms, in addition to the other living rooms.

Mr. BOLTON. About four rooms for each part?

Governor SCHLEY. Yes. It costs about $4,425 per apartment, which in that case would be half of the house, which would make the cost about $8,800.

Mr. COLLINS. That is for the house proper?

Governor SCHLEY. The whole house.

Mr. COLLINS. And the appurtenances, the walks, and so on, would add how much to that cost, about $1,000?

Governor SCHLEY. I have not a figure on that. It varies very much. Sometimes we build houses in one way and sometimes in another way, and the investment is a variable figure. Sometimes we have to grade, and it is quite a variable figure.

Mr. COLLINS. What do you rent each part of that house for?

Governor SCHLEY. Each part rents for seventeen-and-odd dollars. That is the most popular type, because it is so cheap.

Mr. COLLINS. It seems to have a paved road in front of it, or a street.

Governor SCHLEY. Yes.

Mr. COLLINS. You pay for that?

Governor SCHLEY. Yes; a village has to be laid out, and the municipal improvements put in before the houses are built.

Mr. COLLINS. And water, and so on, are furnished?

Governor SCHLEY. Water and sewers. Of course he pays for his water.

Mr. COLLINS. What do you charge him for his water there?

Governor SCHLEY. I will have to look up that figure. It is mostly a flat rate and quite moderate. He also pays for his current.

[NOTE.—The following are the rates of charges for water to employees and those entitled to employees' rates:]

For use in quarters:

(a) Bachelor quarters, frame.....per month..	$0.25
(b) Concrete house no. 351, Ancon.....do.....	.50
(c) Concrete houses 356, Ancon, and 765, Balboa.....do.....	.75
(d) Family quarters, nonhousekeeping.....do.....	1.00
(e) 2- and 4-family houses.....do.....	1.00
(f) Cottages.....do.....	1.50
(g) Official and other large 2-story 1-family houses, do.....	2.00

Mr. COLLINS. What do you charge him for electricity?

Governor SCHLEY. I will have to look up that rate.

Mr. COLLINS. That is for private consumers?

Governor SCHLEY. Yes.

First 150 kilowatt-hours per month....per kilowatt-hour..	$0.02
Next 49,850 kilowatt-hours (151 to 50,000).....do.....	.0125
Over 50,000 kilowatt-hours.....do.....	.01
Minimum charge for any one user per month.....	1.00

SALARIES AND SUBSISTENCE OF EMPLOYEES

Mr. COLLINS. Governor Schley, I have been looking over the salary schedules on the Canal. Have you got a minimum salary of $3,000 there?

Governor SCHLEY. You are speaking now of the classified employees?

Mr. COLLINS. I see one group here of 67 employees, such as copyist, clerk, timekeeper, hostler, inspector, and so forth, with total salaries of $24,592, which makes a total average salary of $3,456. Again you have 46 employees, with total salaries of $144,500.

What do you pay policemen on the Canal, average salary?

Governor SCHLEY. The chief gets $5,750. There are 138 policemen, with total salaries of $367,259, or an average salary of $2,700.

Mr. COLLINS. What is the average pay of your firemen?

Governor SCHLEY. There are 42½, with total salaries of $115,287; average salary, about $2,700.

Mr. COLLINS. What do you pay nurses?

Governor SCHLEY. We have 88 female nurses, each receiving a salary of $2,114.

Mr. COLLINS. Do you furnish them with meals in addition to that?

Governor SCHLEY. If my memory is correct on that, we do not have to furnish them with quarters, as they pay for their quarters, but we do furnish them with meals. It is one of the subsisting groups. But that statement is subject to correction, however.

SALARIES OF UNCLASSIFIED EMPLOYEES

Mr. COLLINS. I notice in one instance there are 46 unclassified employees; I imagine they are persons on a per diem basis. You have some getting $1.64—I imagine that is per hour—2 at $1.43, 1 at $1.26, 11 at $1.20, 30 at $1.19, which, according to the amount paid, $144,550, would average about $3,000 per year.

Now, in addition to their salary, what retirement privilege do they have?

Governor SCHLEY. We have a regular retirement act.

Mr. COLLINS. What is the maximum?

Governor SCHLEY. I am not familiar with the figures on that; I will have to get them for you. But it was a law enacted about 4 or 5 years ago, the new retirement act. I might say it is different from that applying to civil employees in the States.

Mr. COLLINS. How much is the annual Government contribution?

Governor SCHLEY. I will have to get that figure for you.

The Canal Zone Retirement Act, effective July 1, 1931, provides for the retirement of all employees of the Panama Canal and the Panama Railroad Co. on the Isthmus of Panama, who are citizens of the United States and whose tenure of employment is not intermittent nor of uncertain duration. Employees may be retired at the age of 62 after 15 or more years of service on the Isthmus of Panama. The minimum annuity for 30 years' service (including 15 years on the Isthmus of Panama), is $1,500 per annum. Employees who served during the construction period between May 4, 1904, and April 1, 1914, receive, in addition to their regular annuity, $36 for each year of such service. The highest annuity paid to a former Panama Canal employee is $1,806.48 per annum.

SALARIES OF SCHOOL TEACHERS

Now, Governor, what is the average salary paid teachers on the Canal?

Governor SCHLEY. We have 127 teachers, whose aggregate annual salaries amount to $288,437, or an average of about $2,270 a year.

Mr. BLANTON. Then they may rent quarters for as little as $15 a month; is that right?

Governor SCHLEY. No, sir; the lowest-pay quarters are $17 a month, and there are not very many of those. They run up to about $40; $17 is the lowest price we have.

Mr. BOLTON. You also operate a free dispensary, do you not?

Governor SCHLEY. The dispensaries are free.

Mr. COLLINS. What do you charge as a license fee for an automobile?

Governor SCHLEY. Five dollars per year for a passenger automobile for personal use.

Mr. COLLINS. What about gasoline taxes?

Governor SCHLEY. We have no tax on gasoline.

Mr. COLLINS. Not even a Government tax?

Governor SCHLEY. We have no taxes of that type.

Mr. COLLINS. You do not pay the Federal tax of 1 or 2 cents, either?

Governor SCHLEY. I would have to inquire about that.

NOTE.—The tax is not payable on gasoline exported to the Canal Zone.

Mr. COLLINS. What do you sell gasoline for down there?

Governor SCHLEY. About 8 cents. We buy it in tank-load lots.

Mr. COLLINS. You buy it for about 8 cents?

Governor SCHLEY. I do not mean the Government pays that; I mean we pay that at retail.

[NOTE. The price is 8½ cents per gallon for straight gasoline and 11 cents for ethyl gasoline.]

Mr. COLLINS. You operate the filling stations there?

Governor SCHLEY. We do.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I respectfully submit that our employees at the Panama Canal are highly privileged, unusually well paid, and are fortunate indeed to have employment there.

I think they are some of the most favored employees in the world. They get large salaries, with easy working hours and special consideration on leave, and then they get reduced rates to come to the States to spend their generous vacations. They get many unusual privileges. They are in a class to themselves. Some of these times we will have to readjust all those conditions down there.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last two words. While the gentleman from Texas and I sometimes agree, I rather disagree with him on the assertion that he has made with regard to the Canal Zone employees being favored employees. I want to say they are about the most disfavored employees that we have in the service of the United States Government. Most of them go down there and put in 8 or 10 or 15 years, and they come back with their health gone. It just so happens that during the last month I have made arrangements whereby five of those employees have been placed in State institutions in my State with tuberculosis. They are, of course, paying their way. They are taken down there.

They are very subject to tuberculosis down there, and many of them contract it. They go down there in a few years and lose their residence in any State, and as soon as they contract tuberculosis the Government sends them back to the United States and unloads them at New York without even any transportation home. There are a great many injustices done employees on the Canal Zone. They work under terrible conditions in the heat, in an atmosphere and a climate that they are not adapted to. Anything I can say in behalf of those employees I would say. I say this from my own experience down there, for I have worked there three different times for the Government.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill. I will withdraw the motion later, but I just want to answer the gentleman from Minnesota. With all due respect to what the gentleman from Minnesota has said, the only difference between his statement and mine is that mine is based upon evidence given before the Committee on Appropriations by Lt. Col. Julian L. Schley, the Governor of the Panama Canal, and not the conjectures of anybody. It is the testimony of the Governor himself.

If you will get the hearings respecting nonmilitary activities, that have recently been printed on the War Department appropriation bill and look on pages 78 to 133, inclusive of same, and see the admissions made by Colonel Schley, Governor of the Panama Canal, with respect to conditions as to employment, as to salaries paid, as to annual leave, as to rents charged, as to working hours, and everything else, you will see that everything I have said is based upon facts.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I will.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Year after year the employees down there have been losing that which they were rightfully entitled to. When they first went there they were entitled to free quarters.

Mr. BLANTON. No other Government civil employees get free quarters. I am sure the gentleman from Minnesota is not so well informed as is the Governor of Panama himself, who lives there and knows all about it.

The regular order was demanded.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the regular order is that I have the floor. Has my time expired?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 2½ minutes remaining.

Mr. BLANTON. I am going to yield back 2 minutes of that time, but I do not intend to be taken off the floor by any cry of "regular order."

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. No; because I do not think the gentleman knows anything about what he is talking about.

All I want my colleagues to do is to get the hearings and read all that testimony, and you will become convinced in one moment after you read it that we must take steps pretty soon to readjust salaries down there.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the motion is withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HANCOCK].

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GOTTLIEB STOCK

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 4784, to reimburse Gottlieb Stock for losses of real and personal property by fire caused by the negligence of two prohibition agents.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I inquire of the chairman of the committee if he can inform me how the committee arrived at the figure of $4,000? I notice that the property involved is assessed at only about $900, including the land. The land valuation is placed at $685, the improvements on the land at $140, and household furniture at $50.

Mr. BLACK. The claimant has submitted an affidavit as to the value of his house and household goods. His claim was for $6,573.25. The evidence he has submitted shows that it cost approximately $4,000 to build the house.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I notice there is a statement in the report that in all probability the low assessment was probably to evade the payment of taxes.

Mr. BLACK. The committee worked out a compromise.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. In the State of Washington I think the assessments are approximately 40 percent of the value.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Even on a basis of 40 percent the claim would not amount to more than $1,000.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I do not know anything about the merits of this bill. I read in the report that both the Prohibition Department and the Attorney General recommended passage. I thought $6,900 too high, but I do not know how they arrived at the figure of $4,000.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Is the chairman of the committee satisfied with the $4,000?

Mr. BLACK. I do not recall a discussion in the committee but the bill shows on its face that there were differences of opinion about it and they arrived at $4,000 as a compromise.

In the absence of the author of the bill, I hesitate to take the responsibility of accepting a lower sum although I assume he wants the bill passed. I would suggest that the gentleman from Wisconsin allow the bill to be read for amendment and if the amendment is carried it will be all right with me.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman from Wisconsin inform me what amendment he has in mind?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I think the amount should be reduced.

Mr. BLACK. By how much?

Mr. BLANCHARD. By $1,000. I think the amount should be made $3,000. With the understanding that it will be reduced to that figure, I withdraw my objection.

There being no objection the Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and in full settlement against the Government, the sum of $4,000 to Gottlieb Stock, as compensation for the total destruction of his home and personal property therein and trees and vines on the premises and other property during a fire set by the negligence of two prohibition agents in the employ of the Federal Bureau of Prohibition: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act, in excess of 10 percent thereof, shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANCHARD: Page 1, line 6, strike out "$4,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$3,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, I offer a further amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANCHARD: Page 1, line 5, after the word "settlement", add the words "of all claims", and in line 6, after the word "Government", insert the words "of the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to incorporate therein a short excerpt from the testimony of the Governor of Panama.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

ESTELLE M. GARDINER

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 4790, for the relief of Estelle M. Gardiner.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, in this case the claimant is a sister seeking to recover for the death of her brother killed at the age of 66. There is serious question, from the report, whether there was any legal liability on the part of the brother to support the sister, and, going further, the question arises as to his life expectancy at the age of 66.

Under the circumstances I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

HARDEN F. TAYLOR

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 4792, to authorize and direct the Comptroller General to settle and allow the claim of Harden F. Taylor for services rendered to the Bureau of Fisheries.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to settle and allow the claim of Harden F. Taylor in the sum of $500 for services rendered to the Bureau of Fisheries in the preparation of a manuscript on the refrigeration of fish, notwithstanding provisions of existing law.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

THERESA M. SHEA

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 4828, for the relief of Theresa M. Shea.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

HEDWIG GRASSMAN STEHN

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 4831, for the relief of Hedwig Grassman Stehn.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

MARY JOSEPHINE LOBERT

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 4959, for the relief of Mary Josephine Lobert.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I am not entirely familiar with this bill. If the gentleman from Wisconsin wishes to make a statement about it I shall be pleased to have him do so.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think the bill is meritorious. What I had in mind was to offer the usual amendment that it be in full of all claims against the United States. I cannot answer any questions of the gentleman from Washington. I am perfectly willing that the bill be passed; and I take it the gentleman from Texas is willing to accept such an amendment.

Mr. KLEBERG. I am.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have a notation that the bond of $1,500 was forfeited under the Motor Vehicle Theft Act. Is that correct?

Mr. KLEBERG. That is correct.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Can the gentleman tell me how the bond happened to be forfeited?

Mr. KLEBERG. I will tell the gentleman exactly how it happened. This man Lobert went the bond of the man who was charged with stealing the automobile. The accused was released on bond and left the State while under bond. While in the State of Arkansas he was arrested, tried, and sent to the penitentiary. When the case came up for trial, of course, it was impossible for Wunder to appear, for he was in the penitentiary in Arkansas. Mr. Lobert reported this situation to the court, but nevertheless the bond was forfeited.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Then the man that was under bond was actually under arrest in another State?

Mr. KLEBERG. He was in the penitentiary and had served his sentence at that time.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Mary Josephine Lobert, widow of M. J. Lobert, the sum of $1,632.68, representing judgment in the amount of $1,632.68, secured to the United States for the United States District Court of the Western District of Texas against M. J. Lobert, on account of bond of $1,500, for the appearance of Johnnie (Jack) Wander (Wunder), charged with a violation of the Motor Vehicle Theft Act, which bond was forfeited by reason of the failure of the said defendant to appear, and $132.68 being court costs, paid into court on December 31, 1929, and deposited by the United States marshal for the western district of Texas, and covered into the Treasury of the United States on January 9, 1930: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 6, after the word "widow", insert the words "of M. J. Lobert."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BLANCHARD: On page 1, line 6, after "$1,632.68", insert "in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

FARMERS & MERCHANTS NATIONAL BANK OF GILMER, TEX.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 170, the bill (H.R. 6249) for the relief of the Farmers & Merchants National Bank of Gilmer, Tex.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I may say in explanation that this is the bill to which I objected the last time the Private Calendar was being considered. I have discussed the bill with the author, and I have no objection to its consideration at this time.

Mr. TRUAX. Is this the bill that seeks to reimburse the bank for $1,500 worth of lost currency?

Mr. HOPE. Yes.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I object.

LISSIE MAUD GREEN

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 5007, for the relief of Lissie Maud Green.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the United States Employees' Compensation Commission is hereby authorized to consider and determine the claim of Lissie Maud Green, widow of Charles F. Green, as to whether said Charles F. Green suffered an injury causing his death July 30, 1921, while employed in the Postal Service as a rural letter carrier, compensable under said act and after the date of its enactment, in the same manner and to the same extent as if said Charles F. Green or Lissie Maud Green had made application for the benefits of said act within the 1-year period required by sections 17 and 20 thereof.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. HANCOCK: At the end of the bill insert the words "Provided, That no benefits shall accrue prior to the approval of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

JOSE RAMON CORDOVA

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 5636, for the relief of Jose Ramon Cordova.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill goes back to the year 1915 and provides compensation for a deputy United States marshal. I am reserving an objection to this bill on the same ground that I did to several bills at the last session in which we considered the Private Calendar, namely, that we are refusing to grant pensions to disabled war veterans and are going back 15 or 20 years and giving pensions to those otherwise engaged in the Federal service who have been injured or wounded. May I ask the author of the bill to explain the matter?

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. Speaker, the report from the Attorney General's Office shows that the beneficiary under this bill was deputized by a United States marshal in the year 1915 to put down an Indian uprising in southwestern Colorado and southeastern Utah. The Indians were in revolt, had shot several of the neighbors, and the United States marshal was ordered to quell the uprising. The beneficiary at that time was around 45 or 46 years of age. He went out as he was ordered; and when the posse came in contact with the Indians, a battle took place at some point in Utah. One of the deputy marshals by the name of Akin was killed, and this man was very seriously wounded. When I tell the gentleman that the section of the country where the battle occurred and where these folks lived is isolated at some 150 or 200 miles from a railroad, he will know why this bill was delayed. Notwithstanding this, in the Sixty-fourth Congress, the gentleman representing the western district of Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] had a bill passed for the benefit of the widow of Akin, and the same time introduced a bill to take care of Cordova, who has been an invalid ever since that battle, but owing to the fact that he could not locate the beneficiary Cordova at that time, Mr. TAYLOR was unable to press the bill in the Sixty-fourth Congress. No one knew anything about this man because he lived away out in the country, until the Seventy-second Congress, when the matter was called to the attention of the American Legion Post of Farmington, N.Mex.

It was called to the attention of that post by one of the sons of this man, who had served in the war and belonged to the post, and they investigated the case anew. It was then I came in contact with the merits of this bill, and I introduced a bill that was identical with one that had been introduced in the Sixty-fourth Congress by Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. He was conversant with the case, because it happened in his district. I inquired of him and was informed that he had never run across a more meritorious claim. The man has been practically bed-ridden from the time mentioned here to the present.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHAVEZ. Yes.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Has this claimant any dependents?

Mr. CHAVEZ. I think they are all grown up now, because his sons were in the late war, and I am quite sure they are all of age. He is an ignorant man and a poor man and really could not take care of his own interests by presenting the claim at the proper time.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I also understand he is totally disabled.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Yes.

Mr. TRUAX. How old is this man?

Mr. CHAVEZ. He is now around 70 years of age. You will notice a letter dated at Farmington, N.Mex., on March 11, 1932, by Dr. Reece, who examined the man, saying he is having hemorrhages almost every day of the week.

I wish to say also that this bill was passed during the Seventy-second Congress, but it was during the last days of the session and in the shuffle it lost out in the Senate.

Mr. TRUAX. Does this gentleman have any heirs who would inherit this money? This man, evidently, will not live long according to the statement of the doctor.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I do not know, but I do know that this man has been entitled to this money ever since the particular time mentioned. He would have been able to take care of his condition and regain his health if he had been able to protect himself. I do not know the man, but the information I am giving you has been obtained in good faith. Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, who had the bill passed for the widow of the deputy who was killed, says he knows the facts personally, and therefore I believe this is a very meritorious bill.

Mr. TRUAX. Would the gentleman agree to an amendment striking out $5,000 and substituting in lieu thereof $3,500?

Mr. CHAVEZ. I think anything you gentlemen are willing to give this man would be a godsend to him.

Mr. TRUAX. With that understanding I am willing to withdraw my objection.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Jose Ramon Cordova, of Gallup, N.Mex., the sum of $5,000 for injuries sustained, during February 1915, while in the discharge of his duties as member of a posse organized by the United States marshal for the district of Utah for the capture of Tse-Ne-Gat, alias Everett Hatch, a Plute Indian charged with murder.

With the following committee amendment:

After the word "murder" in line 1, page 2, insert: "Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The Committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment: The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANCHARD: Page 1, line 6, after the amount "$5,000" insert "in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States."

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, before the amendment is adopted, may I ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX], if it has been agreed that $3,500 is to be inserted in lieu of $5,000.

Mr. TRUAX. Yes.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment striking out "$5,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$3,500."

The clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TRUAX: Page 1, line 6, strike out "$5,000" and insert "$3,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CHAVEZ: Page 1, line 6, strike out "Gallup" and insert in lieu thereof "Farmington."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

GREAT AMERICAN INDEMNITY CO. OF NEW YORK

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 92, the bill (H.R. 4249) for the relief of the Great American Indemnity Co. of New York.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

There being no objection, the Clerk reported a similar Senate bill (S. 356), as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the Great American Indemnity Co. of New York the sum of $18,000, representing the amount paid by such company as surety on the forfeited bail bonds of four defendants in criminal proceedings brought by the United States, who surrendered the day after the entry of the judgments upon such bonds and were subsequently tried, convicted, and sentenced.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill (H.R. 4249) was laid on the table.

MILES THOMAS BARRETT

The Clerk read the next bill on the Private Calendar, H.R. 5709, for the relief of Miles Thomas Barrett.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HOPE. Reserving the right to object, I should like to call the attention of the author of the bill to the fact that the report of the War Department indicates that this soldier never, during the period of his time of service, held the rank of sergeant but was a private. Furthermore, except for 19 days during the month of August, he was compensated for his services in the Army. Also, that while this bill provides that the discharge shall be considered as honorable, the records of the War Department show that his discharge was dishonorable.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, before letting the bill go by, the gentleman ought to hear from my colleague from Texas to make an explanation. My colleague is vitally interested in the bill.

Mr. THOMPSON of Texas. I thank my colleague for the publicity. I am vitally interested in the bill, but the details of it had better be stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MULDOWNEY], who is familiar with them.

Mr. MULDOWNEY. Mr. Speaker, to properly consider this matter we ought to go back a little. This man was a deserter. He enlisted and then deserted to join another outfit. He went to France within 2 weeks. That was the reason for his desertion. He enlisted to be sent over with the first detachment, but they were kept here for months; he deserted and joined the Marines and went over to France within 2 weeks.

It is my understanding that the Comptroller's office ruled that he could not be paid for the 6 months he was here.

Mr. HOPE. Is the gentleman familiar with the War Department report? Let me call his attention to a paragraph in that report.

With reference to that portion of the bill providing for pay as a sergeant in the Corp of Engineers for the period May 3, 1918, to August 19, 1918, the records of the War Department show that he was a private during his entire service with the Army. The records also show that he was paid for all of his service as a private in the Army up to and including the month of July 1918.

Now, if the report is correct, and I assume that it is, this man can have no claim except for the pay as a private.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed for the present, and that we may return to it at a later time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LXXVIII—296

GALE A. LEE

The Clerk read the next bill on the Private Calendar, H.R. 5936, for the relief of Gale A. Lee.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States is authorized and directed to credit the account of Gale A. Lee, postmaster at Pueblo, Colo., with the sum of $861.02, being the amount of payments made by such postmaster during the period August 16, 1930, to October 31, 1932, as compensation at 65 cents per hour to Helen G. Engle, of Pueblo, Colo., for services as a substitute postal clerk qualified as a stenographer, which amount was disallowed in his account because the employee was, during the same period, a clerical assistant at $1,500 per annum in the office of the deputy clerk of the United States district court at Pueblo, Colo.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

LOTTIE W. McCASKILL

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 6084, for the relief of Lottie W. McCaskill.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Lottie W. McCaskill, the sum of $271. Such sum represents the amount paid by the said Lottie W. McCaskill to the United States to cover the shortage in her accounts as postmaster at Cassatt, S.C., caused by the theft in the year 1928, on the night of December 29, of postal funds and stamps, and so forth, from said post office.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

MONUMENTAL STEVEDORE CO.

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 6638, for the relief of the Monumental Stevedore Co.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States, the sum of $677.75 to Monumental Stevedore Co., of Baltimore, Md., a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Maryland, owner of lighter no. 1, on account of damages caused to said lighter by collision therewith of the United States Coast Guard cutter Winnesimmet in the Patapsco River on the 17th day of September 1923: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

MARTHA EDWARDS

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 6862, for the relief of Martha Edwards.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, is the author of the bill present?

Mr. DARDEN. Yes.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I am willing to concede that the bill is meritorious, and that the child through her guardian is entitled to some relief, but I seriously question the amount, in view of the fact that the report discloses that her condition at the present time is not serious. In fact there is serious question as to whether she is suffering any injury at the present time. Can the gentleman enlighten us as to her present condition?

Mr. DARDEN. She is very much better at the present time, and it is questionable whether she will ever have any permanent injury. She has a very bad scar.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman state the condition of her face? Are her features marred in any way?

Mr. DARDEN. I am not certain, but to the best of my belief I think the scar is at the back of the head.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Does the gentleman think the amount is reasonable? Does the gentleman not think it is very high?

Mr. DARDEN. That is a matter, I think, to be left to the discretion of the House. I am willing to accept what the House believes is a reasonable sum. When this matter was first presented, there was question as to whether or not she had a permanent injury and at that time a provision was inserted in the bill when it passed the House of Representatives giving her the right to subsequently make another claim. However, that was several years ago, and apparently now she has no permanent injury other than this scar.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Would the gentleman be willing to accept a compromise amount?

Mr. DARDEN. Yes.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. $3,000?

Mr. DARDEN. Yes. There are two small bills, one of the hospital amounting to $177 and one a doctor's bill of $150. Those bills have not been paid.

Mr. BLANCHARD. They are proper bills, and I am willing that they be allowed, additional to the sum of $3,000.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the legal guardian of Martha Edwards, of East Camp, Norfolk, Va., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000 for permanent injuries sustained by her as a result of being struck by a United States naval airplane on the premises of her father at East Camp, Norfolk, Va., on October 30, 1929.

Mr. DARDEN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendments, which I send to the desk:

Amendments offered by Mr. DARDEN: In line 7 strike out "$5,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$3,000" and in line 10 at the end of the bill strike out the period and insert a colon and the following: "And in addition pay to the Norfolk Protestant Hospital the sum of $177 and to Dr. Julian L. Rawls, the sum of $150 for care and attention as a result of such injury."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANCHARD:

At the end of the amendment offered by Mr. DARDEN, strike out a period, insert a colon and insert the following: "Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

In line 7, after "$3,000" insert "in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

BLANCHE KNIGHT

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 7009, for the relief of Blanche Knight.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I object.

FLORENCE HUDGINS LINDSAY AND ELIZABETH LINDSAY

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 233, for the relief of Florence Hudgins Lindsay and Elizabeth Lindsay.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object, to ask the author of the bill if he will give me an explanation of it.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, the death of these two young men, one aged 24 and the other 19, occurred through a collision of a Ford car with a truck owned by the Government. The trucks were under way to Yorktown between 6 and 7:30 o'clock. There were two trucks, one trailing the other. One of the trucks was out of oil and commenced to knock. It stopped on the road, partly on the shoulder and partly on the paved road. The truck that was following in the rear passed to the front of the truck that had stopped. The truck in the rear was not lighted. These young men were in a Ford car. They came up and they did not see the truck and they ran into it on account of the darkness, on account of the fact that it was on a paved road, but not on the shoulder of the road as it should have been, and collided, both of them losing their lives.

Mr. BLANCHARD. May I ask a question, and that goes to the amount of the claim, which is $10,000? Were the sister and mother dependent upon these two boys?

Mr. BLAND. Absolutely. The father is dead. The mother is a widow, 53 years old. The sister was 24 years old, and deaf. These two boys were the only support.

Mr. BLANCHARD. What is the financial situation of these people now?

Mr. BLAND. I only know from information that came to me at that time. When the father died he left 15 acres of land valued at the most at about $1,500, and about $100 in cash.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The gentleman is willing to accept the two customary amendments?

Mr. BLAND. I certainly am. There is no attorney connected with the case at all.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

There being no objection the Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Florence Hudgins Lindsay and Elizabeth Lindsay, mother and sister, respectively, of Roland Martin Lindsay and James Lawrence Lindsay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,000, one half to each, in full payment of loss and damages sustained by reason of the death of said Roland Martin Lindsay and James Lawrence Lindsay on account of injuries sustained on the 6th day of October 1931, from collision with a United States Army truck operated near Grafton, York County, Va., occasioned by the said truck being operated on a dark night and without being properly lighted.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANCHARD: In lines 8 and 9, on page 1, strike out "in full payment of" and insert in lieu thereof "in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States for"; and at the end of the bill insert the following:

"Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MARGUERITE CISCOE

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 264, for the relief of Marguerite Ciscoe.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. BOYLAN. Will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I will reserve the objection.

Mr. BOYLAN. What is the gentleman's objection to the bill?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. The objection that I have is that the party injured was 72 years of age, crippled and on crutches at the time he was touched by this truck. He was in the hospital less than 6 weeks and his entire doctor's bill was only $30. He did not die until 4 months after he got out of bed and was running around again, and there is no connection between his death and the collision.

Mr. BOYLAN. I invite the gentleman's attention to the report of the Post Office Department in report of the committee, where it shows that this blind man on crutches was struck by a mail truck that was proceeding against proper signal lights. There is no question at all as to the liability of the Government. The Post Office Department itself states in its letter as follows:

It is therefore believed that favorable consideration should be accorded this bill. The Department would not, however, undertake to recommend any particular amount as constituting a sufficient award, preferring to leave that question for the determination of Congress.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Looking at the same letter, I might read this:

It is noted, however, that while the claimant's husband had died since the accident occurred, according to the testimony of physicians, his death was not caused by the injuries sustained in the accident.

Mr. BLACK. I think I can explain that part by stating that it was felt that the accident might have contributed to the death but was not wholly responsible for it. On that theory, the bill was already cut down to $2,500, instead of claiming the full amount as if the driver was fully responsible. In the ordinary death case we would ask for $5,000. It is cut in half. The Department has recommended favorable consideration.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. May I ask, what is a man's life expectancy at the age of 72, when he is already on crutches and suffering from some disease?

Mr. BOYLAN. We have men in this House, some of the ablest Members of the House, who are over 72 years of age. Of course, because the gentleman is fortunate enough at this time to have youth in his favor, yet, owing to the inevitable law of life, the gentleman, too, some day will become aged.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. That is true; but my life expectancy is not over 60 today, is it?

Mr. BOYLAN. I do not know what the gentleman's life expectancy is. I wish it were a hundred.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Will the gentleman consent to $2,000?

Mr. BOYLAN. No; I will take $2,250.

Mr. Speaker, I will have to accept the gentleman's amendment.

There being no objection, the Clerk read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000 to Marguerite Ciscoe, widow of William Ciscoe, who was fatally injured as a result of being struck by a United States mail truck no. 4182, New York City, N.Y., on July 18, 1931, suffering injuries which caused his death on November 12, 1931.

With the following committee amendment:

In line 5 strike out "$5,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,500."

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ZIONCHECK to the committee amendment: In lieu of "$2,500" insert "$2,000."

The amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

With the following further committee amendment:

Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

HARVEY M. HUNTER

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 323, for the relief of Harvey M. Hunter.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to reimburse Harvey M. Hunter, civilian ammunition foreman of the Ordnance Department, United States Army, the sum of $71.50, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for damage done to household goods during transportation from station at Baltimore, Md., to new station at San Francisco, Calif., August 7, 1928, to October 18, 1928.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOPE: On page 1, line 10, after the figures "1928" insert the following: "in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

E. W. GILLESPIE

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 328, for the relief of E. W. Gillespie.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General is authorized and directed to credit the account of E. W. Gillespie, former postmaster at Rock River, Wyo., in the sum of $94.91, such sum representing the loss in the account of the said E. W. Gillespie caused by the failure of the First National Bank of Rock River, Wyo., where the post-office funds were deposited by the said E. W. Gillespie.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BERNARD M'SHANE

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 434, for the relief of Bernard McShane.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Bernard McShane, of Sacramento, Calif., the sum of $861.33, the same being an amount due him with interest from November 2, 1923, by the Post Office Department, as a balance of an amount of $1,400 reward for services rendered as chief of police, Sacramento, Calif., in connection with the arrest and conviction of Roy G. Garner, charged with hold-up and robbery of the Southern Pacific train no. 20, between Roseville and Newcastle, Calif., on May 20, 1921.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 5, after "$861.33", insert: "in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States."

Page 2, line 3, add the following: "Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CITY OF GLENDALE, CALIF.

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 470, for the relief of the city of Glendale, Calif.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,157.96 to the city of Glendale, State of California, as full compensation for damages to a pump house and equipment owned by the said city of Glendale, State of California, caused by the crash of an airplane owned and operated by the United States Navy, and the fire resulting therefrom, on the 16th day of October 1924, said damages being without fault or contributory negligence on the part of the city of Glendale.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, lines 6 and 7, strike out "as full compensation" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States."

Page 2, line 3, insert the following: "Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorneys or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

T. PERRY HIGGINS

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 518, for the relief of T. Perry Higgins.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the United States Employees' Compensation Commission is hereby authorized to consider and determine the claim of T. Perry Higgins for disability from arterial rheumatism contracted in the course of his employment as a civilian in the Army Transport Service of the United States during the World War, in the same manner and to the same extent as if the said T. Perry Higgins had made application for the benefits of the act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes", approved September 7, 1916, as amended, within the 1-year period required by sections 17 and 20 thereof: Provided, That no benefits shall accrue prior to the approval of this act.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HANCOCK of New York: Page 1, line 5, after the word "rheumatism" insert "alleged to have been."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

WARD A. JEFFERSON

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 520, for the relief of Ward A. Jefferson.

There being no objection the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to cancel the indebtedness of Ward A. Jefferson in the amount of $1,197.57, arising out of the fact that for the period from March 1, 1929, to January 10, 1931, he was paid for services rendered by him as a bridge tender on the Cape Cod Canal and also as rural mail carrier on the route from West Wareham, Mass., the payment of such dual compensation being in contravention of the provisions of section 6 of the act of May 10, 1916, as amended by the act of August 29, 1916 (39 Stat. 582; U.S.C., title 5, sec. 58).

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

JOHN KELLEY

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 523, for the relief of John Kelley.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

WILLARD B. HALL

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 719, for the relief of Willard B. Hall.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Willard B. Hall, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $75, being the value of a horn used by the claimant during his service with the First Kansas Infantry Band, the One Hundred and Thirty-seventh Infantry Band, and the One Hundred and Tenth Engineers' Band from July 31, 1917, to May 3, 1919.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

WADE DEAN

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 740, for the relief of Wade Dean.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the United States Employees' Compensation Commission shall be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to waive the statute of limitations in the application filed by Wade Dean, an employee in the post office at Stewart, Ohio, as to the provision of an act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes", approved September 7, 1916, in order that he may receive the same consideration as though he has applied within the specified time required by law.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HANCOCK of New York: At the end of line 12, strike out the period, insert a colon and the following proviso: "Provided, That no benefit shall accrue prior to the approval of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

WILLIAM E. BOSWORTH

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 768, for the relief of William E. Bosworth.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to redeem in favor of William E. Bosworth, coupon note no. A-131,414 in the denomination of $500 of the Victory 4½-percent convertible gold notes of 1922-23, matured May 20, 1923, without interest and without presentation of said note which is alleged to have been stolen or destroyed, provided the said note shall not have been previously presented and paid: Provided, That said William E. Bosworth shall first file in the Treasury Department of the United States a bond in the penal sum of double the amount of the principal of said note in such form and with such corporate surety as may be acceptable to the Secretary of the Treasury to indemnify and save harmless the United States from any loss on account of the theft or destruction of the note hereinbefore described.

With the following committee amendment:

At the end of the bill insert the following proviso: "Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

JOHN H. MEHRLE

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 879, for the relief of John H. Mehrle.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as I understand, the claimant, after being hurt, received $18.75 a week under the Ohio compensation act and his medical expenses were paid as well?

Mr. LAMNECK. What difference would that make to a man who was entitled to a claim because he was injured in a safety zone by being run over by a mail truck and having his foot mashed? The fact that he was covered by insurance certainly should not have any effect on how much he should be allowed for such an injury. In the State of Ohio it would not make any difference under the law. If he is entitled to any amount of damages, the fact he had insurance would not make any difference.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. If the author will agree to $1,000, I shall withdraw the objection.

Mr. LAMNECK. One thousand dollars is better than nothing.

Mr. HOLLISTER. The liability of the Postal Service is clear. There is no question about that. The only thing that appears in the report, so far as I can see, is the fact that the man was fully compensated by the Ohio State Workmen's Compensation Department at so much per week. May I ask if there is any evidence of whether there is a lasting injury?

Mr. LAMNECK. I cannot testify to that fact.

Mr. HOLLISTER. If the man has been properly compensated, why should the Government pay him again?

Mr. LAMNECK. He has a permanent disability.

Mr. HOLLISTER. That is what I asked the gentleman. If there is evidence of a permanent disability, there is not any question that the man deserves some kind of compensation; but if the only showing is he was temporarily incapacitated and the Ohio Compensation Commission paid him for that time, I do not see why the Federal Government should be asked to pay him again.

Mr. LAMNECK. He got paid for the time the injury was at its worst.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Will the gentleman check that up?

Mr. LAMNECK. I know he is permanently disabled.

Mr. HOLLISTER. The gentleman will give us his personal assurance that that is the fact?

Mr. LAMNECK. Yes.

Mr. HOLLISTER. There is no showing to that effect in the bill.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. With the understanding that the amount will be reduced to $1,000, I withdraw my objection.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to John H. Mehrle, of Columbus, Ohio, the sum of $2,000 in full settlement against the Government for injuries received when struck by a Government mail truck at the intersection of Fourth and Spring Streets, Columbus, Ohio, on September 5, 1930.

With the following committee amendment:

At the end of the bill insert the following: "Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ZIONCHECK: On page 1, line 6, strike out the "$2,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

DAISY M. AVERY

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 880, for the relief of Daisy M. Avery.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as I read the report here the claimant has had her day in court. This case has been considered by the United States Compensation Commission and rejected on the ground that the claimant at the time of the accident was not acting within the scope of her employment.

Mr. LAMNECK. We do not agree to that at all.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. The Commission has found that to be the fact.

Mr. LAMNECK. The committee said this:

The sole question, then, for decision is as to whether or not the act of Mrs. Avery could be construed as official duty.

The facts are that, according to the contract with these employees, the Government was obliged, in case of dismissal or return to their homes, to transport these employees to the nearest railroad station, which was 38 miles away. When this lady left the service there was no one to take her to the depot except Mrs. Avery and her husband. They took their car and hauled this lady 38 miles. The train was late, and did not arrive at this town until 2:20 in the morning. They stayed all night, and on their return the next day had this accident. She is paralyzed, and has been ever since the accident. She suffered a crushed spine. We contend and she contends that she was in an official capacity serving the Government in taking this lady that left the service to the depot so that she could make railroad connections, and that that was a part of the contract between the employee and the Government. She carried out the agreement that the Government had with the employee and, I think, was purely on official duty.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. I quote from the United States Employees' Compensation Commission:

Upon consideration of the circumstances connected with the injury the Commission reached the conclusion that Mrs. Avery was not entitled to the benefits provided by the compensation act, since the injury sustained by her did not occur while in the performance of her official duty as a teacher at the Indian agency.

The question has been passed on, and we have been asked to reverse the decision of the Commission reached after a careful consideration of all the facts. I think this lady was rather harshly treated in that she was denied hospital treatment at the Indian reservation. It seems to me that she has some basis for a claim on that ground. I would be perfectly willing to consent to an award here in any reasonable amount in order to compensate her for hospital expenses.

Mr. LAMNECK. This lady has been in an invalid's chair ever since the accident.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. I realize that it is a most unfortunate incident, but I do not see that there is any liability on the part of the Government. Whatever we give her is a pure gift. She may not have been properly hospitalized and given proper medical attention.

I am willing to agree to an award of $1,000, but I cannot go beyond that.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the funds not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000 to Daisy M. Avery, in complete payment and settlement of all claims against the United States Government on account of an injury sustained by the said Daisy M. Avery while in the performance of her duty as an employee of the United States Government on March 28, 1922:

With the following committee amendment:

On page 1, line 10, after "1922", insert the following: "Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HANCOCK of New York: On page 1, line 5, strike out "$5,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 9 o'clock and 32 minutes p.m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Friday, March 16, 1934, at 12 o'clock noon.

COMMITTEE HEARINGS

COMMITTEE ON MERCHANT MARINE, RADIO, AND FISHERIES

(Friday, Mar. 16, 10 a.m.)

Hearings on H.R. 7986, the McFadden radio bill, in the committee room.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of rule XIII,

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, MARCH 16, 1934

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. Clifford H. Jope, pastor of the Ninth Street Christian Church, Washington, D.C., offered the following prayer:

O divine Father, we believe Thy hand has been in the founding and fortunes of this great Nation. We thank Thee for its ideals, principles, and the glorious company of its apostles of truth, its noble army of martyrs for liberty and humanity. We pray that this land of ours may be the scene of Thy special activity and the instrument of Thy holy purposes. May the clouds that hover over us be dispelled by the brilliance of the shining of the sun of righteousness and peace.

Lord, defend our land from the secret, subtle power and the open shame of great national sins, from all dishonesty and corruption, from vainglory and selfish luxury, from all cruelty and the spirit of violence, from all covetousness which is idolotry, from impurities which defile, and from intemperance, which is the mother of many crimes and sorrows. Good Lord, deliver and save us and our children, in the land which Thou hast blessed with the light of pure religion, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and sixty-nine Members have answered to their names; a quorum is present.

On motion of Mr. BYRNS, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce that my colleague the gentleman from Indiana, EUGENE B. CROWE, was unexpectedly called to Indiana today, and he will be unavoidably absent during the remainder of the week.

AMERICAN AGRICULTURAL SURPLUS PRODUCTS

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have until midnight to file a committee report on the bill (H.R. 7581) to authorize a board composed of the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Agriculture to negotiate with foreign buyers with the view of selling American agricultural surplus products at the world market price and to accept in payment therefor silver coin or bullion at such value as may be agreed upon, which shall not exceed 25 percent above the world market price of silver, and to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue silver certificates based upon the agreed value of such silver bullion or coin in payment for the products sold, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE GOLD STANDARD

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request, that I may have until midnight tonight to file a report on the bill (H.R. 1577) to preserve and protect the gold standard through establishment of an auxiliary monetary reserve of silver and the issuance of silver certificates payable in their gold-value equivalent, and under such regulations as will provide protection to gold from being cornered and protection from inflation in gold values during periods of excessive demands, from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

SILVER V. SLAVERY

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an address made over the radio last evening by my colleague the gentleman from Utah [Mr. MURDOCK].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address by Hon. ABE MURDOCK, of Utah, March 15, 1934:

I am rapidly coming to the conclusion that the most dangerous and injurious habit of the people of the United States is that of thinking of our Government as something abstract and wholly apart from the people. This fallacious concept is not a spontaneous development, but is one phase of a deep and subtle conspiracy against American independence. Our forefathers fought the Revolution to secure our national independence; our fathers fought the Civil War to reassert the independence of the individual; our sons and brothers fought the World War for the purpose of establishing once and for all the independence of the nations of the earth. And yet, in spite of all our wars, in spite of all our trials and labors and hopes, we and the whole world with us are economic slaves. Our master is not a man, a king, or a country. Our master, who holds our welfare in the hollow of his hand, is gold. His merciless regime will last just so long as the predatory possessors of gold can hoodwink us that our Government is a far-off and mysterious power that no common man can understand—that our Government has become too complex to be a Government of, by, and for the people.

This subtle conspiracy of which I speak is known, in its entirety, as the gold standard. The gold standard is not native to our soil, but is rather an evil importation. It seems to have been first hatched in England by the international banker Rothschild in about 1816. Prior to that time the nations of the earth had based their currencies on gold and silver. In 1873, when the power of the international bankers had risen to its zenith in that century, the Governments of Germany and the United States, deluded by the false prosperity of England, betrayed their people to the power of gold.

While we did not invent the gold standard, as with everything else we raised it to its highest state of perfection. Not only did we base our values on gold, but our financial geniuses created a speculative magnet that attracted it irresistibly to their own coffers. The gold, and with it all the wealth and resources of America, streamed steadily to Wall Street. Its rapid passage through our fingers deluded us with dreams of fabulous wealth; and when we awoke in 1929, we found ourselves face to face with history's greatest panic.

Our bankers and our capitalists had profited wonderfully from the gold standard. With its power they had usurped control of every phase of our economic and industrial life. They had hypnotized our Presidents and our legislators even to the extent that Congress had turned over to a group of private bankers the power to coin and regulate our money. This greatest stroke of capitalist strategy had been accomplished by the Federal Reserve Act of 1913, sponsored by a great and noble President, but destined to be the instrument of the most outrageous fraud ever committed in the name of sound money.

The gold standard worked well for the bankers in so-called "good times"; but the depression forced them to resort to other means. It was evident that the people of the United States must finance the depression, and pay for all the havoc of deflation and speculation, with bond issues. In 1932 Congress passed a law amending the Federal Reserve act so that direct obligations of the Government, deposited with the Treasury, could legally be used as a 100-percent backing for currency. This plan was even sounder than the gold standard in the eyes of our financial wizards—because it was more profitable.

Here is the plan made legal by the latest amendment to the Federal Reserve Act: When the Government offers its interest-bearing bonds for sale, the Federal Reserve banks may buy the bonds, deposit them with the Treasury as a basis for currency, and issue paper money against them. Thus the banks have the bonds, they have the use of their money, and still draw interest on the bonds. However, even this was not good enough for them; but they must abuse it. After they have deposited their bonds and drawn their currency they may use this currency to buy the next issue of bonds. And thus the American people are caught in the most vicious cycle of financial legerdemain ever known. At the last report the Federal Reserve banks held more than $6,000,000,000 in Government securities, most of which amount had piled up during the depression. At the same time their balances are the largest in history. They are flooded with wealth at the expense of the panic-ridden millions of America. They have stopped loans to agriculture; they have restricted loans to industry and commerce. They have converted the banking system of America into an avid sponge for the absorption of Government bonds, while agriculture, industry, and commerce are prostrate for lack of funds. What a mockery of the Federal Reserve Act is this bond-consuming monstrosity!

According to the great financiers, capitalists, and bankers of this country, such a system represents sound money. As I see it, it is the most vicious inflation and the most unsound and dishonest method of financing that this country or any other country ever evolved. But, unfortunately, so long as our Federal Reserve bankers are receiving a bounty on such transactions, they will acclaim it as a wise and sound monetary system.

These same financiers, capitalists, and bankers, when we mention remonetization of silver, hold up their hands in holy horror. They immediately cry out "inflation" and predict the bankruptcy of this country and the impairment of our national credit if silver is remonetized. They say, "Let us uphold the gold standard."

The gold standard was an untried and dangerous monetary innovation in 1873. The gold standard is a tragic failure today. It was forced upon the bimetallic nations of the earth by the gold powers. It was maintained for almost 6 decades at a cost of universal misery. It has broken down in every crisis. Every depression, no matter how slight, has shaken it. Every war has left it tottering. Its history has been one of recurring and ever more violent panics, of starvation, unemployment, individual and national bankruptcy throughout the world. It has been the instrument of international graft. It has been the wedge driven by vested interests between the people and their governments. Under the gold standard this country and every other suffered from a rapid concentration of wealth in the hands of the possessors of gold. The natural resources, the labor power, the agricultural productions, the manufactured commodities of America were transmuted, by the abstruse magic of finance and banking, into gold, and that gold gravitated irresistibly to the centers of speculation. The American freeholder became a peasant, the American laborer became a wage slave, because banks controlled the Government instead of the Government controlling banks. But, like every diabolical process, the transmutation of brain and brawn into gold got beyond control. The speculative markets collapsed; the channels of credit, clogged with the steady movement of gold in one direction, stagnated; the depression was on.

Volumes have been written on the cause of this depression. Superhuman efforts have been made to counteract it. Our Government has subsidized the railroads. It has loaned billions to banks and industries. But we have made little progress, and, as I view the matter, we will make little permanent progress until regulation and control of the standard of value are again given back to the Government of the people.

We must increase the purchasing power of the people; not only the purchasing power of this country but of our customers. You cannot increase purchasing power by doubling zero. Purchasing power is the fruit of labor, and you can only increase it by increasing labor and by creating markets for the products of labor. Purchasing power did not fall because a dollar was worth two dollars; it failed because the masses of the people, the purchasers, had no dollars at all. At the old valuation there are $11,000,000,000 of gold in the world, and of that amount approximately nine billions, or more than three fourths, are held by three countries. The United States, France, and Great Britain hold three fourths of the world's supply of gold. So long as gold is the only international standard of value, and three fourths of the world's gold is monopolized by three countries, the purchasing power of the world is three fourths paralyzed. Let our economic experts mark well that fact, and they may get a clearer view of the reason for the failure of purchasing power. About one half of the people of the world recognize silver as the standard of value. Among those people silver is the medium for storing wealth; it represents saved wages and accumulated capital. The silver nations offer us the only unexploited markets in the world. They represent our only prospective customers. Remonetization of silver would immediately invest them with sufficient purchasing power to buy our surpluses. Remonetization of silver would convert them into wealthy customers of our mines, farms, and factories. They have to offer in exchange for our commodities a metal which is the medium of exchange of countless millions, a metal which formed one of the bases of our currency from the first establishment of our Government until 1873. What possible justification—political, economic, or financial—is there for our blunt refusal of their friendship and their business?

The economic world is staggering along on two hobbled legs. The money of half the people of the world is unrecognized by the other half. The Hongkong dollar is worth 50 cents during one period and 150 cents in the succeeding period. The American dollar is worth 1 bushel of wheat one year and 3 or 5 bushels the next. That is what our monetary experts call "sound" money. That is what the last administration called "economic stability." Those are the normal conditions which the last administration was so reluctant to abandon. There is only one way, in my judgment, to bring order out of this monetary chaos that has been called stability. We must recognize the money of the other half of the world; we must balance foreign exchanges; we must stabilize domestic markets and domestic prices. Remonetization of silver is designed to accomplish those very ends. The economic and financial strength of the United States is the greatest single factor in the world of money. Were we to recognize the white metal, we would thereby accomplish a world-wide distribution of metallic wealth; we would thereby empower our only prospective customers to buy. In addition remonetization of silver by the United States would eventually and inevitably lead to its recognition by the other monetary powers, and thus the world would be provided with a balanced and counterbalanced currency base. The establishment of a fixed-weight ratio between the metals with an elastic and scientific price ratio would enable our Government to regulate and control domestic commodity prices and at the same time anchor our currency system to a broad, expansive, and stable base. Such a plan is embodied in several "silver" bills now before Congress.

The Coinage Committee of the House has reported out H.R. 1577, introduced by Congressman FRESINGER, of Ohio, which is a bill providing for the purchase of silver and the issuance against such silver of silver certificates. These certificates are redeemable exclusively in silver and circulate as lawful money in the United States.

This bill, in my opinion, is sound in every respect, and would tend greatly to relieve the strain against gold by placing silver in competition with gold, and would strengthen our entire monetary system by adding to the metallic base a metal with an international value. Judge FRESINGER has no personal interest whatever in silver as such, but probably has done as much, if not more, constant work in behalf of silver legislation, purely from the standpoint of the economic well-being of the country, than any other man in the House.

Never ask your enemy how to win the war. We are now engaged in an economic war against the forces of monopoly, vested interests, and greed. It would be very strange, indeed, if representatives of those very powers would tell us how to triumph over them. It is easy to understand why the bankers and financial wizards are opposed to remonetization of silver. The remonetization of silver would break their hitherto undisputed control of production and distribution in this country. It would open up the way to the prosperity of the masses. It would liberate the natural resources of our country from the paralysis that has almost destroyed them. It would tend to bring about the end of usury. It would curtail wildcat speculation. It would make the banks the servants of the depositors rather than the slaves of their directors. It would create a free and expanding market for agriculture. It would stimulate the production and sale of metals. It would furnish markets for our manufactured goods and thereby increase wages and diminish unemployment. It would place our economic structure on a sound base and make wealth less subject to the selfish whims of speculators. Payment of our back-breaking debts would be made easier. Our dollar would become a true measure of value for labor, capital, and agriculture. Remonetized silver would be a weapon in the hands of the farmer and laborer that would break the grip of the financial magnates and open the way to economic liberty.

ANNOUNCEMENTS

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 30 seconds for the purpose of making an announcement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I wish to announce to the Membership of the House that the organization that is called the "Legislative Forum", which is nonpartisan in every way, will have a meeting in the Judiciary Committee rooms of the House on next Tuesday evening at 8 o'clock for the purpose of discussing the proposed New York trip and other matters. All Members are invited.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 30 seconds for the purpose of making an announcement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce that the members of the Association of War Veterans in Congress are requested to meet in the caucus room of the Old House Office Building next Tuesday morning at 10:30.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL, 1935

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H.R. 6663) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the House amendment to Senate amendment no. 14.

The Clerk read as follows:

The House agrees to Senate amendment no. 14 to said bill, with the following amendment: In lieu of the matter inserted by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"Sec. 21. (a) Title II of the act entitled 'An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government', approved March 20, 1933, is amended as follows:

"(1) Section 2 is amended by inserting after '1934' the following: 'and the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935'; and

"(2) Section 3 (b) is amended by striking out '15 percent' and inserting in lieu thereof the following: '10 percent during the portion of the fiscal year 1934 beginning February 1, 1934, and ending June 30, 1934, and shall not exceed 5 percent during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935.'"

"(b) Section 105 (relating to the salaries of the Vice President, Speaker of the House, Senators, Representatives, Delegates, Resident Commissioners, and persons on the rolls of the Senate or House of Representatives) of the Legislative Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1933 (except subsections (d) and (e) thereof), as continued and amended by section 4 of title II of such act of March 20, 1933, is hereby continued in full force and effect for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for the purpose of continuing such section, in the application of such section with respect to the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, the figures '1933' shall be read as '1935'; except that in the application of such section with respect to the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, subsection (a) is amended by striking out '15 percent' wherever it appears and inserting in lieu thereof 'the percentage of reduction applicable to officers and employees of the Federal Government generally.' In the application of such section with respect to the portion of the fiscal year 1934 beginning February 1, 1934, and ending June 30, 1934, the percentage of reduction shall be the percentage applicable to officers and employees of the Federal Government generally.

"(c) Section 107 (except paragraph (5) of subsection (a) thereof and subsection (b) thereof) of part II of the Legislative Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1933 (relating to certain special salary reductions); section 12 (relating to compensation reductions of officers and employees of insular possessions), section 13 (relating to the retired pay of certain judges), section 14 (relating to reduction in compensation benefits to certain civilian employees), and section 15 (relating to reductions in certain private pensions) of the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1934; and section 18 (relating to pensions for military service prior to the Spanish-American War) of title I of such act of March 20, 1933, are hereby continued in full force and effect for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for the purpose of continuing such sections with respect to the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, the figures '1933' (except in such sections 13, 14, and 15) shall be read as '1935' and the figures '1934' shall be read as '1935'; except that in the application of such sections 12, 13, and 18 with respect to the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, the percentage of reduction shall be the percentage applicable to officers and employees of the Federal Government generally. In the application of such sections 12, 13, and 18 with respect to the portion of the fiscal year 1934 beginning February 1, 1934, and ending June 30, 1934, the percentage of reduction shall be the percentage applicable to officers and employees of the Federal Government generally.

"(d) Notwithstanding the provisions of the antideficiency acts, deficiencies in their respective appropriations made during the second session of the Seventy-third Congress and available for obligation during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, may be incurred during such fiscal year by any executive department or independent establishment and the municipal government of the District of Columbia, upon written order of the President specifying the amount of the deficiency which may be incurred and by the legislative branch of the Government and the agencies customarily considered a part of such branch; but such deficiencies may be incurred only to the extent necessary to enable the payment to officers and employees of such activities of sums for which the available appropriation is inadequate by reason of a diminution in the percentage of reduction of compensation in pursuance of action of the President under the provisions of section 3 of title II of such act of March 20, 1933, as continued for the fiscal year 1935.

"(e) There is hereby appropriated so much as may be necessary for the payment of sums due, and payable out of the Treasury of the United States, by reason of the diminution under this title in the percentage of reduction of compensation, and other amendments to existing laws made hereby; and limitations on amounts for personal services are hereby respectively increased in proportion to the increase in appropriations for personal services made in this subsection. In the case of officers and employees of the municipal government of the District of Columbia, such sums shall be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia and the Treasury of the United States in the manner prescribed by the District of Columbia appropriation acts for the respective fiscal years."

Mr. WOODRUM (interrupting the reading of the amendment). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the House amendment be dispensed with.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, do I understand the gentleman is offering an amendment to the House amendment?

Mr. WOODRUM. The Clerk is reporting the House amendment to the Senate amendment, and I have asked that the reading of it be dispensed with and that the amendment be printed in the Record.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House insist on its amendment to Senate amendment 14.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I offer a preferential motion.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield for the purpose of offering the motion, but I do not want to yield the floor.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CONNERY moves that the House recede from its amendment to Senate amendment no. 14 and concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division on the question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands a division on the motion.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GOSS. On this division, if the House votes to recede, would it then be in order to concur with an amendment? Would not that be an amendment in the third degree?

The SPEAKER. That would not be in order. The House cannot amend its own amendment.

Mr. GOSS. So the question would come on concurring in the Senate amendment after a division.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, so far as I am personally concerned, I would be willing to move immediately the previous question and proceed to vote on these motions. I believe the Members of the House thoroughly understand what is involved, and I think we are as ready now to vote as we will ever be; but many Members have expressed great interest and a great desire to have something to say upon the subject, and therefore, Mr. Speaker, it will be my purpose to move the previous question at the end of 30 minutes, and the 30 minutes I am going to try to divide among the Members as equitably and as justly as I can.

For myself and for the motion I have made, to insist further on the House amendment, I may say, in order that the Record may be clear, that I have moved to insist on the House amendment because my duty as the one in charge of the bill requires that I make this motion in order to carry out the instructions of the House.

I did not vote for the House amendment no. 14 nor amendment no. 22, because I believed them to be contrary to the recovery program of the President. I believed that it would not assist us in finally reaching a conclusion that would be beneficial either to the veterans, the Federal employees, the administration, or to the House of Representatives. But the House, having taken deliberate and decided action on it, of course it is understood that the conferees on the part of the House are bound by the action the House has taken. [Applause.]

The action of the House in adopting amendments 14 and 22 the other night would be construed by myself and the other conferees as being a definite and positive instruction. Therefore if my motion to insist further on the House amendment obtains, the conferees on the part of the House will meet the conferees on the part of the Senate with only a narrow limit between what the House did and what the Senate has done in regard to amendment no. 14. So let it be understood that the action today in sending the bill to conference is only between those narrow limits.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. If the Connery motion on these two amendments is adopted, if the Connery motion to recede and concur is adopted, then this will not go to conference but will be immediately completed.

Mr. WOODRUM. If the Connery motion is adopted as to amendments 14 and 22, action on the bill is complete as to those two amendments. The conferees will meet, and I have no doubt will speedily compose their differences on the other amendments.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. What I should like to see is a straight vote on the whole salary proposition. I am sorry that the gentleman from Texas has demanded a division of the question. I appreciate the fact that he has the right to do it. But why not vote on the straight proposition whether we want the 5-and-10 proposition or the 15-percent proposition?

Mr. WOODRUM. I agree with the gentleman. I do not know what the Chairman of the Appropriations Committee has in mind.

Mr. SNELL. I think it would be well if he would tell us.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I have in mind the fact that you have made a double motion, one to recede and one to concur, and I think the House ought to have the opportunity to say whether it will recede from the amendment. After it votes to recede, if it does, it can concur if it wants to.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield? Why not vote on the straight proposition whether you want the 5-and-10 restoration or the straight 15?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Does not the gentleman understand that if the motion to recede from the House amendment carries, that will virtually settle the whole controversy?

Mr. GOSS. If the House recedes, of course, that is tantamount to adopting the Senate amendment on the 5-percent restoration.

Mr. BUCHANAN. It would be tantamount to expressing an opinion that the Senate amendment should be concurred in.

Mr. GOSS. With reference to the 5 percent.

Mr. DOWELL. Then why should not the Connery motion come direct before the House?

Mr. BUCHANAN. It will come before the House. First you vote as to whether you recede from what you did yesterday or the day before. If you recede from that, then the Connery motion is before the House.

Mr. GOSS. And if we do not recede, it is the same as voting against the Connery motion.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes. If you do not want to recede, the bill goes to conference.

Mr. SNELL. A lot of us over here want a direct vote on the 15 percent. We should like to have that if we can get it.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I want a direct vote on whether or not the House will adhere to its action of the other day.

Mr. SNELL. Let us have it on the motion to recede and concur and not beg the issue.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WOODRUM. To ask whether the question is divided or not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands a division.

Mr. WOODRUM. So the first vote will be on whether the House recedes from its amendment?

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Certainly.

Mr. TABER. I have some figures that have just come from the Veterans' Bureau, and I presume the gentleman has the same thing?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. TABER. I think the House ought to have them before they vote.

Mr. WOODRUM. Those figures are on amendment no. 22.

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUM. I think we should wait until we get to that.

Mr. GOSS. Do I understand that the gentleman from Texas is going to insist upon his demand for a division?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY].

Mr. TERRY. Will the gentleman yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. TERRY. I wish to know whether or not it is possible to separate the so-called "Borah amendment" from the Taber amendment. A good many Members of the House do not wish to be in the attitude of voting to increase their own salaries on this vote.

Mr. WOODRUM. That is to come up in amendment no. 22. We are voting now on amendment no. 14.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I believe that in the minds of many Members at this moment the question arises, How will I vote when the first vote comes? If ladies and gentlemen wish to concur in the Senate amendment, the vote is "yea" in each case on the division asked by the Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. The first vote is on the motion to recede. If you want the Senate amendment, the vote is "yea." If that should be agreed to, then the next vote is on the motion to concur, and the vote is "yea" in both instances if you are in favor of the Senate amendment.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. In a moment I shall be glad to yield to my friend from Mississippi. Regardless of anything that you may have heard or received this morning in reference to veterans in any part of the country, I ask you not to forget that the American Legion at its national convention voted in favor of a four-point plan with respect to disabled veterans. Three of those points are in the McCarran-Steiwer amendment that I am asking you to adopt today. That is what the American Legion, through its delegates, voted at its national convention. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. We are not voting on the veterans' amendment now.

Mr. CONNERY. No.

Mr. RANKIN. This vote is strictly on the pay-roll amendment.

Mr. CONNERY. Yes. This amendment will give back the full 15 percent to the Government employees. It will give them back their full pay, so that if you are in favor of that, you will vote "yea" on both of these votes which come up directly. Do not forget that the President of the United States in a public address has urged industry in the United States to shorten hours and increase wages. It seems to me very inconsistent that the Congress of the United States, after that express request of the President of the United States to industry, should leave the Government workers laboring under a pay cut. Their pay was low enough before the cut, too low, and the least that we can do is to put them back on a decent living wage and take away this 15-percent cut. Give them back their full pay.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. And a "yea" vote would also preserve the Borah amendment?

Mr. CONNERY. May I say to my colleague, the Borah amendment does not come in this vote at all. It is in amendment no. 22, tied on to the veterans' amendment.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. And the President has never said that he would veto this measure as he has the bonus. He has had plenty of chance to do so.

Mr. CONNERY. I do not know anything about that. From the information that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] gave to the House, the President has never agreed to accept the 75 percent passed by the House the day before yesterday.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. He never said that he would veto it.

Mr. WOODRUM. He never has agreed to it to me. I do not think that he will agree to it.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman spoke about the American Legion's four-point plan and stated that the Senate amendment embraces three of those four points.

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. I ask that of the gentleman because I recognize him as an authority upon this subject. Would not the House amendment be satisfactory, except as to a mere difference in amount—in other words, the difference between 75 percent and 90 percent?

Mr. CONNERY. No. I will say to my friend from New York that I believe the McCarran-Steiwer Senate amendment is the only amendment which contains three of the four points of the four-point Legion program.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the matter the gentleman is discussing is not now before the House.

Mr. CONNERY. Well, the gentleman asked me a question. I do not believe 75 percent would be sufficient for or do justice to the disabled veterans.

Now, in conclusion, all I want to say is that if you are in favor of giving the Government employees back their full pay, as I favor, you should vote "aye" on the first question which comes up. Vote "aye" on the second, thus concurring in the Senate amendment no. 14.

Mr. HEALEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. HEALEY. Has the gentleman any statistics that will show the average wages of Government employees today?

Mr. CONNERY. I understand the average wages of Government employees today are something around $1,174.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. KELLER. Can the gentleman tell us exactly what happened in the Senate when this amendment went over there? Was it objected to?

Mr. CONNERY. As Will Rogers says, all I know is what I read in the papers. My understanding is that it was objected to and sent to conference. In other words, the Senate refused to concur in the House amendments and disagreed with the House amendments, and asked for a conference. The Senate disagreed with the House amendments and asked for a conference. That is what brought it here. I hope the House will vote "aye" on both of these propositions and give back full pay to the Government employees. [Applause.]

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON].

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] clearly stated the parliamentary situation. If you are in favor of the Senate amendment restoring 15 percent, then your vote would be "aye." If you are in favor of adopting the 5-and-5-percent proposition, then your vote would be "no" on the motion made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN]. In dollars and cents, the difference between the two votes is in the neighborhood of fifty-five or sixty million dollars. It will cost approximately $60,000,000 more to carry out the full 15-percent restoration than it will to carry out the 5-and-5 proposition.

When this bill was first before this House, the House agreed to a 5-percent increase, or to restore 5 percent of the pay that was cut off by the Economy Act. When it went to the Senate, the Senate Committee on Appropriations, headed by Senator BYRNES, of South Carolina, who is one of the spokesmen for the administration on the floor of the Senate, brought in the bill restoring 5 percent from February 1, and 5 percent at the beginning of the fiscal year.

Now, I have a right, and the Members have a right, to assume that Senator BYRNES knew what he was doing, and the Committee on Appropriations knew what it was doing when they were trying to compromise this measure and restored 5-and-5.

That is the whole question. There is no need of taking up any long time here. We know it is out of the question to obtain complete restoration of the 15 percent by the passage of any bill. I want to see justice done to the Federal employees, and the only way to do so is to compromise this measure and accept the 5-and-5 proposition, as provided in the amendment which the House agreed to.

On last Wednesday this House by a vote of 185 to 101 approved this compromise. Is this House on Friday going to reverse its position and agree to restore the full 15 percent, when every Member knows it is out of the question to obtain favorable consideration on any bill restoring the entire 15 percent?

I yield back the balance of my time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FULLER].

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, everybody in the House knows if this 15 percent is restored to the salaries of the Federal employees, as provided in the Senate amendment, it will mean a veto for this bill. It will not only mean a veto at the hands of our President but the measure should be vetoed. The people of the country are demanding it and will approve of such action. It will mean a restoration of $190,000,000 which must be taken care of by taxation. At a time when people are starving, when they are being maintained upon relief at the expense of the Government, when 10,000,000 people are out of employment in this Nation, and when we are doing everything possible to advance employment and take care of the people and keep them from the bread lines, is no time for us to restore all of this Federal pay. [Applause.] The Federal employees are doing themselves a great injustice, and they are doing a great injustice to the Spanish-American and World War veterans. If we do not do something to change the law as it now exists and this bill is vetoed, it will mean that on the 1st day of July the entire 15 percent will be restored, and this is what these Federal employees desire. Their conduct means that they have little regard for the interest of our war veterans. The Senate amendment adds $350,000,000 to the amount the taxpayers of this country will have to pay to balance the Budget and keep the Government going. It means that our economy program, whereby we saved $400,000,000, will be annihilated and only $50,000,000 per annum will be saved. The people of the Nation, including the financial, industrial, and agricultural sections of this country, approve of economy in Federal Government. They are back of President Roosevelt 80 percent in this great drive to reduce the expenditures of this Government. It is not the Federal employees who are suffering by reason of this panic. You can scarcely get one out of his position; and if you do, he makes a holler; and if he is relieved from his duties, he stays around trying to get back and is willing to accept it for one half of the former pay. Competent people can be found from one end of this country to another who are willing to fill these positions for 50 percent of the present pay. I am not antagonistic to the interest of the Federal employees; most of them are very competent officials, but they are acting unreasonably in this matter. In my opinion it is not so much the rank and file of the employees as it is their legislative representatives. No doubt they would be delighted to have a restoration of part of their pay.

If we get this compromise restoring 5 percent now, 5 percent the 1st of July, and leaving the other 5 percent in the hands of the President, and get a 75-percent restoration for the Spanish-American War veterans and presumptive connected World War veterans, we are going a long way toward getting a compromise which the President can accept. On behalf of the veterans whom we are seeking to benefit, I hope and pray that by agreeing to this compromise the President of this Nation will approve the action of this House. The adoption of the Senate amendments will mean nothing for these deserving war veterans. It is better to get 75 percent now and let the future take care of the other 25 percent than to try to make ourselves strong with the veterans and get them nothing. In my many years of experience as a lawyer my policy has always been, if I could not get all that I was seeking for my client, to get as much as possible. It is results we are seeking today for these deserving war heroes.

The attitude of the Federal employees is that they want full restoration of their pay, to the great injury and detriment of the meritorious veterans, who are really only seeking and will be satisfied with 75 percent of their former pay.

Mr. HOEPEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULLER. Just for a question.

Mr. HOEPEL. If we will refund Liberty and Victory bonds, we will save the American taxpayers $240,000,000, which we can pay to the Federal employees. The banks are now getting it.

Mr. FULLER. Your statement sounds good, but it involves a grave question of truth and of practicability.

I am not for the Borah amendment, believing that Congressmen should be placed in the same category with all other Federal employees. That amendment is not involved in this question at issue.

If we do not vote for this compromise proposition on salaries, or if we do not change the present law, then automatically our salaries will be restored on the 1st day of July to the same amount they were before the economy bill.

By voting for this compromise of 5 and 5, we save the Government over $65,000,000 a year on the salaries of Government employees alone, and it is either this compromise proposition or a full restoration of the pay, which means $190,000,000. In my opinion, the overwhelming majority of the American people are opposed to any restoration of the pay, but certainly they are not in favor of more than is provided in this compromise amendment. The Federal employees have felt the panic less than any other class of people, due to the fact that their dollars went further and purchased more of the necessities of life than before the panic. Let us deal fairly with these good people, but do not let them lead us astray from our duty and the will and best interests of the American public.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULLER. I yield.

Mr. KENNEY. If we vote to increase the salaries of the Government employees, will the furlough system be continued? I am opposed to the furlough system.

Mr. FULLER. I am not advised, but it does not seem right that they should have their salaries fully restored, with all the privileges which they enjoyed, until normal conditions are restored.

Mr. DOWELL. If a Member votes for the Connery motion on Senate amendment no. 2, will he be voting to increase his salary?

Mr. FULLER. If the Borah amendment were not adopted, yes; otherwise, no.

I understand that John Thomas Taylor, representative of the American Legion, has written the Speaker a letter which was concurred in by National Commander Hayes and which will be read by Representative RANKIN, Chairman of the Veterans' Committee, stating that the House amendments affecting veterans' legislation are satisfactory. Let us not make a mistake by loading this bill down with salary restorations, by trying to get 90 percent for Spanish-American War veterans and restoration of all emergency officers, all of which we know is impossible. With all these Senate amendments attached to this bill, a veto is certain and this House, under such circumstances, will not vote to override such veto. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, it occurs to me that the argument put forward for less than a full-pay restoration to Federal employees, which is based on the statement that we have 10,000,000 undernourished people in the country, is simply begging the question. My sympathy goes out to the 10,000,000 in need, and I am going to do everything possible to bring about a rehabilitation to their previous economic status if possible; but to say that that is the reason why we should be justified now in restoring only 5 and 5 is begging the very point of the question.

In the very short time at my disposal I am going to bring to the attention of the House just this one experience: I sat in a department in Washington about 2 weeks ago talking to a department head whom I did not know very well. While I was sitting there talking a telegram came. It had two stars on it, indicating that it was a death message. The official tore it open and I saw his face blanch. He turned to me and he said, "There is your damned pay cut. A friend of mine in official life has committed suicide because he could not stand the gaff any longer, because his official position was such that his standard of living had been definitely established by the service in which he was identified."

I conclude with this one observation: It is pretty easy for Members of Congress still drawing 85 percent of a $10,000 salary to talk about this thing in a perfunctory and dispassionate manner; but if they were in the position of those drawing $1,800 less 15 percent, or in the position of those drawing $1,700 less 15 percent, with rent, interest, and living costs close to the 1928 index, the story would be different. I may observe that there are some 270,000 who were receiving only $1,700 before Public Act No. 2 was passed. There were over 417,000 who were receiving less than $2,000 before that act was passed. It is pretty easy for us to take a dispassionate view drawing the salaries we do, and it is time we were viewing it in a more sympathetic manner.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I hope that the House will reaffirm the position it took day before yesterday upon this amendment. [Applause.] It means a difference of $63,000,000, as I understand it, upon the salary proposition, and a difference of approximately $3,500,000 in other ways, making a total of approximately $66,000,000.

It does not seem to me, with conditions as they are, with factory pay rolls being spread out to cover folks other than those who formerly were employed, and reducing the contents of the pay envelop of all individuals, that we should attempt to add more than the 5-and-5 to the pay of the Federal employee. I want to be fair with them; you all do; but let us show a little discretion in the way we approach the Federal Treasury this time and sustain the position we took the other day. I hope this motion will be voted down.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote to concur in the Senate amendments; and in doing so I believe I am following out the policy so strongly advocated by President Roosevelt at this time of increasing the purchasing power of the American workers. [Applause.]

A few moments ago something was said about the President granting 5 percent restoration of salary to Federal employees dating from February 1 to June 30. Let us not be fooled on that. There will be 200,000 postal employees who will not receive 50 percent of that benefit. I hold in my hand a bulletin of late date issued by Postmaster General Farley in which he says that Presidential postmasters and employees in the Postal Service shall be furloughed without pay for 4 days between now and the end of the fiscal year, June 30, 1934. What does this mean? It means that by reason of the furlough order of the Postmaster General about 200,000 postal employees will have more than 50 percent of the 5-percent pay restoration taken away from them by reason of the 4 days furlough.

In other words, the President says to postal employees, "I will give you the 5-percent increase in salary"; and then the Postmaster General is taking it away from them. How inconsistent it is for the President to demand of private employers that they increase wages and shorten hours when the largest single employer of labor in the world, Postmaster General Farley, under the direct supervision of the President, is reducing the salaries of postal employees by the furlough method without pay. I, as a Member of Congress, cannot take the position that Federal employees are not entitled to the same just consideration of a fair living wage which the President is so strongly advocating in private employment at this time. I stand with the President for increased wages and shorter hours of labor in private employment. But, however, I want the same principle to apply to Federal employees also. [Applause.]

I favor the Senate amendment which relates to compensation and pensions for World War and Spanish-American War veterans. I am one of the few Members of Congress now serving in this body who voted for the declaration of war with Germany. I fully realized what war would mean to our beloved country. It cost us much in blood and treasure. The flower of America's young manhood answered the call, and all that remains of some of them has long been sleeping in Flanders Fields, where the poppies grow and the larks sing high in the heavens. To those we pay honor and tribute today. Many thousands of the boys came back not as they went away—they returned crippled, maimed, and wounded.

In the consideration of the Senate amendment today I am thinking of the young men who once were the flower of American manhood. I am in favor of the Senate amendment because it provides a decent compensation for the World War veterans whose disability is of service connection. In addition to compensation for World War veterans the Senate amendment also provides for the restoration of pensions to the brave veterans of the Spanish-American War. They rallied to the colors in 1898 when the country called. They fought for liberty and against oppression. Let us restore to them the small pension they were receiving until a year ago, and in so doing we will make the remainder of their days a little brighter and happier. [Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I sincerely hope, in view of the action of the Postmaster General, Mr. Farley, that some of the employees do not go out and commit suicide because they are going to lose 4 days' pay.

The other day when we considered this bill we had the most sensible discussion that this House has had since I have been a Member. A lot of us have been arguing here since the last special session that if the leaders would give us a chance to consider these bills and vote on their merits, we would do the sensible, deliberate thing. We demonstrated to you the other day that given the opportunity the House would consider legislation, deliberate on it, and do the thing that is best for all classes in this country. This morning the test is to prove to the leadership that we can continue this ability to take legislation and consider it on its merits. I think we did the right thing the other day. If we did right then, we will not recede from our position, and I do not care what the other body does. I know there is an attitude on the part of some of us to lay this thing on the Senate doorstep and let them take the responsibility for a Presidential veto.

Let us look at it from this viewpoint: If we hold to our position and force our will and the President vetoes it, then it is his fault. If we let the Senate have their way and the President vetoes it, it is our fault. I want you to take the responsibility this morning and insist on our stand and let the responsibility or the chips fall where they may. [Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK].

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, I expect to vote for the Connery motion to recede and concur in the Senate amendment. [Applause.] I am going to do that, because, in the first place, I believe that in the situation this country finds itself, the only thing that will restore prosperity is to put money into the hands of the people who work so that they can spend it with the business institutions of the country.

In the second place, I am going to vote for it because I think it is unfair to the business interests of this country for the Government to urge private employers to increase wages, threaten them with dire consequences if they do not, and then follow the opposite policy with Federal employees. I have no sympathy with the policy of furloughing the Post Office Department employees. It is against the policy that we are asking business to follow. The third reason I am going to vote for this motion is that this House has twice put its neck under the administration yoke and the Senate has "passed the buck" back to us by voting to restore employees salaries. I do not propose to have them get the exclusive credit for restoring salaries to the Federal employees while we are tied down by gag rules and thereby forced into voting for a salary cut. Let us pass the Senate amendment and send it to the White House, then we will have discharged our duty. The question of whether or not such action will be approved by the President is not one for us to decide.

I think in justice, in fairness, and in keeping with the policy of this administration toward private employers we ought to restore the full 15 percent to the employees of this Government, thus setting an example for others to follow. [Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, if we vote aye to recede, we will restore the full salary of every Government employee drawing up to $6,000 a year. There is one State that pays its Governor only $3,000 a year. There are three States that pay their Governors only $4,000 a year. There are two States that pay their Governors only $4,500 a year, and there are 19 States that do not pay their Governors over $6,000 a year.

Mr. SIROVICH. That is all they are worth.

Mr. BLANTON. The justices of the Supreme Court of the State of Texas get only $6,000 a year, yet if you vote aye you will recede, and you are voting to restore the full salary of every employee of this Government who gets a salary up to $6,000 a year. Should not employees drawing $6,000 per year take cuts the same as others?

I am not willing to recede. Are you going to be led by the nose by William Randolph Hearst, who for a whole month has been bullying you daily with his front-page articles, covering all of the top of the front page of his Herald, lambasting you, hounding you, and ridiculing you? Are you going to listen to William Randolph Hearst because he gets money out of the Government employees here in Washington by selling them his Herald? Are you going to follow him against the best interests of the 120,000,000 people in the United States? I am not. The people of New York do not follow William Randolph Hearst. He used to be in this body. The Membership did not follow him. Why are you going to follow him now? Look at his Herald. Look at the tops of his front pages—of his Herald and Times—for the past month. Are you going to follow Babcock, who has ridiculed you every time he has opened his mouth? I am going to vote my conscience for the whole people of the United States. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. GOSS].

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, if after the action of both Houses of Congress the President of the United States sees fit to veto this bill and we pass a continuing resolution, may I call attention to the economy provisions. The economy provisions, so far as all salaries are concerned, would be waived because the Economy Act expires on June 30, but when it comes to title 2 of the Economy Act involving the veterans, there would be no difference under the operation of the Economy Act so far as veterans' legislation is concerned whether the Connery motion is agreed to or not. The chairman of the subcommittee has stated, and rightly, that the House is bound to the limitations that the House put on it, so that the worst the veterans can get in conference is 75 percent.

These are the facts, even if a Presidential veto stares us in the face. Personally, I am going to vote for the Connery motion to restore the 15 percent; then if a veto message comes down here and the President is sustained and a continuing resolution comes in, of course the provisions of the Economy Act are null and void after June 30 only in reference to salaries and not in respect of the veterans.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSS. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Would the gentleman care to fix this bill so that the President will veto the bill?

Mr. GOSS. No; I trust that the President will not veto the bill, but there has been no indication by anyone on the floor of this House at any time since this bill has been under discussion as to how far the President is willing to go.

Mr. ALLGOOD. That is what the gentleman is seeking to do. He is putting the President on the spot.

Mr. GOSS. Absolutely not; or anyone else.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a few observations: I do not believe there should be any increase of salaries of Government officers or employees until President Roosevelt's recovery program has made more progress. While economic conditions have substantially improved since the advent of Roosevelt's administration and while agriculture, industry, commerce, finance, and other business activities are emerging from the pit of disaster and from the deplorable conditions in which they were plunged as a result of 12 years of Republican maladministration, yet conditions are not yet normal.

While millions of men and women who were idle under the Hoover administration have found employment and a living wage since President Roosevelt entered the White House, and while there has been a substantial upswing in all lines of business, we have not yet reached the goal, or a point which, in my opinion, justifies any radical increase in the Government pay rolls.

Now, as to veterans' allowances, I favor the House proposal rather than the Senate amendment. The House provision meets substantially the demands of the World War veterans and, moreover, I believe, the President will approve this bill if it carries the House provision while in all probability the bill will be vetoed if Senate amendment no. 22 is in the bill when it is sent to the White House.

With reference to Spanish-American War pensions, there is but little difference between the Senate and House amendments. The Senate amendment provides that Spanish-American War pensions shall be restored to 90 percent of the rates that prevailed before the passage of the Economy Act, while the House voted that the increase should not be less than 75 percent, but the House conferees were not limited to the 75 percent, but can go so high as 90 percent, and, of course, could have agreed to the 90-percent proposal of the Senate. So if the bill is sent to conference, the conferees have authority to increase Spanish-American War pensions to any point between 75 percent and 90 percent of the rates that prevailed before the enactment of the economy bill.

While the House amendment does not give the veterans all they ask, or all I think they are entitled to, I do believe that it represents the most we can hope to get for them at the present time and under present conditions. As a friend of the veterans, I think we would make a mistake if we insist on the Senate amendments, well knowing that their adoption invites a certain veto. We should be practical and look at this question from a practical standpoint.

I believe it was Lord Macaulay who said that he "would rather have an acre in Middlesex than a whole principality in Utopia." Instead of inviting a Presidential veto, we should write a bill that will meet with Executive approval and give the veterans and their dependents a substantial increase in their pensions and allowances. For these reasons I am convinced that the friends of the veterans in this body should insist on the House amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BOYLAN].

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the orderly procedure of this House. I prize and value the precedents that have been established here in other days, and, as custodians of them, today we should carry on in a fitting manner.

The chairman of the subcommittee comes in this morning and merely asks you to give him the power to carry on with respect to the points on which you declared yourselves only 2 days ago. We do not ask you to do anything else than confirm your decision which was arrived at after careful and long deliberation, lasting 8 hours.

In southern Ireland, in the county of Cork, there is a little town called Ballyhoo, and in this town all the residents take such an active part in any question that comes before them, political, social, economic, or otherwise, that they engage in most strenuous debate, a debate that is without equal in the annals of parliamentary or ordinary discussion, and from the violence of these debates has sprung forth a word known in the English language as "ballyhoo," and last year the Century Dictionary dignified this word by inserting it in the dictionary. The definition of ballyhoo is:

Loud, noisy demonstrations; the barker's cry at a sideshow of a county fair; the noisy emanations of the proprietor at an amusement resort near a city to entice the people in to see the bearded lady and the sea serpent and the gentleman with three legs.

[Laughter.]

Now let us get away from all ballyhoo and find out what this is all about.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I cannot leave my colleague in such a predicament. I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, it is hard to say it in a minute, but I shall do the best I can.

Now, what is it all about? There are one of two things to be done. No one can deny that I have been a consistent and loyal friend of the Federal employees and the veterans during the past 12 years. The RECORD will show this.

Here is the question involved now: If we stand by the Committee and vote "no" on the motion to recede, we will get something for the Federal employees—I want my remarks also to apply to the veterans' provisions—but if we do not, or if we vote "aye", all we will do will be to give the veterans and the Federal employees a lot of ballyhoo and nothing else. I can state on the highest authority that this is exactly what will happen. If the motion prevails, it will bring a veto, which means giving nothing to the veterans and nothing to the Federal employees. [Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who have spoken on this matter may have permission to revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] that the House recede from its amendment to Senate amendment no. 14.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 161, nays 225, not voting 46, as follows:

So the motion of Mr. CONNERY was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call my name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. RAINEY, and he voted "no", as above recorded.

The following pairs were announced:

On this vote:

Mr. Jenkins (for) with Mr. Claiborne (against).
Mr. Marshall (for) with Mr. Beck (against).
Mr. Douthich (for) with Mr. Brooks (against).
Mr. Condon (for) with Mr. Celler (against).

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. O'CONNOR. As I understand it, the practice has been for some time that when a Member changes his vote from "no" to "aye" or from "aye" to "no" there is nothing in the RECORD to show it. The reporters do not take it down.

I make the point of order at this time that every word that is uttered in this House should appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I make the point of order that when a Member changes his vote, as was done 2 days ago, when 40 or 50 Members on the majority and minority sides changed their votes, that change should appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is correct as to the practice that has prevailed heretofore. The Chair thinks that if a Member changes his vote it ought to appear in the RECORD, and hereafter the reporters will see that all Members who change their votes are reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. [Applause.]

Mr. McFARLANE. A point of order, Mr. Speaker. I want to say that there were only about 26 who changed their votes instead of 40 or 50.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Rhode Island, Mr. CONDON, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. MEAD, are unavoidably absent. If they were here, they would vote "aye."

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SNELL. Is there any provision in the rules for such an announcement as has just been made by the gentleman from Massachusetts?

The SPEAKER. There is no provision in the rules for an announcement of that character.

Mr. SNELL. I make the point of order that the gentleman is out of order. If the rules are going to be invoked, let us abide by all of them.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, the Chair just ruled that all remarks uttered on the floor of the House must go in the RECORD; therefore my announcement must go in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot recognize the gentleman for that purpose under the rules.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a Member has no right to make a speech until he is recognized by the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. WOODRUM, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the motion of Mr. CONNERY was rejected was laid on the table.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House insist on its amendment to Senate amendment 14.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report House amendment to Senate amendment no. 22.

The Clerk read as follows:

The House agrees to Senate amendment no. 22 to said bill, with the following amendment:

In lieu of the matter inserted by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 26. Notwithstanding any provision of law to the contrary, in no event shall the compensation being paid on March 19, 1933, under subsections (3) and (5) of section 202 of the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, to veterans for the loss of the use of both eyes, where such veterans were, except by fraud, mistake, or misrepresentation, in receipt of compensation on March 19, 1933, be reduced or discontinued, except in accordance with the regulations issued under the act entitled 'An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government', approved March 20, 1933, pertaining to hospitalized cases.

"SEC. 27. Where service connection for a disease, injury, or disability not caused by his own willful misconduct was on March 19, 1933, established in accordance with section 200 of the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, and such connection has been severed through the application of, or regulations or instructions promulgated under Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, or Public Law No. 78, Seventy-third Congress, service connection is hereby reestablished and as to such cases the provisions of the first paragraph of section 200 of the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, are hereby reenacted: Provided, That the provisions of this section shall not apply (1) to persons entering the active military or naval service subsequent to the date of November 11, 1918, (2) to persons as to whom clear and unmistakable evidence discloses that the disease, injury, or disability had inception before or after the period of active military or naval service, unless such disease, injury, or disability is shown to have been aggravated during service, (3) to persons as to whose cases service connection was established by fraud, clear or unmistakable error as to conclusions of fact or law, or misrepresentation of material facts; and as to all such cases enumerated in this proviso, all reasonable doubts shall be resolved in favor of the veteran, the burden of proof being on the Government: Provided, That the rate to be paid to anyone under this section shall be 75 percent of the amount received by him on March 19, 1933.

"SEC. 28. The fourth paragraph of section 20, Public Law No. 78, Seventy-third Congress, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"Notwithstanding any of the provisions of Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, in no event shall the compensation being paid on March 19, 1933, for service-connected disabilities to those veterans who entered the active military or naval service on or before November 11, 1918, and whose disabilities are not the result of their own misconduct, where they were, except by fraud, misrepresentation of a material fact, or unmistakable error as to conclusions of fact or law, in receipt of compensation on March 19, 1933, be reduced or discontinued, except in accordance with the regulations issued under Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, pertaining to hospitalized cases: Provided, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to persons as to whom clear and unmistakable evidence discloses that the disease, injury, or disability had inception before or after the period of active military or naval service, unless such disease, injury, or disability is shown to have been aggravated during service; and in any review of the case of any veteran to whom compensation was being paid on March 19, 1933, for service-connected disability, reasonable doubts shall be resolved in favor of the veteran, the burden of proof being on the Government: Provided further, That notwithstanding any of the provisions of Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, any veteran whose disease, injury, or disability was established on or after the date this paragraph as amended takes effect as service connected under section 200 of the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, shall be entitled to receive compensation in accordance with the provisions of such act, as amended, and the rating schedule in effect on March 19, 1933: Provided further, That whenever there is a change in the degree of disability of any such veteran the amount of compensation to be paid shall be determined pursuant to the provisions of the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, and the rating schedule in effect on March 19, 1933, and such amount shall not be reduced or discontinued. In no event shall death compensation being paid, except by fraud, misrepresentation of a material fact, or unmistakable error as to conclusions of fact or law, to widows, children, and dependent parents of deceased World War veterans under the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, on March 19, 1933, be reduced or discontinued, whether the death of the veteran on whose account compensation is being paid was directly or presumptably connected with service. In any case where a World War veteran dies or has died from disease or injury, and service connection for such disease or injury has been reestablished on or after the date this paragraph as amended takes effect as service connected under section 200 of the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, or which would have been established under such section 200 had the veteran been living on March 19, 1933, and reestablished on or after the date this paragraph as amended takes effect, the surviving widow, child, or children and/or dependent parents shall be entitled to receive compensation at the rates prescribed in Veterans' Regulation No. 1 (a), part I, paragraph IV, and amendments thereto.

"SEC. 29. Section 6 of Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, as amended by Public Law No. 78, Seventy-third Congress, is hereby amended by adding thereto the following proviso: 'Provided, That any veteran of any war who was not dishonorably discharged, suffering from disability, disease, or defect, who is in need of hospitalization or domiciliary care, and is unable to defray the necessary expenses therefor (including transportation to and from the Veterans' Administration facility), shall be furnished necessary hospitalization or domiciliary care (including transportation) in any Veterans' Administration facility, within the limitations existing in such facilities, irrespective of whether the disability, disease, or defect was due to service. The statement under oath of the applicant on such form as may be prescribed by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs shall be accepted as sufficient evidence of inability to defray necessary expenses.'

"SEC. 30. Notwithstanding any of the provisions of Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, no pension being paid on March 19, 1933, to any veteran of the Spanish-American War, including the Boxer rebellion and the Philippine insurrection, or to the widow and/or dependents of any such veteran, shall be reduced by more than 25 percent, except in accordance with the regulations issued pursuant to Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, pertaining to hospitalized cases, and except where his disability is the result of his own willful misconduct: Provided, That the provisions of this section shall not apply (1) to persons to whom payments were being made on March 19, 1933, through fraud, clear or unmistakable error as to conclusions of fact or law, or misrepresentation of a material fact, except that decisions as to degree of disability rendered prior to March 20, 1933, shall be conclusive, or (2) to any person during any year following a year for which such person was not entitled to exemption from the payment of a Federal income tax: Provided, however, That a veteran in Federal employ shall not receive more than $6 per month if his salary, if single, exceeds $1,000, and if married $2,500: Provided further, That this section shall not apply to any person who enlisted after August 12, 1898, and who did not serve in either the Boxer rebellion or the Philippine insurrection.

"All laws in effect on March 19, 1933, granting monetary benefits to veterans of the Spanish-American War, including the Boxer rebellion and the Philippine insurrection, are hereby reenacted in their entirety, and such laws shall be effective from and after the effective date of this act, subject to the limitations of this section and to such reduction in pensions as may be made hereunder.

"SEC. 31. Where any veteran suffers or has suffered an injury, or an aggravation of any existing injury, as the result of training, hospitalization, or medical or surgical treatment, awarded him under any of the laws granting monetary or other benefits to World War veterans, or as the result of having submitted to examination under authority of the War Risk Insurance Act or the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, and not the result of his misconduct, and such injury or aggravation results in additional disability to or the death of such veteran, the benefits of Public Law No. 2, of Public Law No. 78, and of this title shall be awarded in the same manner as if such disability, aggravation, or death were service connected within the meaning of such laws: except that no benefits under this section shall be awarded unless application be made therefor within 2 years after such injury or aggravation was suffered, or such death occurred, or after the passage of this act, whichever is the later date. The benefits of this section shall be in lieu of the benefits under the act entitled 'An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes', approved September 7, 1916, as amended.

"SEC. 32. The last sentence of section 9 of Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, is hereby repealed.

"SEC. 33. Service-connected money benefits payable to World War veterans under this title and Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, shall be entitled 'compensation' and not 'pension.'

"SEC. 34. This title shall take effect on the date of enactment of this act, and no payments of any benefits conferred under the provisions of this title shall be made for any period prior to such date.

"SEC. 35. That notwithstanding the provisions of section 17 of title I of an act entitled 'An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government', approved March 20, 1933, and section 20 of an act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes', approved June 16, 1933, any claim for yearly renewable term insurance under the provisions of laws repealed by said section 17, wherein claim was duly filed prior to March 20, 1933, and on which maturity of the insurance contract had been determined by the Veterans' Administration prior to March 20, 1933, and where payments could not be made because of the provisions of the act of March 20, 1933, or under the provisions of the act of June 16, 1933, may be adjudicated by the Veterans' Administration, and any person found entitled to yearly renewable term insurance benefits claimed shall be paid such benefits in accordance with and in the amounts provided by such prior laws."

Mr. WOODRUM (interrupting the reading of the amendment). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the House amendment to Senate amendment no. 22 be omitted and that it be printed in the Record.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House insist on its amendment to Senate amendment no. 22.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I offer a preferential motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CONNERY moves that the House recede from its amendment to Senate amendment no. 22 and concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division of the question.

The SPEAKER. The question will be divided.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary situation is the same on this amendment as it was on amendment numbered 14. As far as I am concerned, I am ready to vote now. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman should explain exactly what the vote is, and then should let us vote.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I should like to have a few minutes.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I am extremely impatient to get off the floor and take this matter away, so that other business may proceed, but it is an important matter and our colleagues on both sides of the Chamber are interested in it.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the gentleman to say that just as soon as we conclude this we will take up the Bankhead bill, and if we conclude that tonight we will adjourn over tomorrow. If we do not get through with the Bankhead bill tonight, we will have to have a session tomorrow.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I am just as anxious to get to a vote as the gentleman from Virginia is, but I think the Chairman of the Veterans' Committee and a few others would like to say a few words.

Mr. WOODRUM. I am sure that we can expedite the matter with the cooperation of the gentleman and other gentlemen on the floor. As I started to say, the parliamentary situation on amendment numbered 22 is exactly what it was on amendment numbered 14. The House has expressed itself. The conferees feel that that is an instruction to the conferees, and if we do go to conference with the Senate conferees we will insist on that position or bring the matter back to the House.

Mr. GOSS. Does not the gentleman mean within the limits of the two Houses and not necessarily the exact language of the House?

Mr. WOODRUM. As one conferee I say to my colleague, who is also a conferee, that I feel that the substance of the House amendment, certainly insofar as the rate and terms are concerned, is binding upon the conferees.

Mr. GOSS. Within the limit of the two Houses?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY].

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I am not going to take any time of the House except to say that we are facing the same situation now on this veteran amendment numbered 22 that we did on amendment numbered 14. A division of the question has been asked. If you favor concurring in the Senate amendment, you will vote "yea", and if you want it to go to conference, you will vote "nay." If we pass the first vote, to recede, the next motion will be on the motion to concur, and that vote will be "yea" if you wish to concur in the Senate amendment. I understand in a few moments that the Chairman of the Veterans' Committee, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN]—and I have no desire to object to his doing it—will read a letter to you from the legislative representative of the American Legion. I understand the letter is going to say that the amendments passed by the House the day before yesterday are acceptable to the Legion, and I say to my colleague from Mississippi, the Chairman of the Veterans' Committee, that neither John Thomas Taylor nor the national commander of the American Legion, or anyone else, has any right to speak for the

11,000 posts of the American Legion whose representatives voted at the Legion national convention for the Legion's four-point plan, three points of which are in the McCarran-Steiwer amendment, which I am asking you now to adopt, and I hope you will vote "yea" and adopt the McCarran-Steiwer amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. And Mr. John Thomas Taylor has no right to speak for the Spanish-American War veterans.

Mr. CONNERY. No; and he has no right to speak for the Grand Army veterans.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. PETTENGILL. And the American Legion at this national convention decided not to press for the bonus this year.

Mr. CONNERY. That is true.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Then why did not the gentleman stand by them?

Mr. CONNERY. Oh, I do not have to stand by what the Legion does in my legislative capacity. If the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] believes this is the right thing to do, that is his business. One of my colleagues asked me yesterday if the Disabled Veterans of the World War or the Veterans of Foreign Wars or the American Legion takes a certain stand, does that mean that we have to stand by them, and I said "No"—that he should vote as he pleases and that I vote as I please; but I wish to make it clear that I do not believe that the letter of John Thomas Taylor represents the views of the million members of the rank and file of the Legion as expressed by them through their delegates at the last Legion national convention, when they voted for a four-point program, three points of which are in the McCarran-Steiwer amendment and are not in the amendments passed by the House the day before yesterday.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The gentleman said that John Thomas Taylor has no right to speak for the Spanish-American War veterans.

Mr. CONNERY. That is correct.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. And neither has the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR] a right to speak for them.

Mr. CONNERY. No; but he can tell what he thinks they want.

Mr. BAILEY. And this is the third time that the House has been called on to pull the chestnuts out of the fire, is it not?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes. I hope the House will vote "yea" on both of these motions, thereby concurring in the Senate amendments, which is what I believe is desired by thousands of disabled veterans of the Nation.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman begins, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is it possible for us to separate the vote here, so that we do not have to vote for our own increase in salary in order to get something for the veterans?

The SPEAKER. It is not possible.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I am supporting what we did the night before last, because I think it is our only chance to get anything for these disabled veterans at this session of Congress. I have taken this proposition up with the American Legion and I have taken it up with the Disabled Veterans of the World War. I am going to read a letter from the representative of the American Legion, dated today:

THE AMERICAN LEGION,
Washington, D.C., March 16, 1934.

HON. HENRY T. RAINES,
Speaker of the House.

MY DEAR SIR: Relative to the amendments in the independent offices bill as they affect legislation suggested for veterans, the action taken in the House on March 14 is satisfactory to the American Legion.

They substantially cover three points of the American Legion program. This is concurred in by the national commander, Edw. A. Hayes.

Yours truly,

THE NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE,
JOHN THOMAS TAYLOR.

In addition to that, I talked with Commander Hayes, whom I have known for a long time. I served with him on the rehabilitation committee at two different National American Legion conventions. I talked with him yesterday afternoon, and he is extremely anxious that we stand by what we did the night before last. [Applause.] I had a conversation a few moments ago with the distinguished legislative representative of the Disabled Veterans of the World War, and he said that under the circumstances he thought the best thing to do would be to go ahead and accept what the House did the night before last.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 2 minutes more.

Mr. GOSS. Has the gentleman any information as to whether if the House passes the so-called "Taber amendment" the President would sign the bill?

Mr. RANKIN. No; I have not. I say this, however, that he will come a great deal nearer to signing this than he would the Senate bill. That is what I am interested in, because if it is not signed and does not become a law, I fear they will not get anything.

Mr. BROWNING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. No; I do not have time. He will come nearer signing this bill than he would if you loaded it down further.

Mr. GOSS. But the gentleman has no assurance that he will sign this?

Mr. RANKIN. No; he has not told me so, but I believe he will sign it.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman believe that the Legion has a right to speak for the tuberculosis cases? They are so desperately in need of their increased amount.

Mr. RANKIN. In the words of Shakespeare, "The lady doth protest too much, methinks." Last year when we had this proposition up on the economy bill the lady from Massachusetts [Mrs. Rogers] voted for it and I voted against it. [Laughter and applause.] I am trying to get back for these disabled men a part of what the lady from Massachusetts helped take away from them last year. [Laughter and applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the lady from Massachusetts [Mrs. Rogers].

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, at the time when the President had closed every bank in the country to prevent, he said, a worse economic condition, at which time people were living in terror, Congress passed the Economy Act. The act, among other things, gave the President authority to rewrite the laws relating to veterans' compensation. I shall quote one paragraph from the President's message to Congress on March 10 regarding his plans for the disabled veterans:

The last Congress enacted legislation relating to the reorganization and elimination of executive agencies, but the economies thus to be effected are small when viewed in the light of the great deficit for the next fiscal year. They will not meet the pressing needs of our credit situation. Provision for additional saving is essential, and therefore I am asking the Congress today for new legislation laying down broad principles for the granting of pensions and other veteran benefits and giving to the Executive the authority to prescribe the administrative details. We are unanimous in upholding the duty of the Government to care for those who suffer in its defense and for their widows and orphans. The application, however, of this great principle to large numbers of people involves complications—so great that it is almost impossible to draw legislation with sufficient flexibility to provide substantial justice in varying situations. The proposed legislation states the principles and, limited to them, permits the Executive to draw the lines of differentiation necessary to justice.

Can we be blamed by the Democrats in trusting their President when he said he would do justice to the veterans? Many of us in the House, when we voted for the economy bill last year which gave so much power to the President, had not the slightest conception that the President would really hurt the veterans. We were actually stunned when we read his regulations. He had the chance of a lifetime to eliminate unwise laws and to keep wise ones and to do justice. But what did he do to the veterans of all wars, their widows and their orphans? I cannot understand, Mr. Speaker, why there is laughter from the Democratic side when we speak of people who have committed suicide, when we speak of the ill and the disabled. I cannot understand why the Democratic side booed Mr. DIRKSEN when he told us of the Federal employee who had just committed suicide. I have previously spoken of playing politics with human suffering. This is laughing at human tragedy. I wonder what the people who read the RECORD think? It is a very serious matter.

I wonder what the Members of Congress think of this case. A veteran who was in an airplane crash in Texas during the war—I shall give you his name, Lt. Frederick Connelly. As a result of the airplane crash, he is paralyzed from his waist down, a double permanent total case. He was cut last spring 60 percent under the President's administrative ratings. We Members all know this is only one case of many who were cruelly cut. It is injustices of this kind I am protesting against now. I did not vote to cut these TB men and NP men from the rolls nor the Spanish War veterans. I did not vote to cut the service-connected cases 60 percent or to cut them at all. We were promised by spokesmen for the President that they would not be cut.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the lady yield?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I am sorry. The gentleman had time and he would not yield to me but once.

Mr. RANKIN. The lady did vote for that.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I did not. The President made his own regulations.

Mr. RANKIN. Oh, no. The lady voted for it, and we told you on the floor what it would do.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The President made his own regulations. Day after day, week after week, month after month has passed and the World War Veterans' Committee, of which I am a member, has not held a hearing since the new deal came into being over a year ago. For 1 year the veterans have had no opportunity in the House to present their case or plead their cause. This has not happened before since the World War. We know the gag rules. This may be our only chance to help the disabled veterans. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the House will write into law what we know is just, what we know is right. We cannot leave it again to chance. We cannot leave it again to misjudgment.

The SPEAKER. The time of the lady from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS] has expired.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. O'MALLEY].

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, I confess the temptation to vote for this House amendment is very strong, particularly because the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York fixes it so that our own salaries will be raised; but I am not willing to yield to that temptation when I am compelled to concede in that same amendment that we are only willing to put a few disabled presumptive cases back on the rolls, put back the Spanish-American War veterans, who, because of age or disease, deserve a pension, at only 75 percent of what they received before passage of the Economy Act. I can appreciate the temptation that is in this amendment appealing to our own pockets, but I am willing to forego an increase in my own salary if we can put back on the pension rolls the deserving Spanish-American War veterans, World War presumptives that saw active service across the sea and are entitled to be supported by the Government until they can find a job or get work which will enable them to make a living in spite of their disability handicap. I am not going to take the temptation laid down by the Republican side of this House in the Taber amendment, which gives us a whole return of our own salary as reduced by the Economy Act but restores deserving veterans only to 75 percent of what the Economy Act took from them.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS].

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, as a conferee I am a servant of the House and will, of course, follow the instructions which have been given. In the brief time given to me I want to express my individual views upon both amendments which are now under consideration.

First let me say that I favor paying Government employees the full amount of their salaries, whatever that may be. If there are to be changes in the amounts to be paid, these changes should be made by the legislative committees of the House. I have never been in favor of making any reservations of any amount, so far as Government salaries are concerned, and in my judgment the full amount appropriated for salaries should be paid to the Government employees. It follows, therefore, that if my own individual views were followed that I would restore the entire maximum amount of all Government salaries. As stated, however, I am a servant of the House, and the House has given the conferees instructions to restore 5 percent on February 1, 1934, another 5 percent on July 1, 1934, and the date of the restoration of the remaining 5 percent will be left to the President.

Under the instructions given the conferees we must attempt to compose the differences between the two Houses.

Now, with reference to the second amendment, permit me to say that no man in the House is a better friend of the soldiers or more anxious to restore the maximum amount of benefits to them than I am. If I had my way about it, insofar as veterans' legislation is concerned, I would repeal the provisions of the Economy Act and restore to the soldiers of all wars all of the benefits which they enjoyed on March 19, 1933. [Applause.]

We know, however, that this cannot be done. Everyone familiar with the situation here knows that the effort being made here is only an idle gesture. The Members of the House are thoroughly familiar with the situation. It has been discussed on the floor of the House, the situation has been earnestly talked over in caucus, it has been discussed in the press, and the Members have discussed it in the cloakrooms, so that everyone knows that the full amount of benefits, regardless of our own individual views, cannot in this bill be restored to the Spanish-American War veterans or to the ex-service men of the World War. This is recognized by Col. John Thomas Taylor, chairman of the legislative committee of the soldiers of the World War, and by the national commander of the American Legion, Hon. Ed. Hayes. They know that the amendment upon which we are about to vote carries the maximum amount that can be secured. I am therefore going to vote for it. If there were any chance to secure more, I would vote for that.

I should prefer to follow those who really know the situation and who represent the soldiers of the country, rather than to attempt to deceive them. Every Member of the House knows that the President has let it be known, both to Members of the Senate and of the House, that he will veto this bill if the Senate amendments remain in it unchanged. I feel sure that while the Spanish-American War veterans and the ex-service men of the World War, in my district, would like to see the full benefits restored, as they enjoyed them before the passage of the Economy Act on March 19, 1933, yet I know they would prefer to have the benefits as incorporated in this amendment, rather than to have none at all.

Let us not deceive ourselves. That is what a vote upon this amendment means. If we want to benefit the soldiers, either the Spanish-American War veterans, or the ex-service men of the World War, we should vote for all that can be secured for them.

There is not a man in the city of Washington, either in or out of Congress, familiar with the situation, who does not know this to be true. Then why not have the intellectual and moral courage to explain to our constituents the real situation that confronts the House, and say to them that a vote in favor of the Senate amendments means a veto, and means that no benefits will be restored to the soldiers of any wars, whereas a vote for this amendment means a restoration of more than three fourths of the benefits the soldiers of all wars enjoyed on March 19, 1933.

I favor the four-point program of the American Legion and have introduced a bill to that effect. While this bill does not embody all that the members of the American Legion want, it is a long step in that direction. With this much restored, it will be easier to secure amendatory legislation restoring the balance.

This amendment will place the remaining presumptives, to the number of 29,000, back on the rolls with three fourths of the benefits which they enjoyed before the Economy Act was passed. Defeat this bill, or have it vetoed, and, of course, they will get nothing. Every Member of the House knows that this bill cannot be passed by a two-thirds vote over the veto of the President.

I was a Member of the House during the World War and felt keenly then the responsibility of enacting legislation to carry on the war. I have voted for all legislation for the benefit of the soldiers of the country and am anxious to see that the differences between the House, the Senate, and the President be ironed out so that the maximum amount of benefits may be secured for them.

When you examine the RECORD of March 14, 1934, it will be found that those voting for this same amendment include Maj. A. L. BULWINKLE, of North Carolina; Capt. JERE COOPER, of Tennessee; Capt. GORDON BROWNING, of Tennessee; WRIGHT PATMAN, of Texas; Gen. CHARLES H. MARTIN, of Oregon; JOHN E. RANKIN, of Mississippi; LAMAR JEFFERS, of Alabama; and numerous other veterans who saw distinguished service either in the Spanish-American War or in the World War. The soldiers have no better friends. These men know the situation. They appreciate, as I do, that this amendment represents the most that can be secured for the soldiers at the present time. All of them perhaps would go further, as I would go, but they are unwilling to refuse to take all that can be secured at this time by this amendment. That is the situation that confronts us. Every Member of the House knows this. We should have the intellectual and moral courage to recognize this fact and explain it to those who have confidence in us.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WEIDEMAN].

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Mr. Speaker, this House can do anything it wants to. We should build our appropriations up to a principle and not cut a principle down to the appropriation. That is the way I feel about this matter.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEIDEMAN. I yield.

Mr. CONNERY. The Victory Post of the American Legion here in Washington this morning repudiated Mr. Taylor's stand.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Yes; and there will be many more American Legion posts repudiate his action before long. Louis Johnson last year in a letter to a Member of this Congress, which was read into the RECORD, approved of the passage of the economy bill, and I know that is not with the approval of the rank and file of the members of the American Legion.

Two years ago the now chairman of the legislative committee of the national organization of the American Legion, Raymond Kelly, of Detroit, at the State convention at Grand Rapids, in his annual report showed the connivance that was going on at the national headquarters at Indianapolis. For years a small group of men known in the American Legion as the "king makers" were directing the Legion for their own purposes.

These men boasted that they controlled the policies of the Legion; they were the men who hand picked the national commanders. The rank and file of the Legion protested against this.

THE KING MAKERS

Now, who were these king makers? Mark McKee, of the State of Michigan, lately of the city of New York—a tremendously wealthy man, who has lost the common touch. You may inquire why he has dropped from Legion politics lately. Then there were other king makers, such as Hanford MacNider, who, after his term as national commander of the Legion, used that weapon to be appointed Ambassador to Canada, thereby forever removing him from the ranks of the buck private and away from their viewpoint toward fundamental economic matters.

Then there was Dike O'Neil, a past national commander, who ended up selling trucks to the United States Army.

And who is John Thomas Taylor? In the Washington telephone book I see he is listed as both a colonel and a lieutenant colonel. In all my time I never heard of very many colonels who did not "go society."

I shall intend in the future, as in the past, to carry on my fight for the buck private in the rear rank; the colonels can take care of themselves. It is the privates, and not the colonels, that need help.

As to the American Legion situation last year, we voted the economy bill, but, thank God, I was not one who voted for it. The chairman of our committee read a telegram or a letter from Louis Johnson, then national commander of the American Legion, who said he spoke for the membership and approved the Economy Act, and you all know now that was not so. I want to say to you today that there are in this Chamber two men, Jimmy Van Zandt and George Brobeck, both veterans, who are the national commander of the Veterans of Foreign Wars and the legislative representative, who are fighting for the buck privates every minute. They are interested in veterans of foreign wars and in all the soldiers of all wars, and they have not lost courage but are carrying on the fight with real vigor. I do not know anything about national soldier politics, but in Michigan every veteran connected with the Disabled American Veterans, representing the real soldiers, the men who did the real fighting, the disabled, are for the concurrence of the Senate amendments, as are the Spanish War veterans. Let me tell you this: The American Legion too long has been ruled by the top, by McKee, O'Neil, and other men who are known as "king makers", who select the men they are going to run for national office before the convention ever meets. They are not representative of the rank and file of the Legion. The real Legionnaires are going to continue this fight with us until all veterans get real justice.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. WEIDEMAN. I yield.

Mr. CONNERY. Every member of the Veterans of Foreign Wars is in favor of the McCarran-Steiwer amendment.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. They certainly are.

Mr. CONNERY. And every one of them is an overseas man.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. They did the fighting.

They let Richard Whitney and other members of the stock exchange come here and tell the Senators and Members of the House what they want to have written into law, but I am not willing to sacrifice the heroes of this country for those men. If we are going to give the country to the bankers, I am in favor of doing justice to the heroes who made the money for the bankers. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN].

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Speaker, day before yesterday I voted for the Taber amendment, believing that that might be a possible way to obtain a compromise in this matter; but today we are told there is little or no hope of obtaining that compromise. Therefore, I am not going to continue to vote for the Taber amendment but will vote to concur in the Senate amendment, send the bill to the White House, and let the President veto it if he chooses to do so. That will be his responsibility.

Further, the Senate has rejected the Taber amendment. Therefore, someone must now back up, either the Senate must back up on its amendments or the House must back up on the Taber amendment. I choose to back up on the Taber amendment, as I only voted for it in the hope that it might be a reasonable compromise upon which the Senate, House, and the President might get together on something which would provide for reasonable restoration for Spanish War veterans and actual and presumptive service-connected cases of the World War. Now there is little hope for such a compromise to be accepted. The Senate has rejected it and the House leaders hold out no assurance that the White House will accept the Taber amendment.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. EDMISTON].

Mr. EDMISTON. Mr. Speaker, as I understand the Taber amendment, which I favor, it leaves the disabled officers who were actually disabled in combat on the retired list, but keeps off that roll all the "medicos" and lawyers who got themselves on the retired-pay list but who never had any business on it. [Applause.] I am getting tired of these 90-day noncombatant soldiers copping all the gravy from veterans' legislation. [Applause.]

Just the other day the War Department appointed two major generals to fill vacancies. Did they pick combatant officers, men who commanded combat units in France during the World War? They did not. They picked general headquarters' colonels.

I want the reward to go to the real soldier, the man who did the fighting during the World War, and I want to see the medicos and the lawyers taken off the list.

The very fact that the Economy Act cut the retired emergency officers' list from 6,600 to 1,500 shows how many of those on the list had service-connected disabilities. This retired emergency officers' list was the only pension list in the history of the world that contained more doctors than it did infantrymen.

This Taber amendment restores the Spanish War veteran to 75 percent of his former pension and, in my opinion, is all that the President will stand for. He will not stand for the Senate amendment. The Taber amendment gives to the American Legion 75 percent of its four-point program. It gives to the veterans of our last two wars 75 percent of what their recognized organizations asked for them in their national conventions assembled within the present year.

In other words, my colleagues, I favor the Taber amendment because it takes off the pension rolls the gold brickers of the officers' retired list and gives to my own comrades of the World War 75 percent of their program and gives to the Spanish War veterans 75 percent of what they had. I hope that the President will see his way clear to grant them this, but I am sure he would not grant the Senate amendment. Therefore I take for my comrades three quarters of a loaf when I know I cannot get them a whole loaf.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. McFARLANE].

EMERGENCY OFFICERS OF THE ARMY SHOULD BE TREATED AS FAIRLY AS THE SAME OFFICERS OF THE NAVY AND THE MARINE CORPS

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the statement the gentleman has just made in regard to emergency officers, let me say that the provisions of section 31 of this bill, as affected by the Senate amendment, makes it very difficult for emergency officers to get on the roll. Let us be fair with the emergency officers, as well as the enlisted men. Section 10 of the Selective Service Act of May 18, 1917, provides as follows:

That all officers and enlisted men of the forces herein provided for, other than the Regular Army, shall be in all respects upon the same footing as to pay, allowances, and pensions as officers and enlisted men of corresponding grades and length of service in the Regular Army.

This is the law under which all men entered the service. In spite of this provision of the law emergency officers were not retired on a parity with officers of the Regular Army. On June 4, 1920, an amendment was enacted by Congress having similar provisions as the amendment herein allowing emergency officers of the Navy and Marine Corps, disabled in line of duty and in line of service, to be retired on a parity with officers of the Regular Establishments. Now, why cannot we be fair about this matter and keep faith with all these men of the service by treating them all alike.

They must be service-connected cases. Under the law all but service-connected cases have already been taken off and are off the roll. Under these amendments these officers will be required to furnish more proof than is required to be furnished by any other veteran in the service. So do not be misled by the proposition; do not be deceived. Under the provisions of section 31 an emergency officer must have received his injury in line of duty, and it must be a matter of record on his service record before he can be considered service connected and entitled to retirement pay.

Further, gentlemen, we find ourselves in the parliamentary situation at this time which is rather perplexing. When this bill was originally before us, we did not do anything for the veterans. When it went over to the Senate, the Senate marched up the hill and put these amendments on the bill. They sent the bill back to us with these amendments, and we marched down the hill again. We sent it back to the Senate on yesterday, and the Senate has again refused to recognize our position—just as they did all last session on veterans' legislation. We put our neck into the noose every time. When are we going to stand on our own feet and vote our honest convictions? [Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD].

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I recognize that this is a difficult vote for every Member of the House. When I was assured this morning by the chairman of the subcommittee that the 10 percent would be restored anyway, I supported his stand in the matter. If I had thought otherwise, I would have voted to concur in the Senate amendment.

As far as the Borah amendment is concerned, it has no proper place in this part of the bill. I should be glad to join in the consideration of the advisability of retaining the cut in our own salaries in the legislative bill when it comes before us in a few days. Let us not put ourselves in the position of voting against the Taber amendment because of the implication of the Borah amendment; we are supposed to be voting on the veterans' restoration of benefits.

I desire to vote for the veterans, especially the Spanish War veterans; and I believe the Taber amendment is the sensible way to vote on the matter to really assure such restoration.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MOTT].

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, the chance for which we have been fighting here ever since March 1 has come. We are about to vote directly upon the motion to concur in the Senate amendments restoring full compensation to disabled veterans of the World War and reinstating the pension status of Spanish-American War veterans.

Whether this motion prevails or whether the House decides to insist upon the Taber amendment adopted day before yesterday, and which provides only for partial restoration, the disabled and the aged veterans of all wars have won an outstanding victory by our action here, for we have at least gained the opportunity to vote yes or no upon the Senate amendments—an opportunity which the administration leaders have sought heretofore to deny us.

The fate of these veterans is in your hands on this motion, and I have only one word now to say: That is to remind you that throughout this debate no one has advanced the argument that the Senate amendments give the disabled veteran too much and no one has contended that the pensions of Spanish War veterans should not be restored to the extent the Senate amendments provide.

The sole argument advanced against adoption of the Senate amendments is that if they are adopted, the President will veto the bill. As to that argument let me say this: Nobody knows what the President will do. He has not indicated what he will do. He has not authorized anyone to say for him here what he will do.

But the question here is not what the President might do. This motion is not before the President for decision. It is before us. And the sole question is whether we believe the veterans are entitled to the relief the Senate amendments provide.

I say that the Senate amendments which are before us now are fair and just, and I repeat that no legitimate argument has been advanced in this debate against any of them. Who, I ask you, has said anything about the amendments that would cause a single one of you to vote against them, except the bare assertion that if the Senate amendments are adopted the President will veto this bill? And as to that assertion I challenge not only its truth but I also challenge the right of any Member to make it, except as a statement of his own opinion. It is not legitimate debate. No evidence has been produced here as what the views of the President are upon this legislation.

And in this connection let me say further that no matter what the views of the President may or may not be, that is certainly no reason and no excuse for any Member of this body to vote against his own convictions when the roll is called on this motion. If the House of Representatives is to vote favorably only on that which the President shall approve of in advance, and if we are to be restrained, gagged, and subdued in our voting privilege by threats of a veto from the White House, then I say Congress had better adjourn permanently and go home. [Applause.]

The Senate amendments are not only fair and just; they are merciful as well. They take the cruelty and the inhumanity out of the Economy Act. You have the opportunity now for the first time to vote in favor of them. The great decisive moment for which the sick and disabled and the aged veterans have been waiting ever since the passage of the Economy Act is here. Let us not pass them by. Let us not give them less than they deserve. Let us vote for the Senate amendments. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN].

BORAH AMENDMENT

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, the Borah amendment provides that all salaries above $6,000 will have the 15-percent reduction, while the employees receiving a smaller sum will suffer no reduction. I am in favor of its going to conference, but I would make the maximum $2,500, and no restoration for salaries above this amount. In that event we will save some money.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I cannot yield.

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield the gentleman an additional minute. The gentleman knows that cannot possibly go through.

Mr. DOWELL. The gentleman's statement is incorrect.

Mr. PATMAN. We can regulate it so that the $7,000 employee will not have to take less than $6,000 and the $6,000 employee will continue to get $6,000. We can in some way, by a bill for that purpose or otherwise, arrange a graduated reduction, so that the $2,500 or $3,000 a year employee will not take any reduction at all, but all above that amount be compelled to take a graduated reduction that will be fair. This should go to conference. I refuse to yield further, because I want to talk about veterans.

VETERANS' PART OF BILL

Suppose we pass the bill as the Senate wants to pass it, and it should become a law. We will put back on the pension rolls practically every case that brought the veterans into disrepute before. We give our enemies the same weapons to slay us with that they had before the Economy Act. It will put all the willful misconduct cases back on the pension rolls. It will put the peace-time veterans, who did not serve during the war, back on the pension roll as war veterans. It will put the rich veterans back on the pension roll. It will put remarried widows back on the pension roll. It will put the retired emergency officers back on the roll, and they will receive from $106 to $416 per month. You cannot defend such proposals.

SHALL WE TAKE BAD TO GET GOOD?

Are you willing to put back all of these cases on the roll that brought the veterans into disrepute before in order to get something you want? I want these things you have been talking about. The American Legion's three points are not jeopardized in any way in the world if this bill is sent to conference. The conferees cannot accept less, so we are not going to lose the good provisions. The only provisions you have a chance to lose are the bad provisions, the ones that brought the veterans into disrepute before. If you want to help the veterans purge the pension rolls of all undeserving and unmeritorious cases, then just restore the deserving and meritorious cases and leave the others off the pension rolls and you will help the veterans of this country, but in no other way. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

DISABILITY-ALLOWANCE CASES

Mr. PATMAN. Under an amendment to the World War Veterans' Act July 3, 1930, any honorably discharged ex-service man who entered the service prior to November 11, 1918, and served 90 days or more during the World War, and who was suffering from a 25-percent or more permanent disability not the result of his own willful misconduct, and who did not pay an income tax the preceding year, was entitled to a disability allowance. In March 1933, 412,482 of these veterans were drawing an allowance, as follows: 272,399 for a 25-percent to 49-percent disability, $12 a month each; 92,377 for a 50-percent to 74-percent disability, $18 a month each; 21,343 for a 75-percent to 99-percent disability, $24 a month each; 26,363 for a total and permanent disability, $40 a month each. The average monthly payment was $15.75.

The act of March 20, 1933, or Public, No. 2, struck all these cases off the pension rolls except the total and permanent cases, and their rate of pay was reduced from $40 a month to $20 a month by regulation, but later raised to $30 a month by the House compromise in June 1933.

The bill before us now, the independent offices appropriation bill, does not in any way affect these cases. No amendment of either the House or Senate changes their pension status in any way.

SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR VETERANS

When Public, No. 2, was enacted in March 1933, pensions were being paid to 193,921 veterans of this war. All but about 25,000 were nonservice connected; 9,330 were receiving $20 a month, 19,984 were receiving $25 a month, 54,022 were receiving $35 a month, 60,948 were receiving $50 a month, 40,521 were receiving $60 a month, and 2,825 were receiving $72 a month. There were also on the pension roll at that time 38,797 widows, minor children, and dependents of veterans of this war—36,802 widows. Widows drew $30 a month regardless of whether their veteran husbands died of service-connected or non-service-connected disabilities.

PRESENT LAW, SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR

Present laws and regulations provide that these veterans who are totally and permanently disabled for a nonservice disability will receive $30 a month, the same as World War veterans disabled to the same extent. Those who are non-service connected and substantially disabled and in need will receive a minimum of $15 a month—World War veterans under the same facts receive nothing. Widows whose husbands died of non-service-connected disabilities will receive $15 a month—World War widows under the same facts receive nothing. Willful misconduct, after-war cases, and rich veterans are excluded.

SENATE AMENDMENTS, SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR

The Senate amendments to the pending bill restore all these veterans and their dependents to 90 percent of what they were receiving March 19, 1933, and put back on the pension roll the misconduct cases and cases of veterans who did not enlist until after the war was over and did not serve in either the Philippine insurrection or Boxer uprising. They also put back the remarried widows of these veterans which were stricken off by Public, No. 2.

HOUSE AMENDMENTS FOR SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR VETERANS

The House amendments restores these veterans and dependents to 75 percent of what they were receiving March 19, 1933, excepting willful misconduct cases, after-war cases, and remarried widows.

WHAT CAN BE DONE IN CONFERENCE

If the bill goes to conference, these veterans and dependents are assured of getting between 75 percent and 90 percent of what they were receiving March 19, 1933, but, of course, the willful-misconduct cases, after-war cases, and remarried widows may lose out.

SENATE VERSUS HOUSE PROVISIONS

I have prepared and am inserting herewith parallel columns, showing the effect of the Senate provisions in the first column and the House provisions in the second column.

Senate

House

WORLD WAR SERVICE-CONNECTED CASES (336,710 ON ROLL END OF 1933)

All these cases are restored to 100 percent of what they were receiving on March 19, 1933, prior to enactment of the economy bill.

These cases would not be disturbed. They would remain as provided by the Senate amendments. Cannot, therefore, be disturbed in conference.

HOSPITALIZATION—NONSERVICE CONNECTED AND SERVICE CONNECTED

Full hospitalization restored for both classes and provisions made for the payment of expenses to and from hospital, provided veteran unable to pay this expense and unable to pay for hospitalization, and in all cases for service connected, without reference to need.

This provision was not disturbed in any way and therefore cannot be disturbed in conference. Willful-misconduct cases entitled to hospitalization under present regulations which are not disturbed by either House or Senate.

PRESUMPTIVES—WORLD WAR VETERANS

All presumptives were restored 100 percent, which includes 29,000 World War veterans.

These cases would draw 75 percent of what they were drawing March 19, 1933, except the willful-misconduct cases, which are excluded from such benefits.

SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR VETERANS

Restored all Spanish-American War veterans and their dependents to 90 percent of what they were receiving March 19, 1933.

These veterans would receive 75 percent of what they were receiving March 19, 1933, and the same provision for widows and other dependents.

WILLFUL-MISCONDUCT CASES OR DISABILITIES FOR WHICH THE GOVERNMENT WAS IN NO WAY RESPONSIBLE

These cases were restored to the pension rolls and would receive up to $50 and $60 a month.

These cases were disallowed and not restored.

AFTER-WAR CASES OR VETERANS WHO DID NOT ENLIST UNTIL AFTER THE WAR WAS OVER

Tens of thousands of these cases would be back on the pension roll under Senate provisions, although they did not serve during any war and many of them only 70 days, although they enlisted after the war was over.

These cases were disallowed by the House provisions.

VETERANS WHO WORK FOR THE GOVERNMENT DRAWING LARGE SALARIES AND PENSIONS ARE FORCED TO FOREGO ALL EXCEPT $6 A MONTH OF THEIR PENSION CHECKS, EXCEPT FOR BATTLE CASUALTIES

This provision would have been repealed as to Spanish-American War veterans.

The House refused to concur and provided that they should take the reduction in such cases.

RETIRED EMERGENCY OFFICERS—WHERE THE PRINCIPLE IS RECOGNIZED OF GIVING A MAJOR WHO IS 30 PERCENT DISABLED $200 A MONTH AND AN ENLISTED MAN WHO WAS DISABLED IN THE SAME WAY AND TO THE SAME EXTENT $30

Between two and three thousand more of these officers would have been placed on the pension roll regardless of their wealth or income in addition to the 1,500 battle casualties now on the roll.

The House provisions would require them to accept the same benefits for the same disabilities as enlisted men who were accepted for service at the same time and discharged at the same time, except the 1,500 battle casualties will be permitted to retain all benefits now received.

REMARIED WIDOWS

The Senate restored to remarried widows of Spanish-American War veterans all pension rights the same as if they had never been remarried.

These cases were excluded.

Senate

House

FEDERAL EMPLOYEES PAY REDUCTION

Senate amendments provided full restoration of the 15 percent, except employees drawing more than $6,000 should continue to receive the 15-percent reduction.

The House provision provided for 5-percent restoration as of February 1, 1934, and 10 percent, or 5 percent additional, July 1, 1934, and permission to the President to restore the other 5 percent when the cost of living justified it.

The Borah amendment, making the maximum salary $6,000 that would carry no reduction, was wholly unfair and should have gone to conference for adjustment. According to it, the $7,000-a-year employee would draw $5,950 after taking this 15-percent reduction, whereas a $6,000-a-year employee would continue to get $6,000. If there is a limitation to be placed—and I do not object to it—the maximum amount that one can draw without such reduction should be $2,500 or $3,000. This will enable the Government to save some money. The Borah amendment would not include enough to pay the deficit 30 seconds. A graduated scale should be used.

BILL WOULD BE VETOED WITH SENATE AMENDMENTS

If the House had concurred in the Senate amendments, we know that the bill would have been vetoed and the President would have charged the House and Senate with sending him a bill for approval that put willful-misconduct veterans, after-war veterans, high-salaried veterans with non-service-connected disabilities, and remarried widows of veterans back on the pension roll, in addition to returning to the pension roll between two and three thousand emergency officers at rates ranging from $106 to $416 a month, each based upon the same disability that an enlisted man receives $30 a month for, and which they would receive without this law. We could not have justified our position.

DOING VETERANS' DISSERVICE

We will be doing the veterans of this country a disservice when we place back into the hands of their enemies the same weapons or some cases to destroy them with before the American people that they had before the enactment of the Economy Act in March 1933. My belief is that a real friend of the veterans should want to put back as many deserving and meritorious cases as possible, and not only make no effort to restore undeserving cases or grant special and unwarranted benefits to any veterans but should assist in purging the pension rolls of all cases that should not be on it.

VETERANS LOST GOOD WILL

The veterans lost much good will the last year or two, and they are not in a position to stand the additional loss that they would have to stand in the event of the Presidential veto of such a bill as the Senate proposed. Good will cannot be restored by placing undeserving veterans on the pension rolls.

THREE POINTS NOT JEOPARDIZED

Let it be remembered that by sending this bill to conference, you are in no way jeopardizing the American Legion's three points of their program, which includes service-connected veterans, hospitalization, and presumptives, except there is a possibility of it affecting a few of the presumptives if the House amendments are accepted in lieu of the Senate amendments.

If the bill is sent to conference, the Federal employees cannot possibly lose more than 5 percent and they have a chance of getting all the 15 percent restored.

WHAT IS REAL DIFFERENCE

After all, the fight between the House and Senate is on cases of veterans that cannot be defended before the people and the taxpayers except the possible 5-percent reduction for Federal employees. So when we know there is going to be a veto of a bill that we cannot sustain so many of its provisions, why would it not be better to eliminate these bad features and send the bill to the White House with some hope of approval?

In other words, if this bill goes to conference, we can expect a whole lot of something; if we send it to the White House as the Senate has amended it, we will get a whole lot of nothing. Of course, if we continue to fall out, wrangle, and disagree over veterans until June 30, then all Federal employees, including Members of Congress, will automatically have their pay restored 100 percent. Therefore it is in the interest of the Federal employees that there be no legislation along this line, as they will be helped by its failure by veto or otherwise, but while they are helped in that way all these veterans that are restored by both House and Senate amendments will get nothing.

CONCLUSION

We are driven to the conclusion that the most enthusiastic support for the adoption of the Senate amendments comes from groups that cannot hope to get back on the pension roll on their own merits, but their only hope is to get amendments making provisions for themselves attached to benefits for the deserving and then make an appeal for their adoption in toto.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who have spoken on this motion be given permission to revise and extend their own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts to recede from the House amendment to Senate amendment no. 22.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, on that I ask the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 189, nays 190, not voting 52, as follows:

 Mr. Haines with Mr. Kennedy of Maryland.
 Mr. Lewis of Maryland with Mr. Hughes.
 Mr. Kee with Mr. White.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call my name.

The Clerk called Mr. RAINEY's name, and he voted "no."

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, my colleague the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HAMILTON]—

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order against any announcement.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Wisconsin rise?

Mr. O'MALLEY. I rise to state that I endeavored to get a pair for my colleague who is absent and I want to state how he would have voted.

The SPEAKER. The statement of the gentleman is not in order.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Wisconsin is absent, and I was authorized to endeavor to get a pair—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not in order.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order against this explanation of a vote.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote "no."

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Chamber and listening when his name should have been called?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. No, Mr. Speaker; I was in attendance upon my duties with the Ways and Means Committee in an adjoining room.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not qualify.

The Chair will state to the House that the vote is so close the Chair thinks it ought to be recapitulated, and will not announce the vote until after it is recapitulated.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I understand the vote is close and is now about to be recapitulated?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct.

The Clerk will call the names of those Members voting in the affirmative.

The Clerk called the names of those voting in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now call the names of those voting in the negative.

The Clerk called the names of those voting in the negative.

Mr. GOSS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GOSS. Has the recapitulation been concluded?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, the announcement of the vote is the first thing in order, and I make the point of order that the gentleman is out of order.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is out of order.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order—

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, the first order is to announce the vote.

The SPEAKER. The vote is being checked now, the Chair will say to the gentleman.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that under the rules, before the vote is announced, any Member may change his vote.

Mr. DOWELL. Not after the recapitulation.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; that has been in the rules all the time, and there is precedent for holding up this vote now, pending recapitulation, in decisions by both Mr. Longworth and the Speakers who preceded him.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I desire to read a decision on the point.

The SPEAKER. The question has not been presented to the Chair at all.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I demand that the vote be announced.

The SPEAKER. It cannot be announced until the recapitulation is completed, and it has not been completed.

Mr. BLANTON. I tried that once, and made the same kind of a demand, and Mr. Speaker Longworth would not grant it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk is checking up on it now, and the Chair will announce the vote when the recapitulation is completed, and not before.

Mr. DOWELL. The Speaker announced that the recapitulation had been completed.

The SPEAKER. The mechanical matter of calling the names has been completed, and we are now checking up with the machines. When the Chair receives the result of the recapitulation, the Chair will at once announce it, and not before.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I desire to propound a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Under the rules of the House, may a Member change his vote before the result of the vote is announced?

The SPEAKER. At any time before the result of the vote is announced. The Chair will say that Mr. Speaker Gillett on June 1, 1920, held that a Member may change his vote at any time before the Chair announces the result.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire an announcement of the result of the roll call.

The SPEAKER. The House will not get the announcement until the Speaker gets the result from the tally clerk.

Mr. KENNEDY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know how I am recorded.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman voted "yea."

Mr. KENNEDY of New York. I desire to change that to "nay."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York changes his vote from "yea" to "nay", and will be so recorded.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to announce the vote. The yeas are 189 and the nays are 190.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded. On motion of Mr. BLANTON, a motion to reconsider the vote was laid on the table.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House insist on its amendment to Senate amendment no. 22.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. WOODRUM, Mr. BOYLAN, Mr. HASTINGS, Mr. GRANFIELD, Mr. WIGGLESWORTH, and Mr. GOSS.

TEMPORARY CONTRACTS FOR CARRYING THE MAILS

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H.R. 7966) to authorize the Postmaster General to accept and to use landing fields, men, and material of the War Department for carrying the mails by air, and for other purposes, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, has the gentleman consulted the Members of the minority side?

Mr. ROMJUE. I have. I consulted with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FOSS] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. BRUNNER, Mr. ROMJUE, Mr. HAINES, Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania, and Mr. FOSS.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I understand that Members who have spoken on the independent offices bill have permission to extend their remarks in the Record.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to print in the RECORD, in parallel columns, the difference between the House provisions and the Senate provisions.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

THE COTTON BILL

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 8402) to place the cotton industry on a sound commercial basis, to prevent unfair competition and practices in putting cotton into the channels of interstate and foreign commerce, to provide funds for paying additional benefits under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. HILL of Alabama in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to make a point of order against the committee amendment. I make the point of order that the committee amendment, on page 8, beginning after the word "agriculture", in line 20, extending down to and through the word "cotton", in line 4, page 9, is not in order, for the simple reason that it is not germane to the bill.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the point of order, if the Chair cares to hear me.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, this is strictly in line with the whole purpose of the bill. This is a tax measure. There are provisions in several different paragraphs providing for such tax and exemptions.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. RANKIN. But, Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard. There has been no debate on the amendment, and the RECORD shows it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that on page 4660, the Jones amendment was offered and the chairman of the committee even asked unanimous consent to limit debate on the amendment.

Mr. RANKIN. But the gentleman agreed that that would go over until today.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct as to the gentleman's agreement, but the point of order comes too late.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I should like to have some agreement with the gentleman from Texas with respect to time on this amendment. We discussed the matter of time yesterday. I am opposed to the amendment.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate upon this amendment and all amendments thereto be limited to 26 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that all debate upon the amendment and all amendments thereto close in 26 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the proponents of the amendment should be heard first.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I shall be glad to make a statement, but I want to be notified when I have used 2 minutes because I want to close the debate. I think it is fair, if these other boys go along with us on a program, that we ought to see that it does not interfere with their program. This does not require anything new of the man who is cooperating. Under the cotton contract, which all of those who have cooperated have signed, there is a provision which is substantially the same as this amendment. So the only thing that this amendment does it to get the chiseler, the man on the outside who is not willing to go along with his neighbor. This does not require anything that the man who is willing to go along with the program has not already signed. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. Jones] evidently has not studied the amendment. This is not an acreage reduction bill. It is a bale reduction bill. No man can plant any cotton, produce it, and sell it unless he is issued one of these certificates; and if he is issued one of these certificates, it gives somebody in the Department of Agriculture complete jurisdiction over his land as to what he shall plant upon it.

Let us see what it does. Here is a man, say, who has not signed up. By this you force that man to either come in under this act or not plant any cotton. If he plants one seed of cotton, then, before he can sell a bale, the representatives of the Agriculture Department can come in and say what he may raise on the rest of his own land. I will tell you what they are getting at and what the object of this is. It is to stop the development of the dairy industry in the South.

I live in a dairying country. The Congress and the Agricultural Department have asked us to diversify our farming down there, and we have done it. The object of this amendment is to keep us from raising dairy feed on this extra land, to feed to our dairy cattle, to produce dairy products that are sold on the market. The farmers of the South do not know what is in this bill. If they did, you would get a telegram of protest from every southern dairy farmer.

Mr. GILCHRIST. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU], who represents the dairymen of Wisconsin, wrote this amendment.

Mr. RANKIN. Of course he did, and he did it to arrest the dairy business in the South.

Mr. GILCHRIST. And does the gentleman say he is not a farmer and that his Wisconsin people are not farmers?

Mr. RANKIN. And he wants to put our Mississippi dairymen and the dairymen of Georgia and of Alabama, and other Southern States, out of business. I am not going along with any such measure. This measure would put my dairy farmers in a straitjacket and would say to them that they cannot raise dairy feed on their own land and feed it to their cows and produce dairy products to sell to the condensory or produce butter for the market.

Mr. ARENS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. ARENS. This bill will not curtail your dairying in the South. It will prevent you from expansion. You cannot expect us to let you raise dairy products on your unused land.

Mr. RANKIN. Of course, we are going to expand, and we are not going to anybody else to ask them whether we can engage in the dairy business or not. We have to pay taxes on all of our land, and yet you come along and say to us that you can stop us from planting corn or hay on that land and feeding it to our dairy cattle.

And what is the penalty? There is not a State in the Union that will send a man to the penitentiary for a misdemeanor, but under this bill if a farmer, in violation of one of these regulations, raises dairy feed and feeds it to his dairy cattle, and sells his milk, he is subject to a penalty of $5,000, or 2 years in jail, or both. That is the maximum. I am wondering if we are still in America. Have we abandoned all of our American policies and American principles?

Mr. WITHROW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. If that provision stays in the bill, in my humble opinion, it will never become a law, but if it does, it will defeat more southern Congressmen than any other measure that has gone through this House since I have been a Member of it.

We have gone along. We have plowed up our cotton. We complied with this program as best we could, and we are doing it now.

Our farmers think this is a bill to make every man who grows cotton come in. They do not know that you are penalizing them for producing more than is allotted, and attempting to sell it, and at the same time attempting to say to him what he shall produce on his own land and applying the most drastic penalties ever known, not for violating the law but for violating the regulation. This amendment should never be put in the bill, and if it is adopted the bill by all means should be defeated.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] admitted during his discussion that I had something to do with the writing of this amendment. I wish to say that I had suggested a similar amendment, but this is an amendment agreed upon in committee by all persons interested at the hearings. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] said that I wrote this amendment in an effort to destroy his dairy farms. The gentleman knows, and every Member of this House, I believe, knows that we up in the Middle West are just as anxious to protect the cotton farmers as we are to have the southern farmers cooperate in protecting us. We have no idea of trying to destroy your dairy farms down in Mississippi. I wonder if you have any thought that there is any effort on the part of those of us in the Middle West to injure in any way any type of agricultural enterprise being carried on in the South. We want to help you. Many of us are going along with you on this cotton bill; but there is one thing we do demand—and we feel we are in the right and only asking justice when we do demand it—and that is this, we do not want you to reduce your cotton production with governmental assistance and then go ahead and increase your production of other commodities in competition with us. Is there anything unfair about that? I appeal to the fair-mindedness of the Members of this House. Is there anything unfair in that proposal? The gentleman said we are trying to destroy his dairy farming. There is not one word in this bill that would tend to have you decrease your production of dairy commodities or anything else. You can go ahead and carry on your farming operations just as you do now. We are simply asking protection from some of the chisellers down in your section—that they do not expand their production of other commodities. We will cooperate with you. We ask you to cooperate with us. That is all we ask. We do not want you to expand your production of dairy products and other commodities in competition with us.

Mr. BEAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. I yield.

Mr. BEAM. That was the purpose of the amendment, to protect the northern growers of corn and wheat and dairy products, so that they will not be in competition?

Mr. BOILEAU. That is it exactly. This is not only a dairy proposition. There are certain sections of the State of Texas, for instance the Panhandle region, where vast areas of land can be interchangeably used for wheat and cotton. If you compel those people to curtail their production of cotton, what is there to prevent them from going into the production of wheat? We want to prevent that. If there is any sense at all in this program, we have to make it a national program. We cannot legislate for the cotton people alone and forget everybody else and ruin all the rest of the farmers. We ask only that which we are entitled to, and that is that if we go along with you and give our support to this bill, to protect the producer of cotton, you must not be put in a position where you can chisel. No Member of Congress should come here and say that the cotton people should chisel any more than anybody else. I have confidence in the men from the South and believe that they will accept this amendment, an amendment that was accepted in the Committee on Agriculture. I would not say it was unanimously accepted in the committee. I do not recall whether there was a roll call or not. At least, after thrashing this matter out, we agreed upon this amendment, and I do not recall of any opposition to the amendment as finally adopted.

Mr. GLOVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. I yield.

Mr. GLOVER. The gentleman certainly remembers that I did not favor this amendment?

Mr. BOILEAU. In the beginning there was some opposition, but after we made some changes and perfected the amendment I do not recall that there was any serious opposition. I certainly did not want to misquote anybody. I know the gentleman must have taken that position or he would not say so. I do not recall any concerted opposition.

Mr. FULMER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. I yield.

Mr. FULMER. There is nothing in this amendment that would prevent any farmer in the South growing any crop that he can make use of himself, but this is to prevent him making any crop that will be put on the market.

Mr. BOILEAU. That is all. He cannot increase his production. He does not have to reduce his production of dairy products or other farm products, but he cannot increase it.

Mr. JONES. I have a copy of the contract signed by cotton producers. The Secretary issues the regulations about the use of the land. The land is really leased by the Government. They paid in Lee County, Miss., $7.83 an acre for letting that land remain out of production. They were permitted to use it for certain crops, but those who cooperate in the program have all signed an agreement not to extend and not to use it for a nationally competitive crop. So this does not hurt them at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment must remain in the bill if we are to protect the producers of other crops in this country. Yet, at the same time the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] is absolutely right in what he says, as to what the effect of the amendment will be. There is a difference in the effect of a violation of a voluntary contract and what will happen to a man if he violates any regulation which the Secretary may make under this provision of the bill, because the contract simply provides that if a man violates it, that is ground for cancellation.

The Secretary can cancel the agreement and compel the man to repay any benefit payments he has received; but under this legislation the Secretary can make any regulations he desires to compel the producer who gets a certificate of exemption to comply with the crop-reduction program, and if the man violates the regulations, then he is subject to a $5,000 fine or 2 years' imprisonment. This is the difference between the two proposals.

Now, I do say that if you are going to pass this legislation, this provision must stay in if you are going to protect the producers of other crops; and the provision itself is certainly an illustration of the difficulties that you get into when you try to pass legislation like this.

Fears have been expressed by myself and others that eventually the attempt will be made to apply similar legislation to all crops; and this illustrates what is likely to happen, for without passing any other legislation you are going to apply what amounts to compulsion to the production of all crops that may be grown in the cotton section of the country. If you are going to limit the expansion of dairying in the South by law, then, sooner or later you will be compelled to limit by law the expansion of dairying in the North. So, as I say, this is the best illustration I can think of to show what we are getting into when we start passing legislation of this kind.

I hope the amendment will not be stricken out; for it must stay in if we are to protect the producers of other commodities; but if it does stay in, some of you are going to face rather embarrassing situations when you go back to your districts.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. I yield.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Is it not true that under the Agricultural Adjustment Act the violation of any regulation promulgated by the Secretary of Agriculture is punishable by a fine upon conviction?

Mr. HOPE. Yes; I think so, but only to the extent of a maximum fine of $100.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I am sure it is.

Mr. HOPE. That may be true, but the violation of a provision in a crop-reduction contract is not punishable by a fine.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I respectfully submit as a lawyer that that is merely supplementary to and part of the provisions of criminal law we pass here.

Mr. HOPE. I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. I yield.

Mr. BOILEAU. Is not the farmer getting paid for the reduction he makes under the Agricultural Adjustment Act; and does he not agree not to enter into competition with other commodities?

Mr. HOPE. That is true.

Mr. BOILEAU. And this merely compels the chiselers and the noncooperators to come under the same provisions.

Mr. HOPE. The difference between the two is that under this provision a man can be put in jail for what amounts to violating a contract.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

I said the other day that this was a good bill and that I would support it if the cotton farmers of the South wanted it. The purpose is, in part at least, to prevent chiseling. Now, I do not want the cotton farmers of the South to say, "We do not want to chisel against each other; we do not want to scab against each other; but we want to scab against the farmers in other sections or those who raise other products." That is what they will be doing if they strike out this amendment.

I hold in my hand the contract the corn farmer enters into. It goes to great length in providing that the signer shall not compete with anybody in the United States in the raising of other commodities; and if we are going to have a reduction program at all, then the corn farmers ought to agree to the program and not do the very thing that he does not expect others to do.

Here are the regulations in pamphlet form; they are too long for me to read, but from them you will find that the corn farmer cannot raise anything on his idle acreage except practically the things he uses for domestic consumption on his farm.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILCHRIST. I yield.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Is it not true under this bill that the dairy farmer anywhere in the United States can raise what he wishes for consumption on his own farm?

Mr. GILCHRIST. I understand that it is true in most every section I know of.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILCHRIST. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman does not mean that, surely; for if the dairy farmer sells dairy products, then it could be said that the crop he raises on his idle acres and feeds to his cattle, consumes on his premises, does enter into competition with other commodities; that he will then be violating a regulation of the Department and be subject to a penalty of $5,000 and imprisonment.

Mr. GILCHRIST. But, as I understand, the dairy farmer cannot do that. That is true also of the corn farmer. He cannot chisel against another farmer; the corn farmer cannot chisel against the wheat farmer. He should not be put in the position where he can go to the wheat farmer and say, "I will reduce my corn acreage, but I am going to put this land into wheat." That would be despicable. Who wants to do that? Surely the cotton farmer does not. He has asked us to help in this great program. We have all joined hands together. We do not expect to chisel against the men who raise wheat, and we do not expect the men who raise wheat to scab against the men who raise corn. Farmers cannot be allowed to say, "We will withdraw this acreage from one crop but we are going to do whatever we please with such acreage."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILCHRIST. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In order that there may be no misunderstanding about the situation, is it not provided in this contract that the land withdrawn from the cultivation of cotton, for which the farmers are paid a rent, can be used for the production of anything, provided it does not increase the normal production of the farm?

Mr. GILCHRIST. That is the purpose of it. There are dozens of provisions in the corn contract. Here is what the corn farmers agree to. I have not time to read this contract.

May I say to the cotton farmers of the South, "Let us get together, let us join hands and put the farmers of the whole country in a condition of prosperity, success, and happiness. Do not scab one against the other." If that is the purpose of those who are going to raise cotton, then we might as well know it this afternoon, March 16, 1934. Let us be honest and fair with one another.

Mr. BUSBY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILCHRIST. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. BUSBY. Cotton is our main money crop. Who is going to pay the taxes on our land? Are you gentlemen going to provide some way to pay our taxes?

Mr. GILCHRIST. You are going to pay taxes on the land because you will have an increased sum of money for your crop over what you have been getting heretofore at 4 or 5 cents a pound. You will get 12 cents or 15 cents a pound under this bill. That is where you are going to get the money to pay your tax. You will get it in the same way that the wheat or corn or dairy farmer gets it in order to pay his taxes.

Mr. BUSBY. That is all theory and not fact.

Mr. GILCHRIST. I cannot allow the gentleman to take the small amount of time I have at my disposal. The purpose of this bill is to make the cotton farmer more prosperous.

Mr. BUSBY. I am glad to see Iowa so solicitous of the farmers of the South.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Iowa is solicitous about any farmer anywhere. I made the statement the other day that we were for this bill. We want all bills that will help the farmers.

Mr. BUSBY. Some of us who are mixed up in the cotton business are not for it, because it is robbery—

Mr. GILCHRIST. I have not yielded to the gentleman to make a speech, but I resent that insinuation. This is not robbery. It is not worthy of the gentleman as I said the other day that we are for everything that will produce prosperity for the farmer wherever he may be.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. Every man the Chair has recognized so far has been in favor of the amendment except myself. I think the gentleman from Mississippi ought to be heard and the time equally divided.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have 5 minutes, not to be included in the time previously agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, my conduct has been such as to never reflect upon the integrity or good intention of any gentleman who happens to be a Member of the House. I am sorry to see a gentleman lose his head and sense of fair play to such an extent that he proceeds to call people in other sections of the country "scabs", "chiselers", and everything else, while he is trying to take care of his own hide. I do not like that kind of a spirit. I hope I may never degrade into that character of debater while I remain in this House.

May I say that I come from the State of Mississippi, which used to be the greatest cotton-producing State in the country. I see in this bill a confiscation of the rights of the people, of the property of the people, and of the use of that property which the people have bought with their own labor and their own sweat and which they are now about to turn over to the Secretary of Agriculture under the direction of the gentleman from Iowa and others who take the same view of what is best for us that he does. I do not think it is necessary to drift into this type of insinuation and accusation.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. I gladly yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GILCHRIST. I understood the gentleman to say that I had some rather insidious purpose in supporting this cotton bill.

Mr. BUSBY. Yes.

Mr. GILCHRIST. The gentleman said that I had some interest in the cotton bill.

Mr. BUSBY. I believe the gentleman has. I think it comes indirectly. If you prevent us from using our dairy facilities, the dairy facilities of the gentleman's section will profit by reason of the added field. That is my conception of it.

Mr. GILCHRIST. May I say to the gentleman that such a statement on his part concerning me is not warranted, and that is all I stated before.

Mr. BUSBY. I will take the gentleman's word for it.

Mr. GILCHRIST. I may say to the gentleman it is not worthy of him to make that kind of a statement.

Mr. BUSBY. The gentleman is getting back into his own element now, when he talks that way.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. If the farmers cannot raise peanuts, corn, wheat, hogs, or dairy feed on their land, I am rather interested to know what their money crop may be? What can be produced down there in the gentleman's section?

Mr. BUSBY. I do not know myself. I see confiscation of hundreds of acres of our land for taxes because of the operation of this bill.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Busby] and I represent what is known as the "Lime Belt" area of the State of Mississippi. Our two districts probably produce more dairy products than all the rest of the State put together. We have tried everything and have found that the only thing our farmers can make any money out of, outside of cotton, is the dairy industry.

Mr. BUSBY. May I say that we have a cheese plant in my town? I went to Chicago with other gentleman to interest people in the establishment of this cheese plant. We paid for it. I am against any proposal which says to the little farmer: "If you use your family and your own labor in producing and selling a perfectly usable crop, we will put you in jail and keep you there, and will contaminate you with such words as 'chiseler', 'scab', and everything else." I resent these insinuations.

Mr. BOILEAU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. No. I have not time. I do not think this legislation is worthy of my vote. It may be worthy of yours.

Mr. DOXEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. DOXEY. Has the gentleman anything to offer that will help the cotton farmer? If so, we will be glad to have the gentleman's recommendations.

Mr. BUSBY. I just have the hope that the farmer may remain out of jail after the passage of this law. That is enough for me.

Mr. DOXEY. Is the gentleman opposed to the farmer getting the benefits he has under the Agricultural Adjustment Act?

Mr. BUSBY. I do not know how to answer that, because I do not know much about the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

Mr. DOXEY. Is not the gentleman just beginning to learn something about this bill?

Mr. BUSBY. Well, I do not know much about it and I do not think the committee knows much about it, and they admit they do not know much about how this will work.

Mr. DOXEY. Does the gentleman know how it will apply?

Mr. HOPE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. I yield.

Mr. HOPE. Does not the gentleman think that the voluntary plan of cotton control is working effectively?

Mr. BUSBY. It works with the approval of the farmer and with his consent and not by compulsion—this bill has compulsion to the limit. Fines, jail sentences, and the penitentiary. This bill provides a method of taking away from the owners of farms the control of those farms and places the control of them in officers here in Washington. Woe unto the little farmers under such a law and such management. Farmers are to be put in the jails and penitentiary if they violate regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture. Our law making has reached a terrible state. Freedom of personal action is being legislated away. People and their freedom count for nothing.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition.

Mr. Chairman, I hope the members of the Committee will listen. This is a tempest in a teapot and much ado really about nothing.

Mr. BUSBY. Now, who said that?

Mr. JONES. I hope the gentleman will be willing to listen.

Mr. BUSBY. I will listen. I do not think I will follow you, though.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman and his colleagues, who are good friends of mine and for whom I have high regard, have simply misconstrued this amendment. There is no criminal penalty attached to this amendment. It simply says that "no certificate of exemption shall be issued and no allotment shall be made to any producer unless he agrees to comply with such conditions and limitations", and so forth, as to the expansion of his program. This is all. It simply means he cannot get his exemption certificate unless he agrees to the conditions laid down by the Secretary. The penalty provision is in an entirely different part of the bill and applies only in the event a man violates the regulations issued by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. RANKIN. Under this act.

Mr. JONES. If the gentleman will turn over to page 17, he will find that any person who violates any provision of this bill or any regulation promulgated under this bill, or who willfully fails to pay any tax imposed under this act, is subject to a criminal penalty; but this is just a case of violation of a contract. In this instance he has simply made a contract. In other words, in order for a man not to be subject to a forfeiture of his contract and in order for him to be able to get his allotment certificates, he must practically agree that he will not violate what his neighbors have signed and agreed that they will not violate. If he does not comply with this, he simply forfeits his chance to get his contract.

I do not think there is any question about this construction, but, in order to make it perfectly clear that this is the meaning, I have consulted with the drafting service and I have consulted with several other lawyers, and while they all agree with me that this is simply a question of a violation of the contract and not a penal provision, in order to be sure, I am willing to put this sort of amendment in the bill if it will satisfy the gentleman:

Page 9, line 4, insert after the period: "And the allotment of and certificates of exemption issued to any producer shall be subject to revocation on violation by him of such conditions and limitations."

Mr. RANKIN. That will not cure it. If the gentleman will yield, he is entirely wrong.

Mr. JONES. I do not see how in the world that could leave any doubt about the matter, because, for instance, if you draw a contract to buy a piece of land, there may be a lot of damages for violation of that contract, but if you write into the contract that if the man refuses to take the land he shall forfeit $500 as liquidated damages, that is all the damages you can get. The gentleman knows this is correct, and if we put in here, in order to make it perfectly sure, that he simply forfeits his rights under the contract, that is all the penalty that can attach. I am perfectly willing for this to be made clear just so you do not write over the whole page.

Mr. RANKIN. Let us just vote down the amendment and not accept it.

Mr. JONES. Now, listen. The neighbors of the men who are going along on these certificates have all signed that they will not increase production. We cannot legislate for two counties in Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. I understand that.

Mr. JONES. And most of your people in those counties have signed these contracts.

Mr. RANKIN. Certainly, and they are willing to comply with them.

Mr. JONES. They do the same thing and now let us make the 5 percent who are on the outside do the fair thing.

Mr. RANKIN. But you are subjecting them to the drastic penalties of this bill for what they do on their own land.

Mr. JONES. I make the statement here, and I hope it will be so construed, that the penalty clauses do not apply to this amendment.

Mr. RANKIN. They do apply.

Mr. JONES. And I am willing, if the gentleman is not satisfied, to have him suggest something further that will satisfy him before this measure gets through conference and I will put in a clause that will assure him that the penalty provisions do not apply.

Mr. RANKIN. All I want is to strike out this amendment, so far as this section is concerned.

Mr. JONES. I wish the gentleman would lift up his eyes and get a vision of this country beyond the limits of any single State.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES: Page 9, line 4, before the period, insert "and the allotment of and certificates of exemption issued to any producer shall be subject to revocation on violation by him of such conditions and limitations."

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, may I offer an amendment to the amendment that the penalties shall not apply?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HILL of Alabama). The Chair will advise the gentleman from Mississippi that the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] is an amendment to the committee amendment which is now pending. Therefore, any further amendment would be an amendment in the third degree and not in order.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I am willing to ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may add "no further penalties shall apply."

Mr. RANKIN. And that none of the penalties provided in this bill or the regulations issued thereunder shall apply to them.

Mr. JONES. Oh, no; just have a provision that no criminal penalties shall apply to a violation of this section.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be modified as indicated by the gentleman from Texas. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, all pro forma amendments are withdrawn.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, in the furor and melee, I promised the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Brown] that he might be recognized for 2 minutes, and I ask unanimous consent that he have 2 minutes now.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I sympathize with the members of the Agricultural Committee. They have had a difficult task. I was interested in the able speech of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Doxey], who was perfectly fair and made a splendid presentation of the bill. He wanted suggestions that would be helpful to the cotton producers of the South.

I think the Committee on Agriculture made a grave mistake in placing this amendment, known as the "Boileau amendment", in the Bankhead bill.

I want the members of the Committee on Agriculture to know that we appreciate their untiring efforts in trying to bring out a bill which would be acceptable to the Members of the House and at the same time be very helpful to the cotton growers of the South. My good friend, Mr. FULMER, one of the outstanding men of his State, as well as Mr. JONES, the chairman, and many other members of the Agriculture Committee, have been perfectly fair in their discussion of the many provisions of this bill and have invited criticism. Opposing this amendment is no reflection upon these gentlemen. I am quite sure that the people of my district are not thoroughly familiar with this amendment, as it was not in the Bankhead bill when submitted to the committee.

This amendment seeks not only to reduce cotton production but provides for a compulsory restriction of other crops in land taken out of cotton production, with a penalty if not complied with. Therefore I question the enforcement of this particular amendment. I am certainly opposed to any law which cannot be enforced.

I expect to support the Bankhead bill, but I am sure it is a mistake to adopt this amendment. More support would be gained for the bill by striking out this amendment than by allowing it to remain in the bill. I shall vote to strike out this Boileau amendment.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to speak for 2 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES. Does the gentleman want to speak on this amendment?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Yes. I am very much interested in it.

There was no objection.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Chairman, it is my purpose, and the purpose of some of my people, to go along with you on this cotton bill. We are going to support this bill. It was worked out in committee. Of course, if we are going to have everybody who does not plant cotton go into the dairy business and into some other line that is going to put our people out of business, up there with their huge barns and large money investment, we could not support a bill like this. It would be impossible for us to do it. While we want to do what is right for the cotton people of the South, yet we could not support the bill under such circumstances. If we can give the people down there more money through this bill for their cotton, then why should they want to go into lines of endeavor that our people are forced to follow to make a living up in the North. I have always had great respect for the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BUSBY], as well as the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN]. They talk about the taxes. When we sign up on a corn or wheat program we cannot plant anything on that land. We have to pay taxes also, and we figure that we get benefits through the increased price of wheat and various other things.

Mr. RANKIN. Oh, I would not vote for a bill that would prevent the gentleman from planting corn or wheat.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. But we cannot plant other stuff on that land. We are supposed to let the land lie idle, so that we will not flood the market with other things. I hope the gentleman can vote for this amendment and keep it here, so that we can go along with them on the rest of the bill.

The amendment passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the committee amendment as amended.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 7. (a) The amount of cotton allotted to any county pursuant to section 5 (b) shall be apportioned by the Secretary of Agriculture to farms on which cotton has been grown within such county. Such allotments to any farm shall be made upon application therefor, and may be made by the Secretary based upon—

(1) A percentage of the average annual cotton production of the farm for a fair representative period; or

(2) By ascertaining the amount of cotton the farm would have produced during a fair representative period if all the cultivated land had been planted to cotton, and then reducing such amount by such percentage (which shall be applied uniformly within the county to all farms to which the allotment is made under this paragraph) as will be sufficient to bring the total of the farm allotments within the county's allotment; or

(3) Upon such basis as the Secretary of Agriculture deems fair and just, and will apply to all farms to which the allotment is made under this paragraph uniformly, within the county, on the basis or classification adopted.

(b) After the crop year 1934-35 the apportionment shall not be on the basis set out in paragraph (1) of subsection (a) of this section.

(c) The total allotment to farms in each county under this section shall not exceed the approximate number of bales allotted to that county under section 5 (b).

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. HOPE. O Mr. Chairman, half a dozen gentlemen are on their feet and would like to discuss this section.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 24 minutes, and that each of these gentlemen who have risen be allowed 4 minutes, and that I be allowed 1 minute in which to conclude.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I hope I shall not take the time of the Committee too long. I have had great respect since I have been in Congress for the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BUSBY]. I have followed his advice on many things, especially his monetary ideas, and I may do so in the future, but it seems to me that this afternoon he has persistently tried to misrepresent what I intend to say to the Committee.

Mr. BUSBY. O Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order and make the point of order against the type of argument that the gentleman is now using. He is accusing me of persistently trying to misrepresent him.

Mr. GILCHRIST. I say the gentleman misconstrued what I attempted to say to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa will proceed in order.

Mr. GILCHRIST. I shall try to do that. This bill is good or bad, just according to whether or not the farmers can get into an arrangement to prevent excessive production. If one section of the country wants to go ahead and raise excessively against another section, then the bill should be killed. If, however, the purpose is to join hands and all of us try to help each other, then the bill, it seems to me, should be voted up. That is as much as I tried to say. I repeat that no section of the country ought to chisel against another section of the country. Neither should any section of the country seek by virtue of this bill to take land out of production for the purposes of cotton and then put it into production for the purpose of competing with some other basic commodity. That is exactly what I said on the floor and what I intended to say, and I think the gentleman from Mississippi is mistaken as to what I said or intended to say. Let that go into the RECORD as my statement of it.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Mr. Chairman, for benefit of the RECORD I read the following from the Washington Post of this morning, Friday, March 16:

WHEAT TUMBLES ON SINKING OF SILVER PRICES—MORGENTHAU STAND CATCHES MARKET SHORT OF BUYERS; ALL GRAINS LOSE

CHICAGO, March 15.—Jolted by downward plunges of the silver market, wheat prices underwent a material break today.

Word that Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau was opposed to any silver legislation at this time gave a decidedly unsettled impulse to wheat prices.

And from another column in the same issue, I read:

STOCKS REACT 1.4 POINTS ON SILVER SLUMP—MINING ISSUES UNLOADED AS SALES TOTAL RISES TO 1,355,780 SHARES

NEW YORK, March 15.—Weakness of silver stocks spread to other sections of the market today and the closing averaged more than a point lower.

Trading was very dull until the last hour, when speculative holdings of some mining issues were unloaded following the break in silver prices, which had obviously been prompted by Secretary Morgenthau's expressed opposition to further change in the Government's silver policy.

The administration is to be most highly commended for its efforts to return commerce and industry to a condition where the pressing problems of human employment can be solved. But there is one industry, one of the most basic of all industries which occupies the unfortunate role of the forgotten man. That is the industry of mining. The Nation will never become truly prosperous unless we enact legislation to benefit all of its component parts. I read again from the morning paper:

Wheat tumbles on sinking of silver prices.

Help the mining industry and you help every other industry. I hope that this thought can be borne most impressively to the mind of the Secretary of the Treasury.

A further blow to the recovery of the mining industry is threatened in the cryptic proposals for trading with other countries in regard to tariffs. If the tariff proposals now pending before the Ways and Means Committee are adopted, they should certainly include a proviso that no influx of foreign metals should be permitted in pursuit of an expanded foreign market for other commodities.

This statement is made not in a spirit of criticism but as background for a definite program which I here present. Briefly it is proposed that, in order to increase employment in the mineral industries without increasing stocks of metals available for sale, the Government shall purchase at current market prices newly mined metals, except gold, silver, and iron, produced by any domestic mining operation, which, after specific authorization by the Government, shall have produced the metal eligible for Government purchase, by hiring a specified number of unemployed workers, corresponding to requirements for production of the metal to be purchased by the Government; and that such newly mined metal shall be delivered to the Army for storage subject to use or sale only in event of a war emergency and after declaration of war by the United States; provided, that the total quantity of any metal thus purchased by the Government shall not exceed that deemed necessary to meet the national needs of the first year of a major conflict, based upon the actual requirements in 1918.

The phrase "without increasing stocks of metals available for sale" is probably the most important wording with respect to requirements for a sound project. The specific means of preventing such an increase of stocks for sale is indicated in the statement that the metals stored by the Army shall not be "subject either to use or sale until after declaration of war." The necessity for this arises from the well-understood effect of stocks in depressing prices. If, for example, stocks of metal were merely removed from the market in any temporary way, subject to resale at an indefinite time to be determined by some agency, the Government stocks would be regarded by the public as overhanging the market. They would accordingly increase the difficulty of effecting recovery of prices, which is, in turn, a necessity for the re-establishment of more normal employment in mining. Hence, if the new stocks produced on behalf of the Government are not rendered absolutely fixed, they will ultimately prove detrimental, as was the case in respect to cotton and wheat, removed temporarily from the market by the Government.

Likewise forbidding the use of these stocks for current requirements of the Government is necessary, because if they were so used they would be represented by an equivalent quantity of metal remaining in market stocks that otherwise would have been withdrawn. The production increase sponsored by the Government would, therefore, gradually be shifted into market stocks. It is obvious, furthermore, that the purpose in respect to national defense would also be defeated, as reserve stocks subject to indefinite depletion could not be reckoned upon with sufficient assurance.

The report of the Secretary of War for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, on page 53, states:

A reserve of material sufficient to last for a war of at least 2 years' duration must be provided.

On page 60 a list of strategic raw materials needed for such a reserve is given, and includes tungsten, quicksilver, manganese, antimony, chromium, and other items.

In order to emphasize the legislative importance of the proposal just made I herewith append for insertion in the RECORD a list of names of 103 Members of this Congress in whose districts lie dormant mining industries, together with a notation of various metals mined therein which are needed for Government reserve stocks, such as recommended by the Secretary of War.

The original source of all wealth is from the soil, and when real money is so scarce that the selling price of the basic things from the soil long remains below the cost of production, a national collapse is inevitable.

SILVER INVESTIGATION DEMANDED

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I am offering the resolution which I propose to introduce, and I would like to have it read by the Clerk as a part of my remarks in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the resolution will be read by the Clerk.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolution

Whereas the Secretary of the Treasury is quoted in the public press as having stated that the Treasury Department has been making an investigation into the silver holdings of advocates of silver legislation and had found them not entirely disinterested and has given expression to other views indicating his belief that advocates of silver legislation are speculatively interested in silver stocks and the silver market; and

Whereas the expression of these views by the Secretary of the Treasury is prejudicial to silver legislation now pending in Congress and is calculated although not intended, to reflect upon Members of Congress who have identified themselves with such legislation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be and he is hereby requested to appear before the Committee of the House on Coinage, Weights, and Measures in executive session and impart to said committee any information in his possession or in the possession of the Treasury Department supporting or tending to support his said statement and including the names of any persons who are interested both in silver legislation and silver speculation, together with the nature and extent of their activities.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, in addition to the statements in the resolution, I want to quote in my time two brief paragraphs that appeared in a morning Washington paper. It refers to a visit made to the Secretary of the Treasury by members of the House Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and after they left the Secretary's office the newspaper says:

Following the visit of the committee members, Morgenthau revealed that the Treasury Department had been making an investigation into the silver holdings of advocates of silver legislation and had found them not entirely disinterested.

Morgenthau said the purpose of the Government's investigation of the ownership of silver speculative stocks on the New York market was frankly for the purpose of determining whether silver advocates were silver speculators. He said the report had not been completed and may never be made public.

Mr. Chairman, my resolution, in my opinion, is a highly privileged resolution, because the Secretary's statement may be construed as reflecting not only discreditably—it may be permissible—on a great national issue pending before the two House of Congress, but more especially on those Members of Congress who are pressing this legislation. Who are considered the silver advocates in this country? Is it a bunch of unknown speculators, if there are such people, over in Wall Street? If you saw a statement in the paper without giving any names, referring to the leading silver advocates of the United States, what names would you think of? Inevitably you would think of the names of certain Senators and Representatives right in this Capitol Building. I do not feel that it reflects personally on me, perhaps, but my case illustrates the situation. I made a talk on the radio for half an hour on the silver question recently, on which I received a large number of favorable responses.

Now, supposing some of these people or others of the many thousands listening in, pick up a daily paper and read the statement attributed to the Secretary that the Government is conducting an investigation determining whether silver advocates are silver speculators. Might not these people well say, that fellow is from Colorado, a silver State, and maybe he is boosting his own game, thus destroying in their minds whatever of good my talk might have done a cause which is growing every day.

My own people would not suspect me, because they know I am not financially able to speculate in silver; and in fact I never made a dollar in silver mining or in silver stocks in my life and have not a penny's worth of interest in either mines or stocks. Indeed, I am only interested in the revival of silver mining incidentally as the Representative of a State having silver resources. My chief interest in silver is that it may be permanently restored to its rightful place in the monetary system of the country. I am a bimetalist for principle and not for profit, but these multiplied thousands of listeners do not know this and do not know me. It would be a matter of everlasting regret to me if I knew that a single one of them suspected my good faith.

Just now there is a decided silver movement in Congress. How easy it would be to excite a wave of prejudice against the movement and its sponsors by even a mere suggestion from the highest monetary official in the Government that speculative private profit was its mainspring. Silver has been the victim of false propaganda for a century. It appears to be emerging. It is nearer recognition and restoration to its rightful place as primary money than at any other time since its demonetization 60 years ago. It would be nothing short of tragic if a discrediting and unintended statement were now to throw a cloud over the issue and discredit the men who from the best of motives are fighting the battle.

I do not believe that the Secretary had in mind Senators and Representatives in Congress when he said he was carrying on an investigation to determine whether silver advocates were silver speculators. But the conclusion is almost inescapable, and irreparably damaging, and every advocate of silver in Congress feels it to be so. It fell like a wet blanket on warm hopes.

If the investigation thus far involves no Members of Congress, this fact should be as widely published as the original statement. If there are Members involved, they should be exposed. The facts, whomever or whatever they involve, should be laid before the committee. This is all the more urgent when it is stated in the interview that the report of the investigation "may never be made public." If it is never made public, it will forever remain a cloud on silver. The demonetization of silver is commonly referred to as "the crime of '73." Now, just when it appears that this crime is in process of being at least partially righted, silver, it is felt by every Member advocating its restoration, is dealt a most damaging blow.

Mr. Chairman, I am sure every Member of Congress courts the fullest investigation of his acts and motives with regard to his activities for silver. They can only be vindicated by the fullest disclosure. The Committee on Rules ought to report a rule bringing this resolution before the House for immediate consideration, and I urgently request such action and urge all other Members similarly affected to join in the request. Let there be light.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I rise to call attention to the provisions of this bill providing for individual allotments to be made to cotton producers. There are three different methods of allotment which are provided for, and it seems to me it does not matter which method is used; we are going to have trouble.

We found in the wheat section that when an allotment was made to a county or a State, based upon past production, that the applications and figures of producers applying for allotments showed a much larger acreage and production than was indicated by the Government figures upon which the State and county allotments were based. Therefore, there was not enough acreage and production to give each producer what he felt he should have. You will have exactly the same thing when it comes to producing cotton. The consequence is that most of the producers will be dissatisfied with the allotment which is given them. More than that, any method of allotment which is used, as provided in this bill, will work a hardship upon some class of producers. If you use the first plan, you will freeze cotton production to the farms where it has been produced during the past 5 years. If you use the second method, you will provide that farms which have never produced any cotton and which were never intended to produce any cotton, will have a cotton allotment, and the farmer who is operating that farm can sell his cotton allotment for such price as he may get for it to the man who owns a cotton farm and who can grow only cotton, and who must, under that plan, pay tribute to his neighbor in such amount as the neighbor agrees to exact.

Under the third plan you leave it entirely up to the Secretary of Agriculture to make the allotment. Let us not forget, as my colleague from Kansas [Mr. McGugin] stated the other day, we have in the Department of Agriculture a man who has frequently stated on the platform and in the press that he is opposed to our present land system. Let me call your attention to the concluding remarks of Dr. Tugwell in his recent speech at Philadelphia:

For the first time we are preparing to build a land program which will control the use of that greatest of all natural resources, not merely for the benefit of those who happen to hold title to it but for the greater welfare of all citizens in this country.

If you are going to leave the allocation of these individual allotments up to the Secretary of Agriculture to make on a basis that he may deem fair and just, you may have Professor Tugwell allocating your cotton acreage upon a basis which he thinks will be, not to the interest of the landowner and the producer but what he regards in the interest of the people of the country generally. That is what you people who are engaged in cotton production will be up against if you permit this legislation to pass and grant this tremendous power to the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. BUSBY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. I yield.

Mr. BUSBY. Does the gentleman understand that Professor Tugwell's declaration in the article he just read is tending toward land socialism?

Mr. HOPE. I certainly interpret it that way.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE] has expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, having a number of warm personal friends who are engaged in the cotton industry, both on the production end and the brokerage, who have expressed an interest in this measure, I naturally regret very much indeed that I am constrained to oppose it. However, the philosophy of this type of legislation is so antagonistic to my sensibilities and does such violence to my patriotic convictions that I cannot allow the opportunity to pass without registering a solemn and emphatic protest against it.

I regard this measure as just another step, and by far the most radical one so far, in a well-defined program to ultimately sovietize this Government, whose proud boast in the past has been its rugged solicitude for the personal liberties of its every citizen regardless of "race, color, or previous condition of servitude." This measure, as many others of a similar nature, sponsored by the so-called "new deal", is based on the theory that crop reduction will stimulate the price of the commodity in question and increase purchasing power. We are told that there is a huge surplus of farm commodities in this country, and that in a large measure this condition is responsible for the depression that has plagued us during the past 3 years. Mr. Chairman, I think this argument is a manifest fallacy. We are not suffering so much from overproduction; our chief difficulty is underconsumption. If you will give every person in the United States a square meal or the food that his body requires, and provide decent clothes for them, this overproduction bugaboo will instantly disappear. The emergent need of this country is purchasing power, and this cannot be obtained by the artificial methods heretofore prescribed by the quack professional doctors of philosophy of the Dr. Tugwell and Mordecai Ezekiel school. Aside from the pathetic and, as I consider, criminal aspects of plowing up cotton and slaughtering pigs to reduce an alleged surplus of food and clothing products, when millions of people in America are cold and hungry, I maintain that prosperity cannot be built upon such wanton waste and ruin.

Several times during this debate we have heard repeated the old stock, stereotyped statement that "the people are starving in the midst of plenty", and according to this crop-reduction program, Mr. Chairman, it is proposed to abolish the "plenty" without any assurance whatsoever that "starvation" will not continue.

Mr. Chairman, no one wants to see the cotton farmer prosper more than I do. I want to see every variety of agriculture prosper. But I am reluctant to jeopardize the boasted liberties of the American people to gratify the visionary whims of a lot of so-called "experts" who know nothing of the practical aspects of the farm problem. I am unwilling to trust the destiny and welfare of the farmers of America to the experimentation of men whose only knowledge of farming is what they have gleaned from books and in laboratories. Our liberties cost entirely too much in blood and treasure to be hazarded in such fashion and by such a venture.

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this bill because of its socialistic provisions. Its manifest purpose is to regimentize by compulsion one of the greatest industries of the Nation. If we could apply the principles of this bill to cotton, we can, with equal facility and propriety, apply them to any other agricultural or industrial commodity. We can apply them to the production of coal, iron, and marble and can extend them also into the field of manufacture, and we will probably do so if the famous "brain trust" continues to have its way. And in that event the America of George Washington and Thomas Jefferson—the America of our forefathers—will pass, and the America of the new deal, the America of the Russian mold, will take its place. God forbid that such a state shall ever come to pass!

While there are many objectionable features to this bill, I think the most amazingly outstanding one is the provision conferring legislative authority on the Secretary of Agriculture. If this bill is enacted into law, it should carry an appropriation in sufficient sum to purchase a diadem, and a committee should be created to carry it down to the Department of Agriculture and crown the Secretary thereof as the undisputed czar of the cotton farmers of America.

This bill provides that the lands withdrawn from cotton cultivation shall not be used to grow crops that will enter into competition in trade. It provides that the violation of any regulation that may be promulgated by the Secretary of Agriculture in the execution of its provisions shall subject the offender to a penalty of not more than $5,000, and not more than 2 years in some penal institution.

Think of it! If a farmer decides to plant a few acres removed from cotton production in soybeans, and feeds the hay therefrom to a dairy cow and then sells her milk in the channels of trade, such farmer may be haled into Federal court and fined or sent to prison for this terrible crime! I think that this iniquitous provision alone is enough to consign this measure to everlasting infamy. To say to the farmers of America that they cannot plant any crop they see fit on their own land is such an invasion of their sacred, inalienable rights as to amount to the most arrant tyranny. And yet, this is only one of a number of similar instances equally cruel and ridiculous that I might enumerate, the violation of which might subject an honest God-fearing farmer to serious criminal prosecution.

Mr. Chairman, Lenin, in his wildest dreams and in his palmiest days, never conceived of a more drastic bureaucratic dictatorship than is provided in this measure.

This proposal is not only un-American, but it is inhuman to a superlative degree, and, therefore, I shall take very great pleasure in registering my vote against it. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JOHNSON of Texas: Page 9, line 24, after the period, add the following: "The Secretary of Agriculture, in determining the manner of allotment to individual farmers, shall provide that farmers who have voluntarily reduced their cotton acreage shall not be penalized in favor of those farmers who have not done so."

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JOHNSON of Texas: Page 9, line 24, after the period add the following:

"The Secretary of Agriculture, in determining the manner of allotment to individual farmers, shall provide that farmers who have voluntarily reduced their cotton acreage shall not be penalized in favor of those farmers who have not done so."

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is designed to prevent an injustice being done those patriotic farmers who have in past years voluntarily reduced their cotton acreage.

I quote from a petition received by me, signed by 140 farmers from one of the counties in my district:

We believe that the farmer who in the beginning of the decline of the price of cotton took upon himself the responsibility of cotton acreage reduction, and who has maintained that reduction through the past 4 years, should not be penalized for doing voluntarily the very thing the Government now seeks to do. The present method of computing cotton production and reduction of acreage, on the basis of a 5-year average on a given farm, is in our opinion unfair to the man who has reduced and whose percentage of cotton acreage is far below that of the farmer who has maintained a normal acreage throughout.

Similar suggestions have come to me in numerous letters from farmers in all the counties in my district, a district which is one of the largest cotton-producing districts in the United States.

I am in hearty sympathy with these suggestions, and I have personal knowledge that they are just and based upon fact. The small farmers, as a rule, and many of the larger ones have for several years consistently reduced their cotton acreage in an effort to prevent a surplus, while there are others who have not done so, but have every year planted practically all their tillable land in cotton. It is unthinkable that when the Government undertakes by law to force a reduction of acreage, that those who have already done so should be penalized in favor of the very class which the bill is designed to curb.

The bill seeks to limit the cotton production in the United States for the crop year 1934-35 to 10,000,000 bales. Cotton produced in excess of that amount is to be taxed at not less than 5 cents per pound. Each farmer is to be allotted a certain number of bales, and upon the number so allotted to him he is given a certificate which exempts such number of bales so produced by him free from this tax.

STATE ALLOTMENT

Each cotton-producing State is to be allotted its equitable quota. Section 5 (a) of the bill deals with the method of apportioning the number of bales such State may produce free of this tax. I quote from the bill:

The Secretary of Agriculture shall apportion to the several cotton-producing States the number of bales the marketing of which may be exempt from the tax herein levied, which shall be determined by the ratio of the average number of bales produced in each State during the crop years 1928-32 preceding the passage of this act to the average number of bales produced in all the States during the same period.

COUNTY ALLOTMENT

After determining the State allotment, the Secretary of Agriculture will allot to each county, under the same basis and ratio, its quota.

APPORTIONMENT TO INDIVIDUAL FARMERS

Section 7 of the bill relates to the method by which it may be determined the number of bales each farmer may produce which will be free of the tax imposed by the bill. I quote from the bill:

Such allotments to any farm shall be made upon application therefor, and may be made by the Secretary of Agriculture, based upon:

- (1) A percentage of the average annual cotton production of the farm for a fair representative period; or
- (2) By ascertaining the amount of cotton the farm would have produced during a fair representative period if all the cultivated land had been planted to cotton, and then reducing such amount by such percentage (which shall be applied uniformly within the county to all farms to which the allotment is made under this paragraph) as will be sufficient to bring the total of the farm allotments within the county's allotment; or
- (3) Upon such basis as the Secretary of Agriculture deems fair and just, and will apply to all farms to which the allotment is made under this paragraph uniformly within the county, on the basis or classification adopted.

In determining the allotment to the farms it will be observed that the Secretary will take into consideration several things: (a) Average annual cotton production of the farm for a fair representative period—no fixed period of years is given, but it must be a fair representative period; (b) the total amount of cotton the farm would have made for a fair representative period if all the cultivated land had been planted in cotton; and (c) upon any fair and just basis which will be uniform, and so forth.

Since discretion is vested in the Secretary in determining the quota of the farms, it is highly important that we tell him in no uncertain language that in determining the plan of allotment he shall see to it that the farmers who have already reduced their acreage shall not be penalized in favor of those who have not done so, as my amendment provides.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I can see no objection to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I thank my colleague from Texas, Mr. JONES, who is Chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, which reported this bill, for agreeing to accept my amendment, which insures its adoption.

The success of this measure, like all others, will depend largely upon those who administer it, and I sincerely trust that the Secretary of Agriculture and those under him will fairly and impartially, and without harshness, execute its provisions. The cotton farmers of the South will gladly cooperate in seeking to carry out the purposes of this bill, which should result in curbing production and in insuring a much better price for cotton this fall.

TEMPORARY LAW FOR 2 YEARS

The bill is not a permanent law and is only for 2 years during the present emergency. It applies to the crop year of 1934-35 and also to 1935-36, but may be extended for 1 additional year if the President finds that the economic emergency in cotton production and marketing is such as to require it, in which event he shall so proclaim, but it will not be in effect any longer than that time.

I am glad that there is a time limit to the operation of this law, for it is experimental and is designed solely to be used as a temporary measure. There are many Members of the House who would not vote for it otherwise. In all farm relief legislation heretofore passed during my service in Congress I have sought in each instance to have a time limit placed thereon; and when the committee was considering this bill, I urged the committee to make it a temporary measure, and I am glad that they have done so, otherwise I am doubtful whether or not I could support the bill.

LARGE COTTON SURPLUS

The large surplus of cotton on hand is not due to overproduction but underconsumption. The buying power of the American people—and also in other countries of the world—has been paralyzed for 4 years, and, as a result, each year the carry-over has increased. In 1929 the carry-over was 4,500,000 bales; in 1930 it was 6,000,000 bales; in 1931 it was 8,900,000 bales; in 1932 it was 13,228,000 bales; and the last crop carry-over is estimated at nearly 12,000,000 bales.

The voluntary plow-up program, for which the farmers were paid by the Government, resulted in a crop last year of approximately 13,200,000 bales; and, if this reduction program had not been carried out, the Department of Agriculture estimates that the crop would have been nearly 18,000,000 bales.

While we are passing out of the depression, and the buying power of the people is gradually being restored—yet it will be impossible to eliminate this accumulated surplus unless the production is curbed for a few years.

To those who ask why the voluntary reduction program should not be continued rather than this compulsory plan let me say that, while some sections have agreed already to reduce their acreage, there are other sections which have not done so; and unless every State is forced to reduce, those that do not will reap the benefits at the expense of those who do. Again, by the use of fertilizer, even the reduced acreage may produce as much or more than a normal acreage would have produced. The evidence before the Committee on Agriculture indicated a vast increase in the sale of fertilizer to cotton farmers. An increase of 100 percent in the sale of fertilizer this year over last was shown, and in many sections of the country the increased sales of fertilizer were as high as 300 percent. It is obvious, therefore, that a reduction in acreage will not amount to a reduction in production if fertilizer and intensive methods of cultivation are employed. It is not the number of acres in cotton but the number of bales produced that will determine the price. This bill, therefore, changes the plan from a reduction in acreage to a reduction in bales. If the production in 1934-35 can be held to 10,000,000 bales, every farmer producing cotton should be assured a fair price.

THE CROP FOR 1935-36

There will be no reduction program in 1935-36, and this law will not be effective as to that crop year unless the Secretary of Agriculture finds that two thirds of the persons engaged in cotton farming favor such a reduction; and if so, the number of bales for that crop year will be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture, based upon the then existing conditions. This bill, therefore, may not be effective for more than 1 year.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT FAVORS IT

Our great President, Franklin D. Roosevelt, who has done more for agriculture than any President who ever occupied the White House, has endorsed this bill. It was not prepared by any of the so-called "brain trust", but its author, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], is from the Southland and, aside from being one of the outstanding leaders in the House, is a man whose practical knowledge and judgment of the problems of the cotton farmers cannot be questioned. The Chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, Mr. JONES, of Texas, who reported this bill and is sponsoring its passage, is a native of my State, a man of outstanding ability, who is not visionary or radical in his views, and he and his committee have given the bill very careful consideration, and in my judgment may safely be followed.

Time has not permitted me to make an investigation as to the constitutionality of the measure, but a brief has been inserted in the RECORD, prepared by an assistant to the Attorney General of the United States, upholding its validity.

During the emergency we have been compelled to vote for many new and untried plans, but the President has insisted, and I think rightly so, that the economic crisis was so great that something should be done, and Congress has responded to his suggestions.

We have reduced the production of oil in order to prevent the destruction of that great industry; and cotton, the most valuable of all agricultural products, upon which so many of our people depend for a living, is entitled to the same consideration.

OTHER REMEDIES REQUIRED

I am not so enthusiastic about this bill as to believe that it is a cure-all and that its passage alone will solve the problems of the cotton farmer. It is designed primarily to temporarily restrict the production of cotton until the large carry-over accumulated during the depression can be absorbed.

Personally, I think an expansion of the currency is a fundamental requirement to restore the price level of agricultural products. Some such legislation has already been passed, and I am hopeful that other measures designed to bring about an expansion of the currency will be enacted into law.

The revaluation of the gold dollar already accomplished is a step in the right direction. Remonetization of silver, or in any event more use of silver as money is needed. The Dies silver bill, authorizing the purchase of agricultural products by foreign countries to be paid in silver would be helpful.

Modification of our tariff laws, in order to permit other countries of the world to buy our agricultural commodities, and especially cotton, of which we produce a large surplus, must be effected, and President Roosevelt has recommended tariff legislation, which will soon be considered.

CONTROL OF COTTON EXCHANGES

Legislation to curb abuses in the buying and selling of cotton futures upon the cotton exchanges is of paramount importance. So long as speculators can form pools and combinations and thereby depress the future market, they can in a large measure control the price of cotton and counteract all remedial legislation. Expansion of the currency, reduction in the production of cotton, and all other governmental remedies will be in vain if the cotton gamblers are permitted to continue unrestricted their operations upon the future market.

The Department of Agriculture has recently had under consideration the regulation of cotton exchanges, and I have introduced a bill at the present session, H.R. 8310, designed to curb these abuses, and my bill is based upon recommendations from the Department of Agriculture. It is my understanding that the Committee on Agriculture will shortly begin hearings on this important matter, and I sincerely hope that Congress will not adjourn until such legislation is passed.

MY AMENDMENT

Reverting again to the bill under consideration, section 8 directs a 10-percent deduction of the number of bales allotted to each State for allocation in such State:

(a) To producers of cotton on farms where for the preceding 3 years less than one third of the cultivated land on such farms has been planted to cotton;

(b) To producers of cotton on farms not previously used in cotton production;

(c) To producers of cotton on farms where for the preceding 3 years normal cotton production has been reduced by reason of drought, storm, flood, insect pests, or other uncontrollable natural cause; and

(d) To producers of cotton on farms where for the preceding 3 years acreage theretofore planted to cotton has been voluntarily reduced so that the amount of reduction in cotton production on such farms is greater than the amount which the Secretary finds would have been an equitable reduction applicable to such farms in carrying out a reasonable reduction program.

The allotments provided for in this section shall be in addition to the amounts apportioned to the counties under section 5 (b).

This section is designed to take care of those exceptional cases where injustices would be done in the instances therein enumerated; and while the Secretary of Agriculture, under this section, might be able to take care of some individual cases where the parties had already reduced their acreage, yet I think it is important that the Secretary, in his general regulations of allotment, should know that Congress intends, and, therefore, specifically directs that the general plan so worked out shall be designed to and shall prevent discrimination against those who have already reduced their acreage, and I hope, therefore, my amendment to this effect will be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I can see no objection to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. Whenever an allotment is made pursuant to section 3, not to exceed 10 percent of the number of bales allotted to each State shall be deducted from the number of bales allotted to such State and allotted in such State—

(a) To producers of cotton on farms where for the preceding 3 years less than one third of the cultivated land on such farms has been planted to cotton;

(b) To producers of cotton on farms not previously used in cotton production;

(c) To producers of cotton on farms where, for the preceding 3 years, normal cotton production has been reduced by reason of drought, storm, flood, insect pests, or other uncontrollable natural cause; and

(d) To producers of cotton on farms where, for the preceding 3 years, acreage theretofore planted to cotton has been voluntarily reduced so that the amount of reduction in cotton production on such farms is greater than the amount which the Secretary finds would have been an equitable reduction applicable to such farms in carrying out a reasonable reduction program.

The allotments provided for in this section shall be in addition to the amounts apportioned to the counties under section 5 (b). No allotment shall be made under this section to any producer except upon compliance with such conditions and limitations on the production of cotton by him as the Secretary of Agriculture may prescribe to assure the cooperation of such producer in the cotton-reduction program of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 11, line 5, after the parentheses "(b)", strike out the following: "No allotment shall be made under this section to any producer except upon compliance with such conditions and limitations on the production of cotton by him, as the Secretary of Agriculture may prescribe to assure the cooperation of such producer in the cotton reduction program of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: Page 10, line 18, strike out "three" and insert "five."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, there is no objection to the amendment.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment in order to ask the chairman of the committee a question.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 7 minutes.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I am in favor of the gentleman's bill; but I think we ought to have time to discuss important amendments proposed in connection with it. Seven minutes gives no opportunity at all to discuss an amendment I wish to offer, which I think is worthy of consideration.

Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. MILLER. The bill provides for a reservation of 10 percent of the number of bales allotted to each State. What information did the committee have as to the sufficiency of 10 percent to take care of the situation that will arise in States where new land is being opened up?

Mr. JONES. I may state to the gentleman that I do not know of any way we could have had positive information. The first suggestion was to withhold only 5 percent; but we felt that was too low and we raised it to not exceed 10 percent. We did not think it would require 10 percent, but we felt this amount would be abundantly sufficient. If, for instance, Arkansas should find that she needs but 4 percent, or 8 percent, that is all she need reserve; she need not use the full 10 percent.

Mr. MILLER. I understand that. The cotton section of the Agricultural Administration advised me that their first proposal was 5 percent and that it was raised to not exceed 10 percent; but I am not sure that 10 percent is enough.

The point I want to know is this. I know the committee is interested in working out the bill, and I am just as much interested as you are.

Mr. JONES. If the gentleman will permit an observation, if we go above 10 percent some counties that do not have new land will feel that we are abusing them a little bit. We want to keep this thing fair. This provides 10 percent. Here is one county that does not have any new land at all. If we allow more than 10 percent we are going pretty strong. I will state to the gentleman that my section is such that we could use a great deal more, but I think in fairness to the country and to this kind of a program that this will take care of the situation.

Mr. MILLER. If the chairman of the committee has given the matter careful consideration and the gentleman's mature judgment is that 10 percent is sufficient, I will not object.

Mr. JONES. If we find it is not, may I state to the gentleman that I will join with him in getting an increase.

Mr. ALLGOOD. This is a million bales?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 6 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TARVER: Page 11, after line 2, add the following: "(e) To producers of cotton who are heads of families having not less than five dependents, so that such heads of families shall have allocated to them at least four bales of cotton each."

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that under the procedure adopted by those in charge of the bill I have not time to adequately discuss this amendment. This is proposed in the interest of the man who is about to be forgotten by the House in the consideration of this bill. I refer to the tenant farmer. Examine section 7 (a) and you will find that the allocation of this tax-exempt cotton is going to be made to the farms, not the farmers. In other words, the tax-exempt cotton is to be controlled by the landowner. It is expected that the Secretary of Agriculture will make regulations to protect the tenant, but I should like to protect him here and now.

I have received letters from my constituents, and I am sure other Congressmen from the South have received similar communications, demonstrating the necessity for this amendment. For example, under this acreage-reduction program that is going on cases like this arise: A man writes me and says, "I have lived on the farm of John Smith for 10 years. We have gotten along all right. He is satisfied with me as a tenant and I am satisfied with him as a landlord, but he tells me now that he has rented his land, except what he wants to cultivate himself, to the Government, and that he cannot rent me any land to raise cotton. What am I to do?" There is nothing in this bill that will take care of that farmer. The cotton allocated to the farm is in many instances going to be raised by the landlord alone if he does not treat his tenants fairly, and the unfair landlord is going to shut his tenant out of the production of cotton in some cases.

This amendment will not increase the 10,000,000-bale allotment by 1 bale. The section provides that a 10-percent tolerance of the share allotted to each State be allocated in certain extraordinary cases, and I am undertaking to provide that this 10-percent tolerance may be used to the extent it may be necessary and to the extent it may be available for the purpose of according to every man who is the head of a family, with five mouths to feed besides his own, the privilege of raising four bales of tax-exempt cotton. Is there anything unfair in this, when you realize that the only money crop of the South is the cotton crop? Will you not do what you can to see that there is accorded to every tenant farmer and every man engaged in the production of cotton who is head of a family of six or more the privilege of raising at least four bales of cotton upon which the tax will not be required?

Mr. BUSBY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. BUSBY. If a landlord finds himself equipped to plant in cotton all of the land that has been allotted to his farm, and he can do so without the aid of his tenant, what effect will that have on the tenant?

Mr. TARVER. The tenant will get to raise no cotton, unless the Secretary of Agriculture takes care of him by regulation. I have had many cases called to my attention under the voluntary program where tenants have been evicted from farms because the landlord wants to raise all of the cotton his farm is allowed under his acreage-reduction contract. The tenant and his family are thrown out on the cold mercies of the world, and they cannot do anything to earn their livelihood under present conditions.

This will not disorganize your program. Will the chairman not consent to this amendment by way of fair play to the man who does not own a farm?

Mr. ALLGOOD. Does this amendment apply to a man who has not been growing cotton?

Mr. TARVER. It applies to the producers of cotton, and therefore to men who have been growing cotton.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Does it apply to a man who has not been growing cotton?

Mr. TARVER. It does not apply to a man who has not been growing cotton. It is an assurance to the tenant farmers that they will not be discriminated against to the extent of being absolutely eliminated from the production of cotton by the operation of this bill.

Mr. ALLGOOD. If a man has been growing only three bales of cotton, would the gentleman increase his allotment to four?

Mr. TARVER. There will be few instances where a man with six in his family has been producing only three bales of cotton. May I say it is impossible to draw an amendment which would fit every situation. This is not compulsory to the extent that it would be required in every instance that there should be allocated to the head of every family of six or more four bales of cotton. This simply makes this 10-percent tolerance available for use so far as it will go or may be needed to that end. Is this not fair? Is there any man in the House who will say it is unfair?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I do not think anyone in the House is more sympathetic to the tenant cotton producer than the members of this committee. May I get down to the practical side of this matter?

If you allot on the family basis you have no place to put a limit. Nearly everybody, even in the towns, in a cotton-growing section has been or is a potential producer of cotton. Nearly all of them are producers. They could go out and get their four-bale allotment and wreck the whole program.

Mr. TARVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. No. I am sorry, but I only have 1 minute.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time for the discussion of this matter be extended 15 minutes. Why should the chairman of the committee be limited to only 1 minute?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas has the floor.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, you must tie this provision to the land. We tried in every way in the world to take care of the tenant, the share cropper, and the small farmer. We have written all the way through the bill everything we could legally to protect these people and to assure fair treatment to the small man, but all cotton is produced on land.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the limitation upon the time heretofore fixed be removed and 15 minutes accorded to the discussion of this amendment.

Mr. DRIVER. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BUSBY. Does the agreement to cut off all debate apply to any amendment offered to the section which has been read?

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from Texas, which was adopted by the Committee, cuts off all debate on the section and all amendments thereto.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Georgia rise?

Mr. TARVER. For the purpose of offering another amendment. I understand, of course, I shall not be allowed to discuss it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TARVER: At the end of section 8, add a new section, to be numbered section 8 (b), and to read as follows:

"Sec. 8 (b). Whenever an allotment is made pursuant to section 3, not to exceed 10 percent of the total number of bales allotted shall be deducted therefrom and allotted to States where, for the preceding 3 years, acreage planted to cotton has been reduced or not increased in the average percentage of increase for all cotton-producing States, so that the amount of reduction in cotton production in such States required by the apportionment provided in section 5 (a) is greater than the amount which the Secretary finds would be an equitable reduction applicable to such States in carrying out a reasonable reduction program."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The amendment was rejected.

The pro forma amendments were withdrawn and the Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 9. (a) Exemption certificates shall be issued by the Secretary of Agriculture, upon application therefor, but only upon proof satisfactory to the Secretary that the producer is entitled thereto pursuant to this act and the regulations thereunder. Any certificate erroneously issued shall be void upon a demand in writing for its return made by the Secretary of Agriculture to the person to whom such certificate was issued.

(b) The right to a certificate of exemption shall be evidenced in such manner as the Secretary of Agriculture may by regulations prescribe.

(c) The certificate of exemption shall specify the amount of cotton exempt from the tax under section 4 (e) (2).

(d) Any and all certificates of exemption may be transferred or assigned in whole or in part in such manner as the Secretary of Agriculture may prescribe and shall be issued with detachable coupons or in such other form or forms to be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture as will facilitate such transfer or assignment. Any person who, in violation of the regulations made by the Secretary of Agriculture, (1) secures certificates of exemption or bale tags from another by sharp practices, or (2) speculates in certificates of exemption or bale tags, and any person securing certificates of exemption or bale tags from another person by fraud or coercion shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $1,000 or sentenced to not more than 2 years' imprisonment, or both.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, oftentimes when there is a roll call and a person's name does not appear as answering the same it is misunderstood by those who read the RECORD. Today, during the roll call that was had on Senate amendment no. 22, I endeavored to register as voting to send the amendment to conference, it being understood that the President had most emphatically stated that he would veto the bill in its present form, and I knew if such action was taken that it would be very doubtful if any of our disabled and deserving ex-service men who recently suffered a reduction of compensation or were cut off entirely would have a chance to obtain any consideration during this session. However, on account of being invited down to the White House on a matter of public interest, I left before the registration was made, and I am now advised that my name does not appear. May I simply say that I have been here all through this discussion and I would not have been out of the Hall had it not been for the fact that I was called away on public business.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 11 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, in reading over this section I find in line 9 practically a prohibition against speculation in certificates of exemption. Will the chairman of the committee define for us the meaning of the word "speculation" in this connection?

Mr. JONES. That is left to the Secretary of Agriculture as it is in one or two other instances. I understand that that word is in the Grain Futures Act, and its administration is left to the Secretary of Agriculture.

It is very difficult to define the term, and if you try to include everything you usually have a lot of things included that should not be included, and I think it is very well understood what is meant by the term.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If it is so well understood, I should like to have the gentleman explain it to me.

Mr. JONES. It has been used heretofore and we talked about trying to define the term, but it seemed to be difficult to put it in words without getting it in a strait-jacket.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then the Secretary of Agriculture, in a great many instances, is going into court and send a man to jail for 2 years and fine him $1,000 on his own definition of what is speculation?

Mr. JONES. Of course, the gentleman can make a statement that sounds extreme, but in the administration of the Grain Futures Act we have found no instances where any such advantage has been taken, and we do not anticipate any in this case. In drafting these regulations, as the gentleman knows as a lawyer, the Secretary cannot be arbitrary or unreasonable or the regulations will be knocked out.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; perish the thought! I am not a lawyer.

Mr. JONES. The lawyers know that the Secretary cannot be arbitrary in the matter, and I think the gentleman is a lawyer even though he does not have a license to practice.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No. May I ask another question with respect to this section which is, perhaps, applicable to the whole bill? What happens in the case of the cotton which is planted before this bill becomes law?

Mr. JONES. It must be subject to the allotment. Of course, those who have signed will have no trouble in coming within the terms, but as to the cotton that is planted, such a man will have his allotment just the same as the others. If he plants more than what would be normally his allotment, his excess would be subject to the tax this year.

Mr. WADSWORTH. When does your planting start, normally?

Mr. JONES. That depends on the season. It starts about now in the southern part of Texas, but most of the cotton is planted in April.

Mr. WADSWORTH. You will have a tremendous acreage of cotton planted before this bill can be passed.

Mr. JONES. Not by those who have been honestly trying to go along with the program, and most of them in that section have tried to go along. I do not think there will be many others, and those who have stayed on the outside have received the advantage already of the plow-up program of those who have cooperated, and they have had about advantage enough, and I think they should now come through.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

I should like to ask the chairman a question. In paragraphs (c) and (d) what provision is made with respect to the cotton that is now held in warehouses?

Mr. JONES. This bill exempts all cotton that was harvested before June 1. The season starts June 1 and all cotton harvested prior to that is exempt.

Mr. BUSBY. Suppose some man has a dozen acres and only raised 10 bales of cotton in 1931, 1932, and 1933. What would be his allotment under this plan?

Mr. JONES. The basic plan is on the cotton raised for 5 years; that is for the county. When it comes to the individual, there are three ways upon which it is based, and the Secretary of Agriculture selects that which he deems is fair and just.

Mr. BUSBY. It is supposed to be a reduction.

Mr. JONES. In the total production, but not necessarily the acreage of the individual.

Mr. BUSBY. Suppose a man raises two or three thousand bales?

Mr. JONES. Undoubtedly he would have to cut it down considerably. Of course, some would not be cut at all.

Mr. BUSBY. Suppose we inserted a provision that no farmer would be allowed more than 1,000 bales of cotton; suppose the limit to the individual is a thousand bales; would not that come nearer to what you are after?

Mr. JONES. I think there will be very few that would raise over that.

Mr. BUSBY. Does not the gentleman know that he would lose 95 percent of the support of his bill if he put a limit of a thousand bales of cotton to one individual?

Mr. JONES. No.

Mr. BUSBY. You are after the little fellows who only raise four or five bales on a small farm, but you are aiding the man who plants a large acreage with colored labor, working horses and machinery wholesale.

Mr. FULMER. There is a farmer who has 25,000 acres.

Mr. BUSBY. Well, limit him.

Mr. JONES. He is limited. But if you undertake to discriminate the bill would be knocked out entirely. This program must be tied to land. All cotton is produced on land. When you levy a tax on production you must have it on some sort of a fair classification and uniform basis.

Mr. BUSBY. I am simply calling attention to this to show you what a mix-up it is.

Mr. JONES. I think the gentleman from Mississippi would have it in a worse mix-up. Mr. Chairman, this matter was gone into very thoroughly. We had 2 or 3 days' discussion on it in committee trying to protect the tenants and the share cropper in every possible way. We have authorized the Secretary of Agriculture to make regulations and to go as strong as he can in protecting them. We are just as anxious as the gentleman from Mississippi can possibly be to throw every safeguard around the individual rights of the small producer.

But everyone knows that you must comply with certain rules and regulations, or you blot out your whole program, and I think we have an allotment that follows very much the voluntary plow-up program of last year, which was successful, and which put a lot of money in the gentleman's State. If he will look at his people there as they are now, as compared with what they were before this program was put into effect, he will find that they are in a very much better economic condition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. GLOVER: Page 12, line 14, after the word "than", strike out the word "two" and insert the word "one."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that following the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas, the word "year" be substituted for the word "years."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 10. (a) Upon the payment of the tax on any cotton, or the surrender of exemption certificates covering cotton, the collector receiving such payment or certificates shall deliver to the person so paying or surrendering an appropriate number of bale tags which shall be affixed to such cotton.

(b) All cotton imported from a foreign country (including the Philippine Islands, the Virgin Islands, American Samoa, the Canal Zone, and the island of Guam) shall be packed and stamped, tagged, or otherwise identified, in addition to any import stamp indicating inspection at the customhouse, before such cotton is withdrawn therefrom.

(c) Every person who, at the time the tax becomes effective in any crop year, holds for sale (or use in the manufacture or production of an article intended for sale) any lint cotton in bales harvested during a year with respect to which the tax was not in effect may, upon application within 15 days after the tax becomes effective, and any publicly owned experimental station or agricultural laboratory may, upon application at the time of ginning cotton harvested by it, receive an appropriate number of bale tags. Such bale tags shall be promptly affixed to the bales of lint cotton so held.

(d) In the case of any cotton in existence at the beginning of any crop year with respect to which the tax becomes effective and owned, held, or controlled by the United States, or any department or agency thereof, the Commissioner shall supply bale tags therefor free of charge, upon application by the head of the department or agency. Upon application of the Secretary of Agriculture, bale tags shall be issued free of charge for cotton held in the 1933 Cotton Producers' Pool. Bale tags issued under this section shall be securely affixed to such cotton.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman a question. I notice that there is a penalty provided in the bill for violation of section 9, which has just been amended. Also there is a penalty provided for violation of section 13, and in section 14, subsection (d), there is a penalty provided for violation of any portion of the act. That penalty is more severe than any of the others, although it apparently covers violations of the two sections to which I have referred.

Mr. JONES. I would be happy to have the gentleman offer an amendment to correct any part of the bill which may need it.

Mr. TARVER. If a man were indicted for violation of section 9 or of section 13, would he be subject to the penalty provided in section 14 (d)?

Mr. JONES. I do not think so. The gentleman is familiar with the rule that the specific always controls the general provision.

Mr. TARVER. But they are all specific.

Mr. JONES. Oh, you can write a deed absolute on its face, but if you put in a mortgage clause the mortgage clause controls the general provisions. I would have no objection to an amendment to make them conform, and if the gentleman wishes to offer such an amendment I would agree to it.

Mr. TARVER. I think the chairman should properly offer the amendment.

Mr. JONES. I shall be happy to make any needed corrections.

Mr. TARVER. There is another question I want to ask about section 14 (b), which has the provision that transportation of a bale of cotton or any lint cotton to which a bale tag is not attached beyond the boundaries of the county shall be in violation of the act, and that section, as I have already pointed out, provides for the making of any violation of the act a felony punishable by imprisonment for 2 years or by a fine not exceeding $5,000. I know of many farms where part of the farm lies in one county and part in another county. In that case the farmer could not move a bale of cotton from one part of the farm to the other unless a bale tag is attached without being subject to this penalty.

Mr. JONES. We discussed that feature of the matter, and after discussing it—and there are many angles to that—we thought it better be taken care of by regulations of the Department. Of course, they will make regulations which will permit the movement of cotton. The only way to keep bootlegging down is to have, first, the forbidding of the movement of cotton when the tax is not paid. A man can pay his tax and move his cotton, or if it is exempt he can move it. This refers to excess production. In order to keep that from escaping, we put in that provision and then authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to issue regulations under which it may be moved. I have an idea that he will say, if a man has a farm partly in one county and partly in another, he may haul it across the county line on the farm, or if he owns two farms adjoining he can take it from one farm to the other, and I know that he will be permitted to haul it to a warehouse, because the law itself provides that he can store it.

Mr. TARVER. The law provides that he cannot haul any lint cotton across the county line unless he has one of these bale tags attached. According to the gentleman's reasoning, he is making a man guilty of a felony and depending upon the Secretary of Agriculture to keep him from being indicted.

Mr. JONES. I think the gentleman is unfair there. Of course, nobody is going to find a man guilty of a felony under those circumstances.

Mr. TARVER. I do not think a man should be left to the mercy of the court.

Mr. JONES. I think the gentleman is inclined to be captious.

Mr. TARVER. I think that remark is entirely uncalled for.

Mr. JONES. I withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 6 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. JONES. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 6 minutes.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. JONES (interrupting the count). Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise. I ask for tellers on that motion.

Tellers were ordered, and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BUSBY] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] were appointed tellers.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported there were ayes 7 and noes 82.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I regret it exceedingly, but I move that the Committee do now rise. We will have to meet tomorrow.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. A vote was just taken that the Committee rise, and the motion was overwhelmingly defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] moved again that the Committee do now rise.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HILL of Alabama, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the Committee, having had under consideration the bill H.R. 8402, the cotton control bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Wednesday next, after the reading of the Journal and disposition of matters on the Speaker's desk, I may address the House for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE]?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. DEEN, for the balance of the week, on account of illness.

To Mr. KEE, for 2 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. LANHAM, indefinitely on account of illness.

To Mr. MORAN, for 5 days, beginning March 24, 1934, on account of important business.

To Mr. SHANNON, for 10 days, on account of important business.

To Messrs. McKEOWN, DUFFEY, PERKINS, LEHR, and GUYER, for 10 days, on account of absence from the city to complete investigation of bankruptcy and equity receiverships.

EXPLANATION OF VOTE

Mr. HENNEY. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. HUGHES, was detained from the Chamber during the vote this afternoon—

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I object to any such announcement.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard. The gentleman is out of order.

PUBLIC SERVICE IN NATIONAL PARK WORK

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a radio address by the Director of National Park Service concerning national parks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a radio talk by Mr. Arno B. Cammerer, Director of the National Park Service of the Department of the Interior, broadcast from Washington Saturday, March 10.

This is the second of a series of nine national broadcasts being given under the auspices of the National Park Service. I want to congratulate Director Cammerer and the other officials of that Service on the good work they are doing and preparing to do throughout this year in bringing the national beauty and historic spots of our country to the attention of Americans. Everybody should encourage the National Park Service in its efforts to stimulate travel in the United States.

I know the people appreciate the patriotic service of Capt. Taylor Branson and the Marine Band, which is appearing on the weekly national-park radio programs, and his choice as the theme song for the broadcasts, My Own United States. That inspiring song is preeminently appropriate, and I may add that we western Members are thrilled at this time of the year to hear When It's Springtime in the Rockies and Where the Silvery Colorado Wends Its Way.

Before quoting Mr. Cammerer's talk I want to say a few words about the National Park Service. It is undoubtedly the outstanding contact organization in the United States Government. Of all the hundred or more bureaus, commissions, boards, services, and other administrative organizations of our Government, the National Park Service is, in my judgment, the most popular of all of them. It richly deserves that universal admiration. The entire park personnel takes supreme pride in their work, and they look and act the part. They are charged with duties which at all times work for the recreation and happiness of those with whom they come in contact. The very nature of the activities of the National Park Service brings out the best there is in its officials and employees, and yet they have a most trying and difficult task.

They are required every year to personally and courteously entertain, instruct, supervise, provide for in every detail, and tactfully and forcibly, if necessary, control about three and a half million people, who are out for a vacation and are usually rather intolerant of restraint or regulation and somewhat indifferent to the consideration of others.

Our people are called the worst souvenir gatherers in the world. It is a herculean task every minute of every day and every night during the season to prevent vandalism and disfigurement of the scenery, which would very soon cause practically the ruination of all of the parks.

But owing to the very exceptional qualifications, high character, and diligence of the superintendents, the park rangers, and all other employees, the sublime and world-renowned scenery is perfectly preserved in its primitive condition. All the parks are being marvelously improved every year, and the visitors leave the parks happy and delighted with their visit, and more and more thousands of them return every year.

When I was honored by a seat in this House on March 4, 1909, we had nine national parks. We now have 24 and a historical park. I have been proud to assist in the creation of all those 16 parks. At that time we had, as I recall, about half a dozen national monuments created by Executive order under the act of June 8, 1906. We now have 67 national monuments.

I also took a very active part in the long struggle in Congress to enact the law approved August 26, 1916, creating the National Park Service. That was an achievement that every public-spirited citizen and lover of nature has been proud of ever since. We were all genuinely delighted when Stephen R. Mather was appointed Director of the Service. No human being in our Republic was more suitable or better fitted for that position. He was ideally qualified by nature and opportunity, and he superbly and grandly filled that position until he was called to his reward.

His most capable assistant, greatest student, and admirer was Horace M. Albright, and the entire country was glad to see him succeed Mr. Mather. Mr. Albright not only filled the position but was a wonderful executive, and the Park Service and the parks developed marvelously and splendidly during the many years he occupied the position of Director. The entire population of this country owe both him and Mr. Mather a debt of gratitude for their superb and patriotic service to our Nation.

We all regretted the retirement of Mr. Albright, but all lovers of our parks were delighted to have as his successor Mr. Arno B. Cammerer, who has grown up in the Service from his boyhood days. He was Mr. Albright's greatest assistant and the most capable and best-qualified person to succeed to that office.

During the past quarter of a century of my service in Congress it has been one of my greatest pleasures to not only actively support the bills creating most of our national parks, but to also be in a position to help in their improvement, maintenance, and growth. I look upon them as one of the greatest assets of our country. In fact, I feel that when I reach the end of the trail down the western slope of life toward the setting sun, it will be one of my proudest recollections to have taken an active part in the creation, development, and preservation of these marvelously scenic, attractive, and inspiring American playgrounds that are by Congress forever dedicated "for the benefit and enjoyment of the people."

I am exceedingly pleased to have the opportunity of inserting in the RECORD Director Cammerer's admirable address, as follows:

GREATER OPPORTUNITIES FOR PUBLIC SERVICE IN NATIONAL PARK WORK, WITH SPECIAL REFERENCE TO EASTERN AREAS

My fellow Americans, last week Secretary Ickes told you of the plans to make 1934 a national park year. Tonight is my opportunity to tell you something concerning the great national park system of the United States and what it offers you in opportunities for recreation, enjoyment, and inspiration.

Even though the annual visiting list of the national parks already runs into the millions, there are comparatively few people well acquainted with the tremendous scope of these great national reservations and the part they play, and should play, in our everyday lives. They are the great scenic masterpieces of our Nation, set aside by special act of Congress in each instance for your use, health, and enjoyment. These laws put the stamp of congressional approval on them, as the stamp "sterling" is put on the highest grade silver. Before a national park area is established, it is thoroughly studied by the experts of the National Park Service as to whether it measures up to the high standards prescribed for such parks, so you can depend upon it that once the Congress has created the park there must be something transcendently beautiful about it to deserve that proud distinction. Each park has natural characteristics all its own, and duplication of such characteristics has been avoided. That means that when you visit any one of these parks, you are seeing the finest thing of its kind, scenically speaking, that the Nation has to offer. Nature was lavish when this country was fashioned, and every State has areas of outstanding beauty. It takes national prominence as contradistinguished from merely local prominence to entitle an area to national park status. The great State park system of the country absorbs those scenic areas within individual States that have local prominence.

The United States was the first country to establish national parks and expand and combine them into a system for public enjoyment. The Yellowstone was the first national park to be established, and under rather dramatic circumstances. I wish I had the time to tell you about that at some length. A party of explorers, the famous Washburn expedition, had completed their inspection of the area in 1870. The members were gathered around the camp fire one evening discussing what had best be done with such a wonderland of beauty. All but one figured on preempting some especially beautiful site for personal purposes, when Cornelius Hedges, a Montanan, insisted that the only solution was to make that area a national park for the use and enjoyment of all the people. That marvelously beautiful area, with its rolling forests, mountains, lakes, streams, and waterfalls, with awe-inspiring exhibits of natural phenomena, and great exhibits of wild life, became a national park in 1872, 2 years later. It now contains 2,200,240 acres of virgin wilderness. Since then have been added Mount Rainier National Park in Washington, the largest single peak glacial system in the United States; the Grand Canyon National Park in Arizona, presenting the greatest example of erosion and the most sublime spectacle in the world; the Yosemite National Park in California, with its romantic scenery, including gorgeous waterfalls, mountains, and valleys, and the world-famous valley of Yosemite itself; the Glacier National Park in Montana on Canada's boundary and sometimes called the Switzerland of America because of the many large glaciers nestling close to the mountain crags; the Mesa Verde National Park in Colorado, where the prehistoric remains of cliff dwellers are preserved; and farther north in Colorado, only 80 miles from Denver, that sublime section of the magnificent Continental Divide incorporated in the Rocky Mountain National Park; the Sequoia and General Grant National Parks in California, preserving the unparalleled specimens of the Sequoia gigantea, the big trees of America, many of which are over 3,000 years old, and one of them with a diameter of 40.3 feet.

Crater Lake National Park in Oregon contains the marvelous lake of incomparable blue in the heart of an extinct volcanic crater; Lassen Volcanic Park in California containing our only recently active volcano in the United States proper; the marvelous beauty of the Carlsbad Caverns National Park in New Mexico, and the Wind Cave National Park in South Dakota, exhibiting distinctively different underground limestone formations; and the colorful national parks, Zion and Bryce, in southern Utah's wonderland of color. Hot-springs phenomena, aside from those of the Yellowstone, are preserved in the popular Hot Springs National Park in Arkansas, where since 1832, as our records go, and way into the distant past as far as Indian legends go, the hot waters have been used for the alleviation of human ailments. Platt National Park in Oklahoma also has springs whose remedial qualities find favor with the public. Then there is the great Mount McKinley National Park, of nearly 2,000,000 acres, in Alaska, with its chief scenic ascent, the great Mount McKinley, but created primarily to preserve the tremendous game herds of caribou and other wild life. In Hawaii, on the islands of Hawaii and Maui, the Hawaii National Park contains unparalleled volcanic exhibits and tropical floral growth readily accessible to the visitor. Altogether there are about 8½ million acres in this system.

You can therefore understand how the seed sown in the Yellowstone over 60 years ago has grown into a magnificent system that has proven the foresight and patriotism of those pioneers gathered around that historic camp fire. Your country has set the example, my listeners, and as a result all over the world—in Australia, in Africa, in Asia, in Europe, in South America—other countries are following in these footsteps of your Uncle Sam.

These national parks are maintained in absolutely unimpaired form for the use of future generations as well as those of our own time. In their management and development the national interest must dictate all decisions affecting public and private enterprise in the parks, and their development for public use. Accommodations are provided to fit any purse, from the great free public camp grounds where policing, good water, and sanitation are afforded under appropriations from the Congress, and where you can sleep in your own tent and cook your own food over the embers of your own campfire, or go to nearby lodges where a cabin and three square meals can be secured at reasonable prices, or patronize the high-class de luxe hotels where accommodations and service equal to the best in our large cities are available. You can come in your own car and roam through the parks to your heart's content, or you can use the extensive motor facilities provided by the transportation companies operating under contract with the Interior Department, rain or shine, and whether one person arrives or a thousand. All rates and schedules are approved by the Government. Rangers, hand picked for good manners, courtesy, and thoughtfulness, are ready to guide you and protect you, and the naturalists are ready to assist you in your intelligent understanding of the natural phenomena, the wild life, the history of the region, and help you enjoy yourself to your heart's content.

All these national parks west of the Mississippi were carved out of the public domain. In other words, the United States owned the land and set it aside for your public use, instead of letting it go for private use. Congressional appropriations are made annually to build and maintain good roads, put in camp grounds, provide for ranger and other service, good sanitation, good water, and the like.

East of the Mississippi there was no public domain from which such national parks could be created, for as the Atlantic seaboard was settled in the early days of our Republic, the land was taken up in private grants and no public land was left. Nor has the Congress by appropriation of public funds purchased national parks. Consequently establishment of national parks in areas in the East approved as to standards by the National Park Service had to be accomplished by donation of the lands from other sources. For instance, the beautiful Acadia National Park on the coast of Maine has been built up in its entirety by donation of lands or lands bought from funds donated by interested public-spirited men and women. In the Southern Appalachians the Great Smoky Mountains National Park, a mountain and forest empire of over 450 square miles, is being purchased by the States of North Carolina and Tennessee and citizens of those States, assisted by Mr.

John D. Rockefeller, Jr., who contributed through the Laura Spelman Rockefeller Memorial up to $5,000,000 in memory of his beloved mother. In the Blue Ridge Mountains of Virginia the Shenandoah National Park created under similar conditions with the assistance of the State of Virginia will shortly be tendered to the United States. In Kentucky earnest citizens of the State have been working for several years to complete the Mammoth Cave area acquisition and turn it over to the United States for use by the people of the Nation as a national park. The Isle Royale National Park project in Michigan will be acquired by that State, thereby adding 225 square miles of virgin wilderness to future opportunities of public enjoyment, health, recreation, and inspiration. The Everglades National Park bill is now before Congress, with the thorough approval of the National Park Service and the Interior Department, and we earnestly hope it will pass.

Within a comparatively short time therefore the eastern half of the country will have a series of national parks that will enable those who have seen the western parks or who cannot afford the time or money for a trip to them, to spend from a few days to a week or two in the finest scenic areas that the East can offer, and to ascertain by actual contact and experience just what this glorious country is doing through the National Park Service in providing for more enjoyable and abundant living in the great outdoors. Having worked in the mills and factories myself, I have often reflected upon the little time that the average citizen of the East has in making long-range excursions, and I think that these eastern national parks will assist him in planning his vacations.

But I should not dwell alone on the opportunities of scenic national parks. There are other magnificent and interesting areas under the National Park Service, my friends, of similar attractiveness to the traveler. These are the national monuments set aside by Executive order for historic or scientific purposes for perpetual preservation that have similar opportunities for public enjoyment and inspiration.

And during the reorganization of the park activities of the National Government last year, which were all consolidated in the National Park Service, all the national military and historical parks were transferred to the service, and are included in our earnest efforts to popularize them. Gettysburg, Morristown, Appomattox, Petersburg, Chancellorsville, Fredericksburg, Vicksburg, Yorktown, Kings Mountain, Custer Battlefield, Chalmette, Lookout Mountain, Jamestown Island and Williamsburg, Shiloh, and the galaxy of other places that make your heart throb with the memories of events that made history. Altogether there are at present 24 national parks, 1 national historical park, 11 national military parks, 4 miscellaneous memorials, 10 battlefield sites, and 67 national monuments under the jurisdiction of this office—certainly an array of opportunity for your interest and enjoyment. Scattered as these are all over the country, any prospective journey of yours will give you the opportunity of a delightful visit to one or more of these areas in whatever direction your inclinations and time at your disposal may tempt you.

This is national park year. You have learned from what I have said that no other country in the world has done for its people individually or collectively what our great country has in setting aside its grandest scenic and historical possessions. Each one of you owns an undivided interest in them. The great national objective these days is to see that "the people may have life and live it more abundantly." Whether you bunch your leisure into 2 weeks' vacation or take it in instalments of a day or two, the opportunities for utilizing it to the best advantage are in your own hands. Those of us who work for you in the National Park Service are all enthusiasts—happy over the opportunities for real public service in providing for your health, enjoyment, and inspiration in the midst of these wonderful surroundings. We want you to see these wonderlands of beauty, history, and inspiration. You will be welcome guests, and we want you to depart satisfied with what you saw and the service you received. Never has there been a better time to visit them than now. High-grade roads within and without the parks carry your motor cars speedily and easily to your destinations. Railroads all over the country are cooperating by attractive reduced rates and unexcelled service. Write the National Park Service, in care of the Interior Department, in Washington, for information concerning any parks you plan to visit, where they are, how to get there, and what to see after you have arrived. Make 1934 memorable in your lifetime by visiting one or more of them.

Good night.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 24 minutes p.m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, March 17, 1934, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

384. Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, dated March 13, 1934, submitting a report, together with accompanying papers, on a preliminary examination and survey of Bayou Chico, Fla., authorized by the River and Harbor Act approved September 22, 1922 (H.Doc. 286), was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

3045. By Mr. SUTPHIN: Petition of the New Jersey branch, second division, Railway Mail Association, protesting against enforced lay-off of regular postal employees and the curtailment of substitute employment; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

3046. By Mr. WERNER: Petition of citizens of Dell Rapids, S.Dak., urging passage of House bill 7019, providing a pension for the aged; to the Committee on Labor.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SATURDAY, MARCH 17, 1934

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Heavenly Father, be pleased to hear us as we fix our eyes upon the stars instead of on the streets. We beseech Thee to make this day memorable in cooperation, peace, and brotherhood. Bless us all with that music which comes when love flows in. Allow no treacherous desire, clinging pleasure, or cherished possession to keep us from the fulfillment of that responsibility which has called us to this Chamber. Take us and make us a power for good in the lives of others. Hold us, blessed Lord, to the realization that every good deed becomes a stone in that immortal temple which is awaiting us in the morning of eternity. Almighty God, open self-clouded eyes, wherever they are, and bless them with vision, good will, and mutual understanding. Bring peace, wonderful peace, to our whole country. O let it penetrate the mists of controversy and let it touch and brighten every industry. Merciful and All-Wise God, write it in letters of divine illumination across the sky of every section of our Republic. Gracious Father, may the resounding echo of "the good news" that was first proclaimed on a far-away shore and committed to the winds of Galilee come in Heaven's blessings upon all peoples. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

APPOINTMENT TO COMMITTEE

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution and ask its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 304

Resolved, That Mr. CULKIN, of New York, be, and he is hereby, elected a member of the Committee on Elections No. 2.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resolution will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is not a quorum present.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 108]

Lamneck	Muldowney	Steagall
Lanham	Norton	Stokes

The SPEAKER. Three hundred Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

On motion of Mr. BYRNS, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 8402) to place the cotton industry on a sound commercial basis, to prevent unfair competition and practices in putting cotton into the channels of interstate and foreign commerce, to provide funds for paying additional benefits under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman withhold his motion for a moment?

Mr. JONES. I withhold the motion.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, there was a tentative agreement between the majority leader and myself relative to the final vote on this bill. At the time we had this talk it was expected we would get up to ordering the previous question last night, would adjourn over today, and the final vote would come on Monday; but, like a good many of our plans, it miscarried.

May I inquire whether we can come to an agreement with the gentleman from Texas that if we get up to ordering the previous question today the final vote may go over until Monday?

I may say to the gentleman that, relying on our understanding, I have told a great many Members on this side that they were perfectly at liberty to go home until Monday morning, and it would be a great disappointment to them if the vote was forced today. May I inquire if we can come to some understanding in regard to this matter?

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the floor leader may have stated, but I told everyone who came to me that if we got to the point of a roll call last night I understood there would be no session today and in this event there would be no roll call until Monday. I also told every one of them that in the event we did not get up to that point last night we expected to complete the consideration of the bill today. Numerous Members have stayed here with this understanding. I think these facts were known to everyone. I have had a great many Members come to me, and I told them we would be forced to continue today. There could not be a roll call in any event on Monday because it is suspension day.

Mr. SNELL. That does not make any difference if we get up to the final vote. It could come up on Monday.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, may I say this, in justice to myself. I believe the gentleman from New York has made the statement that our agreement was based upon the expectation we would get to the previous question yesterday afternoon.

Mr. SNELL. That is correct.

Mr. BYRNS. I spoke to the gentleman from Alabama, and, of course, when we did not get to the previous question last night, our agreement did not hold.

Mr. SNELL. I agree that it does not hold, perhaps, 100 percent, but there was a general understanding and I gave the information to the Members on this side of the House that there would be no roll call today on this bill. I agree with what the gentleman from Tennessee has stated, that it was based primarily on getting to the previous question last night.

Mr. BYRNS. A number of Members spoke to me and I told them that the gentleman from Texas had stated to me that if we reached the previous question last night the understanding was that the vote would go over until Monday and would be had at 12 o'clock Monday, but it was always based on this premise.

Mr. SNELL. Why would it not amount to practically the same thing if we finish the bill today and ordered the previous question to let the final vote go over until Monday?

Mr. BYRNS. Personally, I have no objection, but that is for the gentleman from Texas to decide. The gentleman from Texas has charge of the bill.

Mr. SNELL. It seems to me there is a technical obligation to allow the vote to be taken on Monday.

Mr. JONES. It would have to go over until Tuesday, the Parliamentarian tells me. A roll call would not be automatic on Monday, so it would have to go over until Tuesday.

Mr. SNELL. That may be true, but I have always understood that when we get up to the previous question, regardless of what may be in order the next day, with the exception of Calendar Wednesday, this would be the unfinished business and would come up the first thing after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table. If the parliamentary clerk made a different statement I am not willing to agree with him at this time without further investigation. There is not anything specially sacred about Consent Calendar, and it is often laid aside for various kinds of business, and I believe the intent of the rules is to make this vote in order on Monday.

Mr. JONES. A half dozen Members have come to me and stated that they had planned to be away but had canceled their engagements with the understanding that we would finish the bill today.

Mr. SNELL. The question was not raised until about 6 o'clock last night that we were not going to finish. We did everything we could on this side to help the gentleman finish the bill to the previous-question stage.

Mr. BYRNS. I am under the impression that the situation would be to the contrary. My understanding was that if we reached the previous question last evening this would be unfinished business on Monday, so far as the roll call is concerned.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman from Texas yield to me?

Mr. JONES. I will, if I have the floor.

Mr. SNELL. I yield to the gentleman to make a statement.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, may I make this statement to the gentleman from New York and the other Members of the House? There was no agreement or understanding upon which the gentleman from New York had any right to rely that this bill would go over until next Tuesday for a final vote. On the contrary, when inquiries were made of the gentleman from Texas, the chairman of the committee, about this proposition I know he made the statement to several Members that if we did get up to a vote at the conclusion of the reading of the bill under the 5-minute rule it would be agreeable to let the bill go over. The gentleman from New York is against this bill.

Mr. SNELL. I admit that I am.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The proponents of this bill have a right to press for its passage. I may say to the gentleman from New York that time is the very essence of this whole cotton proposition. The planting season in some sections of the Cotton Belt has already begun.

Mr. SNELL. And they have already signed up and are going through under the voluntary agreement plan this year. The gentleman knows that is true.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman allow me to conclude my statement without losing his temper?

Mr. SNELL. I apologize to the gentleman.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The passage of this bill has been delayed from time to time. We first started consideration of the bill more than a week ago today.

The Members are here ready to vote upon this proposition. The gentleman from New York, because some of his friends who are opposed to this bill, went away without having any agreement upon which the gentleman could base any right to excuse them from attendance on this House, I do not believe has any right to ask the House, in view of the importance of the passage of this bill just as quickly as we can pass it, to agree to the request that he has made. I say this in the utmost good humor and good faith to my friend from New York.

It so happens that I appear as the author of this bill, but all the gentlemen from the South who know the importance of speed and expedition will agree with me that we ought to go ahead and conclude the consideration of this bill and pass it today. I feel the chairman of the committee is inclined to pursue this course, and I hope he will go ahead and finish the consideration of the bill so that we may vote on it and pass it.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman really mean that I had no right to tell these people, after I had had a talk with the majority leader and the chairman of the committee, who made exactly the same statement I did, that if the previous question were ordered it would go over? There is no emergency now that was not in existence when we made this agreement, and we made the agreement that if we finished consideration of the bill last night the vote would go over until Monday, and I think I was entirely within my rights to do as I did.

Mr. BANKHEAD. But there was no agreement made, and the chairman has reiterated this morning his statement and upon that statement the gentleman from New York had no right to assume that this measure would not be voted upon today.

Mr. SNELL. If we cannot rely upon that kind of tentative agreement, we cannot rely on any agreement that is made tentatively on both sides of the House.

Mr. BANKHEAD. There has been no breach of good faith, if that is what the gentleman is undertaking to say.

Mr. BYRNS. Let me say to my friend from Alabama that there was a positive agreement that if we finished consideration of this bill yesterday the vote would go over. This announcement was made.

Mr. SNELL. And I am basing my statement on that announcement, and I want to say further that it was not the opposition on this side that delayed getting the bill up to the previous-question stage yesterday. The opposition came from the gentleman's own cotton men in the South.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Nevertheless it was opposition.

Mr. SNELL. It was not opposition on our side.

Mr. BANKHEAD. And it delayed the consideration of this bill.

Mr. SNELL. We cooperated so far as we could to get the bill up to the previous question, and if you are going to go back on that tentative agreement, there will be some opposition on this side today.

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the chairman of the committee yield for a question?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. I desire to ask the gentleman if it would cause any more delay to carry this discussion on until we get to the point where we can take a vote and let it go over until Monday than it would if we had done the same thing yesterday afternoon?

Mr. JONES. I may say to the gentleman that the disposition to delay and continue to delay makes it all the more important that we get early action. The vote would not come until Tuesday, according to the ruling.

Mr. BYRNS. I want to find out about that. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BYRNS. Suppose this bill should reach the previous-question stage today and a roll call be ordered, would the roll call be in order at 12 o'clock on Monday?

The SPEAKER. The Chair reads from Cannon's Procedure, referring to the call of the Consent Calendar on Monday, which includes suspensions:

It (the calling of the Consent Calendar) also has precedence of contested-election cases and unfinished business coming over from the previous day with the previous question ordered.

If the previous question is ordered today, the vote will come Tuesday.

Mr. SNELL. Not until Tuesday?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the quotation just read is based on a decision by Mr. Speaker Gillett, reported in Hinds' Precedents. Mr. Gillett's decision does not go as far as that. What Mr. Speaker Gillett held was that it was discretionary, and that the vote was of equal privilege with the calling of the Consent Calendar, and therefore it would be in the discretion of the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Since the rule is mandatory, we would have to go ahead with the consideration of the Consent Calendar.

Mr. SNELL. It would not have made any difference if we had finished last night, because the vote would not have come until Tuesday, and therefore we have not lost anything. If we had ordered the previous question last night the final vote would not have come until Tuesday, and the gentleman from Alabama and the gentleman from Texas admit that they agreed to that.

Mr. JONES. I told everyone who came to me and spoke to me about it that if we did not order the previous question last night I must insist on finishing the bill today. This was made just as clear as the English language could make it whenever I made any statement about it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. And, moreover, as the gentleman has suggested, a great number of men who had personal engagements and wanted to leave the city, stayed over on that assurance from the gentleman.

Mr. JONES. Yes; one from Georgia and one from Ohio, as well as a number of others.

Mr. SNELL. Well, it is in your hands; if you insist, of course, you can do it, but I want to give you fair notice that next time you want to make an agreement, you will have some trouble.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RICH. If there is an understanding between the majority leader and the minority leader and the rules are somewhat different, is there any honor in this House in trying to have a vote not as agreed upon between the majority and minority leaders?

The SPEAKER. That is a private matter. The Speaker is going to follow the rules.

The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey demands a division.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Chair withhold that until I make a unanimous request. As far as I am concerned, I have stated my position, but in view of the misunderstanding, I ask unanimous consent that when we get to the previous question this matter be allowed to go over until Monday, and that the vote be the first business in order on Monday after the disposition of business on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, on yesterday I planned to go to Georgia last night. I was told that if the bill was not concluded last night we would have to come here today and it would be finally concluded today. I canceled my reservation and did not go to Georgia. Now I feel, since I have been required to do that, and a number of others have been required to cancel their engagements, that we should conclude this bill today, and I am going to object.

The division was then completed.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, before the announcement of the vote is made, I should like to prefer my request again. I ask unanimous consent that when we reach the previous question on this bill that it go over until next Monday and be the first thing in order after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of matters on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the vote on the bill after the previous question is ordered shall come on Monday immediately after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table. Is there objection?

Mr. TRUAX. Reserving the right to object, and I am not going to object. I should like to make an observation. I asked the majority leader and the chairman of the committee if we were going to have a vote on the bill today, and I am sure they answered "yes." Now, I am willing to go along with them in their effort to harmonize and agree with the minority, but I stayed over, as did my colleague, Mr. PARKER, of Georgia. If other gentlemen did not stay over, that is no reason for deferring the vote.

Mr. BOILEAU. Reserving the right to object, this is an important bill, and Members ought to be here anyway.

Mr. PARKER. Further reserving the right to object, out of deference to the author of the bill, and the author of the bill in the Senate, the Chairman of the Agricultural Committee in the House and the Democratic floor leader in the House, I have concluded not to offer an objection to the unanimous-consent request.

The SPEAKER. On this question the ayes are 104 and the noes are 48.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. HILL of Alabama in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

DESTRUCTION OF MEANS OF IDENTIFICATION

SEC. 11. Every person emptying or breaking any bale stamped, tagged, or otherwise identified under the provisions of this act shall, at the time of emptying or breaking such bale, destroy the bale tag.

Mr. MCGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman already has that privilege.

Mr. MCGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I firmly believe that today the Cotton Belt is being stricken down in the house of its friends. I do not for one moment question the utmost sincerity of any Member of this House who is supporting this bill. I believe that Members from the Southland supporting the bill believe that they are taking the course which will best meet a desperate situation in the South, but, my friends, as surely as we live today, what we are actually doing if this bill is enacted into law is, by law, taking away the world market for cotton from the South and giving it to other countries of the world. Say what you please, the Southland must go up or down on the world price of cotton, unless the Southland is willing to depopulate itself. Cotton is a crop of which we normally export 60 percent. To reduce production so that it will better the price of a commodity, the price of which is determined by the world price, compels a reduction in production down to American consumption. You cannot reduce the production of cotton by 60 percent. It has been said that this State or the other will not cooperate with other States and, therefore, it is necessary to have this legislation. Very well. If one Southern State will not cooperate with another Southern State, I ask you, How are you going to obtain cooperation with the other countries of the world? You are dealing with an export product, and you are about to make the same mistake that England made with rubber. England thought that she could reduce her rubber production and force up the world price of rubber, and in doing it she lost her market to other countries; and just as surely as you reduce the production of cotton by force of law, just so surely will you increase the production of cotton in Brazil, Egypt, and other countries of the world.

The enactment of this bill means that you are selling away the opportunities of citizens of the Southland to produce cotton and giving their opportunity to the citizens of other countries. This cannot be the salvation for cotton. It can only mean taking away from a great part of your people the opportunity to make a livelihood. The hope of cotton is to be found in money. It is the one commodity that has profited by a reduction in the value of the dollar, because we have an export market. Cotton stands alone in that respect among the principal farm commodities of this country. I do not know whether or not we can ever reduce wheat production to American consumption, but so long as we have produced 20-percent surplus of wheat the price of wheat in this country has been largely controlled by the price of wheat in the world. If you reduce your cotton 40 percent, then you are in the same position that wheat has been in, as you will still have a 20-percent surplus. You cannot reduce the production of cotton 60 percent.

The Committee for the Nation has put out the figures, which every Member of the House has received, and those figures tell the story. I should be glad to join in this legislation if it would be of benefit to the Cotton Belt, but it cannot be of any lasting benefit to the Cotton Belt. It will only destroy it; and this legislation you are about to heap on the Southland will bring economic destruction greater than that experienced during the reconstruction period following the Civil War, and yet it is being done by those representing that section. I realize it is being done in despair.

The following recent statements from the Committee for the Nation substantiate the statements I have here made:

BANKHEAD BILL

The Bankhead bill, making cotton acreage reduction compulsory, proposes a fate-changing turn on the road to regimentation. If given any degree of permanence, it might easily bring upon our cotton growers the same disaster that the Stephenson plan brought upon rubber producers of the British Empire.

The decision is so momentous that we request your consideration of the attached statistics.

Cotton is the most important raw material in our country's economic life. We have exported $23,000,000,000 worth since 1884, approximately $458,000,000 per annum. Of all United States exports cotton accounted for 21½ percent. The United States created the cotton-growing industry, our greatest economic heritage. The inventive genius, the labor, the lives, the production plant of four generations of building are invested in it.

Are we going to sacrifice that position? Are we going to repeat the blunder of the British with rubber?

When the British put the Stephenson plan into effect they had 68 percent of world rubber production. A few years later, when rubber restriction ended in complete failure, the British percentage had been reduced to 53. The stimulus given to non-British production further reduced British supremacy until today they have only 50 percent of the world's production and their competitors have advanced from 32 to 50 percent.

Similar reactions to our cotton restriction have already set in. Egypt immediately increased her planting. Cables tell us that this year's crop will exceed last year's by 450,000 bales. At 12 cents a pound, this means the transfer of $27,000,000 of production and purchasing power from the United States. Argentina is urging her farmers to grow more cotton. Brazil, the greatest potential competitor of the United States, has land, climate, and facilities to produce 10,000,000 to 15,000,000 bales a year.

WHAT IS THE SENSIBLE COURSE FOR US?

Ever since the Civil War England and other countries have tried to start competitive cotton production in their colonies in order to be independent of United States supply. In 1884 the United States produced 78.9 percent of the world's cotton; our position as a world producer was already so weakened that we produced in 1933 only 51.7 percent. Shall we let it go to 35 percent or less?

With the rest of the world disposed to take advantage of our curtailment to increase its acreage, it is apparent that our sacrifice would prove to be futile so far as it might affect world prices in terms of gold.

AMERICA SHOULD CHOOSE

Secretary Wallace says America is at the fork of the road and must choose—"fated for grave adjustments, with no chance to turn back."

He recommends taking the planned middle course of regimentation on which the Department of Agriculture has started.

We believe that course leads inevitably to the extreme left, to abandonment of our inherited institutions, to a completely socialized state. Is that America's choice? Do we realize what it means?

The alternative is prompt restoration of our price level through immediate increase in the price of gold ($41.34 an ounce is needed). That would end the need for regimentation. That course leads to our historic institutions of freedom that gave us the greatest wealth and power ever enjoyed by any nation.

A much greater degree of price restoration could be effected if regimenting enthusiasts and monetary conservatives were not again opposing and delaying the gold-repricing policy. That policy has worked, but it has not been carried far enough. Basic commodities, as a group, have followed the increased price of gold. But our price of $35 an ounce is not high enough to offset world-wide increase in the value of gold, that caused commodity prices to fall.

Australia, New Zealand, Denmark, Argentina, China, Japan—whose competition helps to fix world prices and influences our domestic price level—have a price of gold equivalent to $42 to $45 an ounce, or more.

Instead of recognizing the need to give American agriculture world equality the middle course attempts to create value by scarcity and nonproduction.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro formula amendment. If my good friend from Kansas [Mr. McGugin] knew anything about the cotton proposition in this country and foreign countries, he would not have made the statement that he made a moment ago. The only thing that we are attempting to do under this bill is to get away with that large surplus that has accumulated, to the amount of around 10,000,000 bales to 12,000,000 bales of cotton. If we can succeed in doing that this year and bring us back to a normal surplus, of anywhere from two million to three and a half million bales, our exports will continue, as they have in the past, when we had a normal surplus carry-over. We have heard much about foreign countries taking from this country the growing of cotton because of reducing production in the United States. When we had a fair price for cotton and a normal surplus we had just as large exports as we have at this time, or practically so, and this will continue if we get rid of this large surplus that we are carrying over at this time. We are not trying to reduce production below the normal average. We would not think of doing this. We are proposing to get rid of a large and unwieldy surplus so as to get on a usual normal basis.

Someone mentioned about the success of the program this year in reducing the surplus. My friends, we were able to reduce the surplus this year; however, not by reducing production, but by plowing under 4,000,000 bales of perfectly good American cotton that was just about ready to be harvested. We propose under this bill now to cut production this year around 3,000,000 to 4,000,000 bales, by restricting acreage and baleage; in the meantime, if we succeed, we will still have on hand a large surplus—something like 5,000,000 to 6,000,000 bales. It may be, if we have a good demand for cotton goods because of the increase of the purchasing power of the people, that we will not have to put the bill into operation next year. In the meantime, if we are successful in doing what we hope to do under this bill and bring about a fair price we would be able to cut out the processing tax in 1935-36.

May I state, if we are able to bring back normal prosperity, we need not worry about our production. The demand that we would have from millions of people who have not been able to buy their actual needs for the past few years, it is my belief that we will have to increase production perhaps around 20,000,000 bales within the next few years.

If this Congress will do the thing that Congress should have done years ago, that which we have done for other industries in this country, namely, putting a tariff duty on foreign imports of jute, jute products, and other foreign fibers that come in direct competition with cotton, we would not be calling on the Congress today to pass this bill. India, the next largest cotton-producing country to the United States in the world, is importing annually into this country a sufficient amount of jute and jute products whereby, pound for pound, if we had full control of our own market for cotton, we would be able to consume from 2,000,000 to 3,000,000 bales. I have been trying to bring this about, and yet some of my friends from the South, just as in this instance, stand up and argue and vote against the proposition that would mean millions to the South, in line with what other sections of the country have been able to get under the tariff policy largely at the expense of the South.

Mr. McGUGIN. I have favored a tariff on jute, but every time we get into that controversy there seems to be an immeasurable amount of opposition coming from the Cotton Belt. Is that not right?

Mr. FULMER. I appreciate that. As far as the tariff proposition is concerned, I am against unreasonable tariff rates for any industry or any group in this country, but when it comes to importing any commodity into this country in competition with American products produced in a factory or on the farm from other countries, I am absolutely interested in placing a tariff or tax on same, whereby we may be able to compete and have at least an equal chance on our own markets. I think the gentleman from Kansas in speaking against this bill, which proposes to control production, is not voicing the sentiment of the entire membership of the State of Kansas. I am sure a great many Members from Kansas stood on the floor of this House during the past session arguing for quite a while for the restriction of the production of oil in his State. I want to say to the gentleman if that would be good for his people who produce oil, certainly this would be good for our people who produce cotton.

Mr. GLOVER. Will the gentleman yield?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent the gentleman's time may be extended for 1 additional minute that I may ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. GLOVER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGugin] comes from a wheat section. I doubt if the gentleman knows anything at all about cotton or the character of land we have. The lands that we are planting in cotton today, if put back into wheat in competition with the gentleman's State, will grow just as fine wheat as any land in the gentleman's State, will it not?

Mr. FULMER. In answer to that I will say that I have produced on my own farm 34 bushels of wheat per acre.

Mr. GLOVER. And we have got land in Arkansas that will produce 50 bushels to the acre.

Mr. McGUGIN. You cannot do that, because the right of an American citizen to produce wheat has been taken away from him by the allotment plan.

Mr. FULMER. Unless we have a fair price for our cotton, we will have to go into those things. We will have to go into the dairy business and into wheat farming, and various other lines that would be in competition with other States and other sections. We do not want to do anything that will interfere with the program in any other States or sections. If you will give us a fair price for cotton, you will find that we will not go into the other fields of production, but, on the other hand, we will buy from you.

Mr. McGUGIN. No; if you can get 12 cents a pound for cotton, you will not go into the wheat business or the hog business at 3 cents a pound.

Mr. FULMER. Much has been said about this bill operating against the small farmer or the share cropper. Let me give you a concrete case—15 acres of cotton is considered a small cotton farm. The normal production on 15 acres would be 10 bales of cotton. Suppose you cut the acreage and the baleage 40 percent, as contemplated under the 1934-35 program, and under this bill. This would give the farmer 9 acres of cotton and, on the same basis of production, 6 bales of cotton.

If we do not pass this bill and produce 15,000,000 bales of cotton, as we will do, cotton will sell for 5 or 6 cents per pound. Ten bales at this price would amount to $300. While, on the other hand, if we are able to carry out the 1934-35 program, as applied to acreage reduction, and put into operation this bill which proposes to control cotton on a baleage basis, this would be the picture in the case of this farmer—6 bales, averaging 500 pounds, at 15 cents per pound—perhaps it would be more—would amount to $450 in all, or $150 more than this farmer would have received if he had planted the regular acreage of 15 acres. In the meantime, he would receive from the Government rents for the 6 acres and would be permitted to plant other crops for his own use, which many farmers should do, especially colored farmers. He would not have to buy fertilizer for the 6 acres taken out of cotton production, which would be a saving of from $30 to $60, also.

This would apply equally in every case. For instance, a farmer planting 5 acres or in the case of a farmer planting 1,000 acres. Certainly, if this bill will increase the purchasing power of the farmer that I have just referred to, under the program and under this legislation, $200, and not at the expense of the Government, this would indicate that the program and this bill are meritorious.

Our people want this legislation. We need it, and not only will this bill accomplish what I have just stated, but it will prove a great help to every other section of this country because of the increased purchasing power of that great section of the South, enabling them to buy farm products from the West and manufactured goods from the industrial centers, where today they are in just about as deplorable condition as our people are in.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to take up any long time in debate, but I should like sufficient time to make a connected statement. I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. BUSBY. Very well. I see the spirit of the proponents of the bill. That is perfectly all right.

Mr. JONES. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. GLOVER. If the gentleman just wants 10 minutes, without obstructing the passage of this bill, I will not object.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman has assured me that he only desires to speak for 10 minutes in opposition to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Busby]?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that we cannot rise in opposition to this bill without incurring the ire of some gentleman who is overenthusiastic about it. I am sorry that, in order to express myself on what I sincerely believe to be the right course to pursue in regard to this legislation, I may have to incur your displeasure by suggesting the absence of a quorum. I apologize for all of that and assert that I have the utmost good intentions in all of my activities here.

Now, if you will let me have your attention for a few moments, we approach this subject of cotton growing as if it were a local matter. Cotton is produced all over the world. The United States in 1933 produced the lowest percentage it has ever produced in the history of the cotton-growing industry. The amount of cotton produced in the United States was 51.7 percent of the world production in 1933. As late as 1884 the United States produced 4 out of 5 bales of cotton that was grown in the world. Today we have drifted down to where we produce practically 1 out of 2.

Cotton moves in the world market. The only difference in the price of cotton in Liverpool and New York is the amount of the freight on the cotton between Liverpool and New York. If cotton should go higher in New York than in Liverpool by the amount of the freight and a sizable addition, they ship cotton from Liverpool back to New York for the profit. In other words, the price in all cotton markets is the same, measured by gold, by weight, and that is the way you pay international exchange, except the freight between the place where the cotton happens to be and where it is delivered. So a number of gentlemen seem to think that the farm legislation last year caused the price of cotton to rise. What first caused the price of cotton to rise was our going off the gold standard. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Doxey] asked me practically that question yesterday. As soon as the United States Government cut loose from the gold standard, the dollar began to depreciate in terms of foreign currencies. The purchasers of cotton who had long delayed coming to our market began to come and buy cotton, and before any legislation was enacted cotton had reached 12 cents a pound last year. That is about as high as it has gone this year, with all of the plans that have been put into effect by the Department of Agriculture. After purchasers supplied their needs very well, cotton drifted back to 8½ cents.

Then the Government said, "We will see that it is 10 cents if we have to put up the money to do it." So they issued from the Treasury enough funds to put cotton up to 10 cents a pound by making loans on it at that price. That is why it went back to 10 cents, and not because of any acreage reduction, but because of direct loans. Then the Government said to the people who grow cotton down in my State and in other sections, "If you will not grow cotton on this land, or if you plow up what you have grown, we will pay you $113,000,000." That was not for cotton, but to plow up cotton and let the land lie out and produce nothing. That is a part of the prosperity we have been experiencing, a prosperity which we think we ought to have, and we thank you taxpayers for giving it to us, just as the corn growers and the hog growers thank the taxpayers for giving them their prosperity for destroying food products so much needed by millions of starving people throughout the world. But don't let anybody mislead you that we sold anything for it. We just went out and plowed up a great portion of the cotton crop that we would have made.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. I yield.

Mr. FISH. I am very much interested in the gentleman's statement. It is a very able statement. Does the gentleman think the Government will not get back any of this $113,000,000?

Mr. BUSBY. It will not get back any of that, because it does not represent anything. It is dead cotton stalks and vacant land.

Mr. DOXEY. Now will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BUSBY. I yield.

Mr. DOXEY. Does not the gentleman know that under the A.A.A., the processing tax on cotton is taking care of all benefit payments as well as the cost of administration?

Mr. BUSBY. That may be true.

Mr. DOXEY. If that is true, the gentleman's statement does not bear out the facts when he says we are giving something to the cotton farmer.

Mr. BUSBY. All right; I say this—

Mr. DOXEY. I do not want to take up the gentleman's time arguing, but I want him to answer both sides.

Mr. BUSBY. I shall be glad to answer it. Does the gentleman see any value in the cotton that was turned under which is rotting along with the stalks? I should like for the gentleman to tell me what value there is there.

Mr. DOXEY. That method cut production and raised the price.

Mr. BUSBY. We will never get that same thing back; it is destroyed.

Now, let me show the next step. After we went off the gold standard our dollar drifted down almost 40 percent; and with that cheapened money the foreign buyer was very glad to come in and buy when he got 40 percent more for his money. The result was that the cheapening of our money increased the price of cotton 40 percent.

Let us see how it works. In 1932 a British cotton buyer would ask me: "What will you take for your bale of cotton?"

We would say, "Ten pounds."

"All right; I will give it."

Ten pounds at $3.25 a pound would make him pay $32.80 for the bale of cotton. If he should come to me today and ask me what we would sell cotton for and was told £10, this, at $5.10 a pound, would mean that he would pay $51 for a bale. That is about the way cotton runs in the market.

The price of cotton was very largely fixed by the reduction in the gold content of the dollar; and before that, before the gold content was reduced, in the depreciation of the currency.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINGS. If the decrease in the value of the dollar increased the price of cotton, why did it not increase the price of hogs?

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one further question?

Mr. BUSBY. I hope you gentlemen will let me go on.

Mr. DOXEY. Did not cotton rise before the gold content of the dollar was reduced?

Mr. BUSBY. The price of cotton began to rise as soon as we went off the gold standard. When we went off the gold standard our money depreciated to a level of about 62 percent of what it was before we left the gold standard. Later it was fixed at 59.06 cents of what it was under the old gold standard.

Cotton is the most important raw material in our country's economic life. We have exported $23,000,000,000 worth since 1884, approximately $458,000,000 per annum. Of all United States exports, cotton accounted for 21½ percent. The United States created the cotton-growing industry—our greatest economic heritage. The inventive genius, the labor, the lives, the production plant of four generations of building are invested in it.

When the British put the Stephenson plan into effect they had 68 percent of world rubber production. A few years later, when rubber restriction ended in complete failure, the British percentage had been reduced to 53. The stimulus given to non-British production further reduced British supremacy until today they have only 50 percent of the world's production and their competitors have advanced from 32 to 50 percent.

Similar reactions to our cotton restriction have already set in. Egypt immediately increased her planting. Cables tell us that this year's crop will exceed last year's by 450,000 bales. At 12 cents a pound, this means the transfer of $27,000,000 of production and purchasing power from the United States. Argentina is urging her farmers to grow more cotton. Brazil, the greatest potential competitor of the United States, has land, climate, and facilities to produce ten to fifteen million bales a year.

Ever since the Civil War England and other countries have tried to start competitive cotton production in their colonies in order to be independent of United States' supply. In 1884 the United States produced 78.9 percent of the world's cotton; our position as a world producer was already so weakened that we produced in 1933 only 51.7 percent. Shall we let it go to 35 percent or less?

During the past 4 years the gold value of basic commodities has dropped from 100 to 44, due to a panic-like struggle for the possession of gold coupled with nonuse of gold during the war and a deficiency in the amount of gold produced compared with other commodities. For all gold currencies, this brought about the sharpest and greatest decline in prices ever recorded.

TWO COURSES ARE OPEN TO US

Cotton, as other basic raw materials with an international market, has the same value in terms of gold—except for differences of freight—the world over. If we could make cotton scarce enough the world over we could raise its value all over the world in terms of gold. But experience teaches that attempts to change the gold value of world basic commodities always fail. If a 15-percent reduction were required, and other nations left their half of the total production unchanged, we should have to reduce our 50 by 30 percent in order to reduce the world production by 15 percent.

With the rest of the world disposed to take advantage of our curtailment to increase its acreage, it is apparent that our sacrifice would prove to be futile so far as it might affect world prices in terms of gold.

MUST WE RESIGN OURSELVES TO A POSITION OF PERMANENT INFERIORITY IN COTTON GROWING?

When prices fall men instinctively think there must be too much of everything. Actually, we have had the sharpest decrease ever recorded in total average tonnage of all things produced. Because of defects in our money and media of exchange, prices have fallen, economic groups are no longer able to trade with each other. Hence, there is lack of purchasing power.

BECAUSE PEOPLE ARE UNABLE TO BUY WHAT THEY NEED, SURPLUSES PILE UP

We buy fewer shirts; the housewife uses up the household reserves of sheeting; the store carries less in stock; the mills, smaller reserves of cotton; and what cotton is on hand appears as a huge surplus.

We know that if there is too much of one product prices fall, and we therefore believe that a fall of all prices—which is really of monetary origin—also arises from too much. Questions of money and media of exchange are difficult to understand. Few are willing to give the time and study needed to trace through to the lack of purchasing power caused by a break-down in bank credit, media of exchange, and defects in our money. Hence, out of the delusion that there is too much of everything a crowd psychosis develops that makes us resort to expedients like killing pigs and dumping them into the Mississippi River, plowing under cotton, and forcing nonproduction of cotton for the future as a remedy for our difficulties.

RAISE THE PRICE OF GOLD

The alternative: Instead of attempting the futile effort to change the gold value of cotton in the world by destroying our own production, we can raise the price of gold in terms of our paper dollar so that even though a bale of cotton is worth a smaller amount of gold it will be worth the same number of dollars. This is the simple, common-sense course that Australia adopted to recover her prosperity. She has a price of gold equivalent to $42 per ounce. This is the course of Argentina, with a price of gold of $47 per ounce. Denmark, New Zealand, Brazil, Japan, and the silver-using countries all have a price of gold of $42 to $47 or more per ounce.

In 1926 a bale of cotton was worth 5 ounces of gold; now only 1¾ ounces. At $20.67 an ounce for gold, this meant $103 per bale, 20 cents per pound in 1926; and if we had kept our old price for gold it would still mean $36.07 per bale, or 7.2 cents per pound for cotton.

Because we raised our price of gold to $35 an ounce, a bale of cotton—1¾ ounces of gold—is worth $61.25, or 12¼ cents per pound.

At $41.34 an ounce, the maximum authorized by Congress, 1¾ ounces of gold would bring $72.34, making cotton worth 14.47 cents a pound.

In Argentina, where a grow-more-cotton campaign is now under way, the price of gold in free pesos is $55.87 per ounce, and a bale of cotton—1¾ ounces—is worth $96.10, or the equivalent, in the money in which the Argentine farmer must pay debts and taxes, of 19.22 cents per pound.

Our cotton growers are held in a strait-jacket of deflation bondage of low prices for their product, obliged to pay rent, interest, freight, fixed charges in a dollar with 40-percent excess of purchasing power. No wonder they cannot compete. No wonder their unrest leads them to call for false remedies.

The administration can at any time increase the price of gold to $41.34. This would immediately add 2.2 cents per pound, $11 per bale, or $100,000,000 to the value of the proposed restricted 9,000,000-bale crop.

Last year the administration withheld this remedy and used $100,000,000 of tax-paid money to put the cotton producers into a strait-jacket of bureaucratic control. Had the price of gold been raised promptly, as other nations have done, the cotton growers would have received $100,000,000, and much more, and not have their world position impaired.

The gold equivalent of this year's agricultural production will be about 200,000,000 ounces. An increase of $6.34 per ounce would add $1,250,000,000 to the income of the farmers of the United States. There is no question about this. Secretary Morgenthau, in his testimony before the Banking and Currency Committee, stated that raising the price of gold has lifted agricultural prices proportionately in a satisfactory way.

The sterlingaria dependencies—countries using the English pound as a base for their currency—producing raw materials and agricultural products, Australia, New Zealand, Argentina, Denmark, have a price of gold from $42 to $45. Why do we follow the urging of deflationary banking advisers in New York and London to tie our dollar to the English pound at $5.10 instead of the pound of Australia, New Zealand, and the currencies of Denmark and Argentina, which today stand at $4.08 compared with the historical $4.86 sterling ratio to the dollar?

MISGUIDED REMEDIES

We and our children may look back with sadness in the not distant future upon the misguided remedies that we now resort to because we lack the courage to correct our monetary maladjustment. We must not allow ourselves to be intimidated in the face of ignorant or selfish deflationary advice.

When we awake to the futility of a cotton-restriction program that we have embarked upon we may find ourselves with 40 or 35 percent of the world's production, with our dominance of four generations of building undermined and forever destroyed.

The simple, sensible expedient of adequately raising the price of gold will give our farmers income and at the same time protect America's historic position as a producing factor in the world.

DESTROYING FOOD AND CLOTHING DOES NOT FEED AND CLOTHE THE NEEDY

Certainly we can divide only the wealth that exists. Non-production and destruction of wealth and necessary food and fiber in a world partly hungry and unclothed will give us a smaller total to divide, which means necessarily less for each individual.

The more quickly we lift the price of gold to $41.34, the more powerful will be the forces of recovery. Rising values will again permit agriculture and industry to make a profit. This would release incentives to increase employment and broaden activity of every kind.

The recovery forces should be intensified at once by a $41.34 price of gold. If for any reason this is not obtainable, the least the administration should do is to order an immediate increase of $2 an ounce and bring the price up to $41.34 before the seasonal summer let-down.

I want to call attention to the situation of the man down in my district who owns 1 mule and who has always produced 2 bales of cotton every year. He does not owe anybody; he meets his obligations; he takes care of his family; and he sells his cotton when and wherever he pleases. If this bill passes, that same man must come here to the Secretary of Agriculture and get a permit to produce those same two bales of cotton, and the Secretary will tell him he can produce but one and a half. The man will say that he is not going to pay any attention to that; he goes ahead, raises and markets two bales of cotton, and puts the money in his pocket. That man is faced with the following provision of this bill:

Any person who violates any provision of this act, or any regulation promulgated under this act, shall on conviction be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment for not exceeding 2 years, or both.

Mr. Chairman, does not that penalty apply to this man unless he gets a permit from the Secretary of Agriculture at Washington and proceeds under the direction of the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. JONES. That is the extreme penalty that may be applied; but we are going to take that penalty out of the section and make the maximum penalty for violation a fine of $200.

Mr. BUSBY. Even at that he will have to alter his ways and give up his civil rights; he cannot proceed as he has in the past; they take his property away from him and put him in jail.

Mr. JONES. Not at all.

Mr. DOXEY. Will he not get twice as much for his bale and a half of cotton as he formerly did for his two bales?

Mr. BUSBY. I say he will not. He may get 12½ percent increase if the foreigners do not increase their production, which they will. When we make it possible for the foreign producer to receive additional prices for his cotton he will put in more land and will produce that which we have failed to produce here; he will supply London, Liverpool, and the world market; and we, like the rubber people, will lose the market that was once ours.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. I yield.

Mr. McGUGIN. The question was asked why the price of hogs had not gone up with the decrease in the gold content of the dollar, although the Englishman would pay us more for cotton. The answer is because there is no market in England for our hogs.

Mr. BUSBY. Absolutely; everybody understands that.

Now, in conclusion, you think you are giving the South something they want. It is like some patent medicines; you read the label and decide it will be good for you, but when you take the medicine it does not work. You passed the A.A.A. bill and then say you must have the Tugwell bill. This is another Tugwell bill, with Tugwell socialistic principles taking liberty from the masses of the people. Under this Tugwell bill you arrange to put men in jail for growing and selling cotton as they have been doing all their lives.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I am going to leave cotton out of the picture, and other farm commodities out of the picture, and say a word in reference to the principle underlying this bill and similar legislation that is being considered in and passed by this Congress.

The main objection to this bill and all legislation of this type is that it will produce a regimented order of society. This is the principal objection, but the objection fails to take into consideration the economic and industrial conditions and the causes of these conditions, which, in my opinion, make legislation of this type not merely a matter of choice but a matter of necessity.

These conditions are that new and revolutionary methods and appliances in business, in agriculture, and in industry are constantly, increasingly, and permanently displacing the man power of society. We must devise new methods to spread the load out over the system and the machine if we are to avoid a complete and permanent breakdown in our economic structure and a large permanently idle and pauperized social element living on the dole of the fortunates who are employed. The system and the machine are putting the farmer out on the highway among the unemployed just as rapidly as the laboring man. It takes the bookkeeper from his stool; it takes the clerk from behind the counter; it takes the telephone girl from the switchboard; it is throwing the white collar into the discard along with the horny hands and the overalls; and, as I say, it displaces the farmer in just as rapidly increasing numbers and just as effectually as it does the laboring man.

Here is how I view this legislation. This may be a vision, but without vision people perish. My idea with respect to all of these set-ups under the National Recovery Act and the Agricultural Adjustment Act is that they are forms in which is being poured the mix of a new system of relationships between industry, agriculture, commerce, and the consuming public, and that when this mix has become sufficiently hardened these forms may be taken down and the completed structure continue to carry on through its own strength and weight and the necessity of having such a new and adjusted system of relationships in this country.

I am not in favor of a permanent governmental bureaucracy and having the farmer live with a policeman at his elbow, but I recognize the necessity for doing something, and such legislation as this is at least an experiment and, in my judgment, an experiment in the right direction. If this legislation fails, we must resort to something else; and may I say, in all good faith, to the gentlemen opposing this bill, that if these experiments fail I am afraid that what succeeds them may be less acceptable than the acceptance of this temporary Government control over production, distribution, and labor that we are under the necessity of having in this country if we are to return to prosperity and secure relief from the intolerable condition which has made one fourth of the people of this country dependent upon public bounty.

The Agricultural Adjustment Act, under which this bill is drawn, is, in fact, the counterpart in agriculture of the Industrial Recovery Act in industry. They are counterparts of the same plan. The one is an adaptation of the plan to industry, and the other to agriculture. The plan in agriculture is based on recognition of the fact that the mass production made possible by the machine must be controlled and regulated, so that supply may be kept somewhere within the bounds of demand, while at the same time the producer gets at least the cost of production plus a reasonable profit out of his investment and his labor. In industry it regulates output, restrains ruinous competition, spreads labor, and fixes prices and wages. The facts must be faced. Shouting "Moscow" and jeering at the term "planned and managed economic system", will not solve the situation.

Let me give one illustration of what agriculture is up against, and another of the problem facing industry.

As illustrative of the revolution which has occurred in agriculture, I might recount my observations on a recent visit to central Kansas, where two brothers have adjoining farms were harvesting their wheat. Between them they had about 600 acres. Three men were harvesting this crop. One drove the tractor, another operated the combine which was equipped with a 60-bushel tank, and the third ran a truck up and down the highway between the wheat field and the elevator.

With the aid of an electric headlight, they worked far into the night and in 10 days put 600 acres of wheat into the bins. My brothers stood under the trees. There was nothing for them to do, but their time was a charge on the crop. I worked in those same fields as a boy, when it would have taken 30 men the same length of time to harvest that crop of wheat and 30 more an additional length of time to thresh and haul it to town. In the fall a tractor pulling a rod in width of plows prepares the ground for the next crop, and such machines now also plant as well as plow.

This is the picture of mass production by machinery in wheat. The harvest hand is gone. The cotton picker is going. Cows are milked by machinery. Printing is a dying trade. Telephones are self-operative. Accounts are kept by machinery. The machine is self-created. It digs its own raw materials out of the ground, transports it to the manufacturing plant, manufactures itself and operates itself. Every day in every way, on the farm, in the factory, in the mine, in every branch of work, the need for human labor becomes less and less. Even before the crash of 1929 and during the era which is often referred to as the most prosperous in the history of the world, unemployment was steadily on the increase.

Here are some statistics prepared by Prof. Charles A. Prosser, of Dunwoodie Institute in Minnesota, showing the mass-production revolution which occurred in this country during the 30-year period from 1899 to 1929. In 1899, 4,700,000 industrial workers produced manufactured products of the market value of eleven and one half billion dollars. In 1929, 8,550,000 workers produced manufactured products of the market value of sixty-eight and one half billion dollars. That is, less than twice as many workers produced six times the value of products. If there had been the same value produced per worker in 1929 as in 1899, it would have taken 20,000,000 more workers to turn out these products. Professor Prosser significantly remarked: "Prosperity will not solve unemployment."

While his statistics were applied to industry, he might have made a survey of agriculture with largely similar results. The farm has become mechanized like the factory and the same change has taken place in all branches of commerce.

In this connection I want to mention a most remarkable review of the world depression by Professor Einstein. It was both comprehensive and brief. He surveyed the world depression and evaluated its causes—the devastation of the World War; the war debts; tariff barriers; unsettled national currencies and differences in international exchange; disturbed conditions caused by Russia and China; overproduction, which he denied with the possible exception of wheat and automobiles in America. But greater than all of these, he assigned the machine and its displacement of manpower, which was thereby robbed of its power to purchase and consume seeming overproduction caused by underconsumption.

And although his remarkable summary was published a year before the enactment of the President's recovery program, it is significant that the remedies he suggested are along the lines of the plan underlying this legislation.

An attempt has been made to discredit this legislation by showing that it originated in England. If this be true, it fortifies instead of discredits the plan. Nations and peoples are not so different. Given the same conditions, the same laws operate everywhere, but in the matter of mass production the machine has wrought the greatest change in America, because in America it has been brought to its highest state of perfection. It follows as a natural sequence that the country having the most machines has the most idle men. Society must ride the machine or be crushed by it. This is the problem.

The central feature of this bill is the allotment plan. The allotment plan is no more than a limitation and apportionment of crop production. Limitation and allotment of crops among farmers is no different than allotment of output and hours in industry. Neither is different than regulation of prices. All go together. We must have all or none. The farmer must have a system under which to produce and market his crops in order to take debt out of it and put a living into it. Agriculture is the last frontier of individualism in the sense of every fellow for himself, the devil take the hindmost. Industry and labor have fairly well learned the lesson and the need of organization. The farmer must come to it. The Agricultural Adjustment Act and its set-ups merely show him the way. He will either take hold of his problems and work them out under this guidance or be reduced to a permanent state of tenantry and penury.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Mississippi is correct in his statement of the amount of cotton produced in this country, the percentage last year being a little less than in a number of years. This reduction is attributable to the plow-up program, but does not present the whole picture.

At the beginning of last season we had the largest carry-over of American cotton in America that this country had ever known. If you add the excess of this carry-over to the production of the acreage planted, our production made the world production much above the average of the world production even in that year. No one sponsoring this bill is trying to adjust cotton to the American market. We are simply trying to adjust to the world market; and if we once clean the slate on the carry-over that has been wrecking the South ever since the war, if we can clear the decks one time, I believe the situation will largely handle itself.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. WOODRUFF. May I say that I have been unable to be present during much of the debate on this bill because of the activities of my committee. Will the gentleman tell me if this is permanent legislation?

Mr. JONES. No; it is just for 2 years.

The gentleman from Mississippi spoke of the gold bill. I am thoroughly in accord with him on the money question, and I defer to him many times on that subject; but the fact remains that before this plow-up campaign cotton was selling at 5 cents per pound. When the Agricultural Adjustment Act was passed and the cotton program was laid out and the plowing up of cotton was announced, cotton did go up to 11 or 12 cents a pound at one time.

Then on account of the report from the Department of Agriculture that the season was good and that notwithstanding the plow-up we were going to produce as much last year as we ever had, cotton went down to 9 and 10 cents. Then when the world carry-over did not reach the amount that was predicted and when there was an unusual demand for cotton on the part of some nations that wanted to make some preparation for war, which caused an unusual demand, cotton went above the lowest price. I think the money program materially helped cotton, but this does not account for the entire rise in the price, as shown by the fact cotton went a good deal above the general level of the increase in other agricultural commodities.

Mr. BUSBY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. BUSBY. The gentleman spoke a moment ago of the great increase in the exportation of cotton, amounting to about 9,000,000 bales, I believe the gentleman suggested.

Mr. JONES. Oh, no; there was an increase of about 2,000,000 bales in the export of cotton.

Mr. BUSBY. That would make it not far from 9,000,000 bales.

Mr. JONES. For a period of 9 months, that is true.

Mr. BUSBY. Does not the gentleman think that was almost solely due to the fact that American money became cheap in relation to foreign money and enabled them to come in here and purchase?

Mr. JONES. That may be so, but that is not the report that comes to me from various sources. However, I do not think that is particularly important.

I may say that if we had not had the plow-up program and if the four and a half million bales, which were not produced because of the plow-up, had been added to the nearly 9,000,000 bales of carry-over at the beginning of the season, together with the world carry-over, we would have had 4-cent cotton this past year, and the gentleman would have been joining those pleading for some relief for the down-stricken farmers of the South.

I want to do away with this system of tenancy and this poverty that has cursed the South for years and years, and we must have a planned program.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn, and the Clerk read as follows:

REGULATIONS BY THE COMMISSIONER

SEC. 12. The Commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe (a) regulations with respect to the time and manner of applying for, issuing, affixing, and destroying bale tags, and the method of accounting for receipts from the sale of and for the use of such bale tags, and (b) such other regulations as he shall deem necessary for the enforcement of the taxing provisions of this act.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 6 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the chairman of the committee a question or two.

Assuming that I had 1,000 acres on which I employed 50 share-croppers operating on 20 acres each, in the event you reduced acreage 30 percent, it would mean that a man would have the same efficiency of production with 700 acres that he had with 1,000 acres for the purposes of this bill. What will he do with these additional share-croppers? Can he afford, as a matter of fact, to perpetuate them in their cabins and subsist them, or must he say to them, "Well, you gentlemen will have to go down the road"?

Mr. JONES. As a matter of fact, practically all of them have already signed voluntary programs which provide for the reduction, which we hope will get them more money than if they did not reduce. This applies also to the share-croppers. Practically all of the share-croppers have been taken care of, with a very few exceptions, in the voluntary reduction program. This program has gone over probably 90 percent and therefore this does not mean a reduction in acreage on the part of cooperator. This has already been provided for under the voluntary plan and this bill simply undertakes to make it so that those who have reduced their acreage will not increase production by using extra fertilizer. This bill also undertakes to reach the 5 or 10 percent who are on the outside and who are not willing to go along on any kind of planned program.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Has the chairman an opinion as to whether unemployment has been aggravated in the South heretofore by virtue of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration?

Mr. JONES. On the contrary, I think unemployment has been immeasurably relieved, and I believe any man from the South who is familiar with conditions will tell you so. The producers have not only received money from the plow-up program and for idle land, but they have got an additional price for their cotton, and the trade reports from many of the merchants show an increase of two or three hundred percent in their business.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The statement of Farm Research, Inc., which, I understand, has an office here in the Mills Building, would lead a casual reader to believe there has been an aggregation of unemployment in the South by virtue of acreage reduction heretofore.

Mr. JONES. I just wish that anybody who is interested and who visited any of these sections in the South a year ago, would go down there now and look at the difference in the trade and other activities and see the happiness of the folks and the satisfaction of the people there.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am frank to confess I do not see how you can quite escape adding to the unemployment rolls if you reduce the acreage. Reduce work and manifestly you cannot escape reducing the number of workers.

Mr. JONES. They worked all day and all night down there trying to eke out a mere existence. Now they have been able to make more money with less work and by reason of the additional employment there has been a lot of increase in trade there.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn, and the Clerk read as follows:

INFORMATION RETURNS

SEC. 13. (a) All persons, in whatever capacity acting, including producers, ginner, processors of cotton, and common carriers, having information with respect to cotton produced, may be required to make a return in regard thereto, setting forth the amount of cotton delivered, the name and address of the person who delivered said cotton, the amount of lint cotton produced therefrom, and any other and further information which the Commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of Agriculture, shall by regulations prescribe as necessary for the proper administration of the tax. Any person required to make such return shall render a true and accurate return to the Commissioner.

(b) Any person willfully failing or refusing to file such a return, or filing a willfully false return, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding 1 year, or both.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BUSBY: Page 15, line 3, strike out all of subsection (b).

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment because there seems to be a special penalty provided at this point, almost in the middle of the bill. This provision applies to "all persons in whatever capacity acting having information with respect to cotton produced", if they do not come in and make a full statement to the commissioner and give any information they have about cotton; they are subject to this penalty, a thousand dollar fine or imprisonment for 1 year in jail.

That seems to me to be an exceedingly severe penalty. It ought to be stricken out because there are other penalties provided at the end of the bill to take care of everything with reference to cotton growing.

Now, a good deal has been said about the wonderful effect on cotton growing. That has been agreeable. We have all agreed to that. Up to this point our people have been consulted. They have signed contracts. They have gone into all the program with their eyes open. We have contracted for what has been done, and that great bountiful condition that you have heard stated by the manager of the bill, the chairman of the committee, had been by agreement, a matter that we could determine in our own right as American citizens. It has worked well. I am for it. It would continue to work well. People have signed contracts to reduce acreage this year and will voluntarily cooperate.

Mr. HOPE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. I yield.

Mr. HOPE. Does not the gentleman think, in view of what has been done, that this can be taken care of voluntarily?

Mr. BUSBY. It seems so to me. I do not believe in this high-handed method of making a felony—although they call it a misdemeanor—making a felony out of everyday business transactions, throwing a man into jail, and imprisoning him for 2 years. Why do you want take away from a man the common right to labor, raise his little cotton crop, sell what he makes, and keep his money without having to give one half of it to the Government if this program has worked well? All that has been done for the cotton farmer has been done by agreement, I repeat. I am against legislation which will bring him under penalties, bring him before a jury as a criminal, and send him to jail because he does not do a thing that someone else wants him to do with his own property and his own labor. Because he has worked hard as he has done all his life, grown cotton on his own land, sold it, and kept his money, and this is his only crime.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUFF. There is a rumor around the House that if this bill passes, it is only the forerunner of other bills of a similar character for wheat, corn, sugar, and all other agricultural commodities.

Mr. BUSBY. I believe that is so; I do not believe that there is a commodity that will escape it. From the uttering in the press concerning high officials of the Agricultural Department this is the plan, I understand, on which American agriculture is to be put at an early date.

The admirable result spoken of by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] would continue if we let the cotton farmers use their God-given right as free American citizens.

Mr. PATMAN. The gentleman must not overlook the fact that it takes two thirds of the producers to do this.

Mr. BUSBY. It does not take two thirds for the 1934-35 crop. This law becomes effective June 1, 1934, and after that you will never hear anything more about that two-thirds provision. But why should two thirds tell the other third what they shall do? Why should two thirds hang the other one third? What are you going to do when you go back and tell your constituents that you voted for a law that would send them to jail because they did not give half of what they made to the Government of the United States? That is not a tax; it is a sham and everyone of us know it.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, this is one of the sections that carries a special penalty, and it applies not to the individual farmer to whom the gentleman refers but it applies to all persons—

In whatever capacity acting, including producers, ginner, processors of cotton, and common carriers, having information with respect to cotton produced, may be required to make a return in regard thereto—

And so forth. Practically all of them will be ginner, and the section provides that—

Any person willfully failing or refusing to file such a return, or filing a willfully false return, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding 1 year, or both.

I understand that every citizen in America who fails to file an income-tax return who should do so under the law is subject to a penalty of not exceeding 1 year and a fine of not exceeding $10,000. If you are going to have a tax, you must have some penalty, and if the offense is a minor one, of course the prosecutors and courts are not going to be severe.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. BUSBY. Does the gentleman regard this as a tax? He so states in the bill.

Mr. JONES. Oh, yes; this is a tax.

Mr. BUSBY. What are we going to do with the Supreme Court decision that held that a tax on southern cotton production after the Civil War was unconstitutional?

Mr. BANKHEAD. They never held that.

Mr. JONES. They never held that. After it got to the Supreme Court, they divided, and the question was really never passed on. That decision was never made final. I know that a lot of people in the South have the impression that it is so decided.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. And that was in the nature of an income tax before we had an income-tax constitutional amendment.

Mr. JONES. Yes. But that is neither here nor there. I really think you need the penalty provided. Of course, this could be included in the general penalty, but I think this is proper. This is not an effort on the part of somebody to saddle something on folks that they do not want. This thing came up from the grass roots. The people of the South have asked for this bill in their meetings. I have asked many men who came here, "Have you attended these meetings; have you talked with the farmers?" and they say that the farmers understand it and want it. One of the things that has been wrong with agriculture is that there has been a planless agriculture in the presence of a planned industry. If during this period of depression the automobile factories had run full tilt all of the time, instead of running 30 or 40 percent, we would have had automobiles by the millions, and they would be worth about $100 apiece. If industry will run full tilt and give us automobiles and other things at those prices we will have cheap prices. If you are going to have planned industry, you must have some sort of planned agriculture. I hope this will be necessary for only a limited time; and certainly, since the farmers of the South want it, and it is not permanent, I think they should have it. They want to make their program successful, and they have already signed for practically what this bill does.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is from Texas.

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. BUSBY. Will the gentleman permit me to read a telegram that his colleague, Mr. TERRELL, received from Texas?

Mr. JONES. Yes; and I can read the gentleman a hundred on the other side.

Mr. BUSBY. The telegram reads as follows. It is addressed to Mr. GEORGE B. TERRELL, Congressman-at-large from Texas:

Congratulation on your courage and wisdom. Texas does not want Bankhead bill. Good only for job seekers, men with cotton on the board, and States growing little cotton. Thinking Texans solidly behind you and RAYBURN. Bankhead bill would increase unemployment and poverty. Fight Bankhead bill. Texas is behind you.

This carry-over that the gentleman speaks of will enhance in value, will it not?

Mr. JONES. I think there will be some enhancement. I do not think there will be any great enhancement in value. It will be stabilizing the value, and a lot of that is in the hands of farmers as well as others. That is a feature that you cannot get away from.

Mr. DRIVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. DRIVER. Did the gentleman ever know a time in the history of cotton production when there was so much cotton in the hands of the small farmer in the cotton-producing area as there is today?

Mr. JONES. I never did. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

GENERAL AND PENAL PROVISIONS

Sec. 14. (a) All provisions of law, including penalties, applicable with respect to the taxes imposed by section 800 of the Revenue Act of 1926, shall, insofar as applicable and not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, be applicable with respect to taxes imposed by this act.

(b) Except as may be permitted by regulations prescribed by the Commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, with due regard for the protection of the revenue, no person shall: (1) Transport beyond the boundaries of the county where produced any lint cotton to which a bale tag issued under this act is not attached; or (2) sell, purchase, or open any bale of lint cotton to which a bale tag issued under this act is not attached.

(c) No seed cotton harvested during a crop year with respect to which the tax is in effect shall be exported from the United States or any possession thereof to which this act applies to any possession of the United States to which this act does not apply or to any foreign country.

(d) Any person who violates any provision of this act or any regulation promulgated under this act, or who willfully fails to pay, when due, any tax imposed under this act, or who, with intent to defraud, falsely makes, forges, alters, or counterfeits any bale tag or certificate of exemption made or used under this act, or who uses, sells, or has in his possession any such forged, altered, or counterfeited bale tag or certificate of exemption, or any plate or die used, or which may be used in the manufacture thereof, or has in his possession any bale tag which should have been destroyed as required by this act, or who makes, uses, sells, or has in his possession any paper in imitation of the paper used in the manufacture of any such bale tag or certificate of exemption, or who reuses any bale tag required to be destroyed by this act, or who places any cotton in any bale which has been filled and stamped, tagged, or otherwise identified under this act, without destroying the bale tag previously affixed to such bale, or who affixes any bale tag issued under this act to any bale of lint cotton on which any tax due is unpaid, or who makes any false statement in any application for bale tags or certificates of exemption under this act, or who has in his possession any such bale tags or certificates of exemption obtained by him otherwise than as provided in this act, shall on conviction be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment for not exceeding 2 years, or both.

REGULATIONS BY THE SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE

Sec. 15. (a) The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to make such regulations as may be necessary to carry out the powers vested in him by the provisions of this act.

(b) The Secretary of Agriculture may make regulations protecting the interests of share-croppers and tenants in the making of allotments and the issuance of tax-exemption certificates under this act.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. JONES: Page 16, strike out lines 3 and 4, and insert:

(d) Any person who willfully violates any provision of this act or who—

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, this will be followed by two or three other corrective amendments. This takes the penalty for violating regulations out of this subsection, and inserts the word "willfully" so that only a willful violation of the terms of the act is criminal. I shall offer another amendment as a separate subsection, which limits the punishment for violation of regulations to a fine of not exceeding $200. That will be offered as section 14 (e).

Mr. BUSBY. I am glad to see the gentleman is willing to reform the bill.

Mr. JONES. I do not want anything unreasonable about this. We are all trying to work out a program in the interest of the South. I wish the gentleman would at least recognize our good motives, whether he agrees with our judgment or not. I am willing to concede his good motives, and I think he should concede ours.

Mr. BUSBY. I certainly do.

Mr. JONES. I am going to ask to strike the $5,000 fine and make it $1,000, and strike out "2 years" and make it "1 year." Those are different amendments that will be offered serially. I should like to have those disposed of, and then the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTINGTON] has an amendment liberalizing the provisions of subsection (b) so as to assure proper movement of the cotton, regardless of the regulation.

Mr. BUSBY. Does the gentleman say that that takes out all the punishments for violating the regulations?

Mr. JONES. No. It puts them in a separate paragraph. We are going to insert a separate paragraph on regulations, limiting the punishment to not exceeding a fine of $200.

Mr. BUSBY. Are you going to have in that paragraph any penalty application for violating the regulations of the Department such language as is not contained in the written bill as we have it before us?

Mr. JONES. Only when the regulation is authorized by the bill. The gentleman understands that every bill must leave certain regulations to administration.

Mr. BUSBY. That is all right to have regulations to administer the authority of the bill, but not regulations that become penal statutes on violation of the regulations by individuals to whom it applies.

Mr. JONES. These are only regulations that are made for the purpose of honestly carrying out the bill. They always have to have some of these. It does not exceed a fine of $200. Surely the gentleman does not think that is extreme.

Mr. BUSBY. Yes. I think anything that takes away from a man his right to control his own property and to make free contracts is extreme.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman can reach his end, then, by voting against the bill. If we are going to have a bill, let us not emasculate it.

Mr. BUSBY. I thank the gentleman for his direction.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman's own statement shows that not only is he intending to vote against the bill, but he is trying to make the bill innocuous as we go along. I am glad to have a complete disclosure. He is entitled to his opinion, but I ask those who are friendly to the bill to pay no attention to the intentions of gentlemen who are opposed to the bill.

Mr. BUSBY. Perhaps they will not do it.

Mr. JONES. I had understood the gentleman was trying to perfect the bill.

Mr. BUSBY. I am trying to save the people back home in their personal and property rights.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman is trying to wreck the bill, is he not? Is he not? Will the gentleman answer "yes" or "no"?

Mr. BUSBY. I would like to see this bill buried 6 feet deep if you are going to arrest people and put them in jail by authority of its provisions.

Mr. JONES. All right. We understand each other.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported by the Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES: Page 17, line 2, strike out "$5,000" and insert "$1,000", and in line 3 strike out "2 years" and insert "1 year."

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McGUGIN as a substitute: Page 17, line 2, after the word "exceeding", strike out "$5,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$100", and strike out the remainder of the section.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is not offered for the purpose of wrecking the bill. This amendment is offered for the purpose of preserving American liberty and the rights of American citizens. Here we are enacting legislation which would make it a penitentiary offense for a man to produce more cotton than someone down in the Department of Agriculture wanted him to produce.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. No. You people have had all the time. Let us consume a little time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have not taken a minute under the 5-minute rule.

Mr. McGUGIN. The gentleman can take all he wants. I do not yield.

There is a lady who wrote an article in the Saturday Evening Post this week, and I dare say if the Members of this House and the Members of another legislative body of the American Congress were of the same intellectual level as that lady, and had the courage to follow their intelligence, this bill would never be enacted into law.

The following is taken from a part of the article appearing in the issue of the Saturday Evening Post for March 17 by Mrs. George B. Simmons, the wife of a Missouri farmer:

For all concerned, I have to conclude that any kind of dictatorship is dynamite to democracy and to order and to progress. I look out across our land that we still hold by only such a narrow margin, and I know that if my husband cannot make it pay, nobody else can tell him how, and I know that the blood of generations of independent farm people rises within me to hate dictation, no matter how soft the velvet may be laid over its mailed fist, or how beautiful the bribery it offers us for our inalienable rights which it is trying to deceive us into giving up.

I agree with an Australian visitor who has recently said that cutting production is only creating artificial shortage and artificial poverty. As I look back, I have to remember that here, in the second richest county in Missouri, agriculturally speaking, we have had only one really good corn crop in 5 years, and I wonder if those who would cut production have made the necessary arrangements with the weather man.

I am not upholding the sins of past administrations or the dishonesty of certain individuals who cheated in business deals they represented to be safe and income-producing. I am not regarding what I can see and hear and learn from any opposing partisan viewpoint. All my people for several generations have been southern, and it is no trouble to guess the party to which they have belonged and given their loyalty.

Now, strange as it may seem to some people, believe it or not, the lady who wrote that article is not a Tory; she is not a tool of Rockefeller, Mellon, Morgan, Mitchell, or Wiggin; she is not even a member of the "Ohio gang." This lady is the wife of a Missouri farmer. Through her veins surges the blood of generations of southern Jeffersonian Democracy, not this modern Tugwellian socialism and tyranny which is emanating from the South today and which would send the citizens of this country to the penitentiary for raising cotton in an amount in excess of what the Government would tell them they might produce.

A lady from my State has written me a letter, a widow, if you please, who runs her own farm, Mrs. Nellie R. Ludington, route 1, Havensville, Kans.:

I am at this time vainly trying to support myself and two little children on a farm by stint of herculean efforts, working in the fields as a man and undergoing tremendous hardship. The Government instead of encouraging and aiding self-reliance and independence is placing a penalty upon it and honest endeavor. Now comes a government to me and tells me that I must reduce the pitiful little number of stock I have accumulated in the hopes of being self-supporting and provident for my children. This government by the means of veiled threats, innuendo, and the arousing of fear had put over a means of control over the American people which it could never have done in an open and straight-forward manner. I have not sufficient corn in acreage to pay my rental, or sufficient cows or hogs to provide even the necessities, but I am ordered to sign a one-sided agreement to reduce all kinds of livestock at the Government's order and all crops if they so demand. As a threat I am told that if I refuse I shall not be allowed to continue my efforts to provide for my children.

If this widowed lady should want to raise cotton after this bill is enacted, she would not be faced with mere pressure from her Government; she would be faced with the penitentiary doors if she did not bow to the wishes of the Secretary of Agriculture.

This bill is tyranny; this bill is vicious. This bill is repugnant to every principle of American liberty, Christianity, and decency; and the blackest part of it is this section which provides a $5,000 fine and a year and a half in the penitentiary; and when it was first written it was written in blood so cold that it would send one to the penitentiary for violating not a law of Congress but a regulation promulgated by a Cabinet officer.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, to follow up the gentleman's theory, the gentleman would limit the fine to $100. The crimes included in this section are, among others, those of defrauding and counterfeiting. The gentleman would limit the penalty against fraud and counterfeiting to $100. A severe penalty against counterfeiting bale tags and certificates is necessary if we are to have an effective law.

Mr. McGUGIN. Why were all sections included in the application of the penalty?

Mr. JONES. The gentleman can vote against the bill; and I think he will. But I think the gentleman himself will have to admit in good grace that if we are to have a bill we will have to punish counterfeiting with a more severe penalty than a $100 fine.

Mr. McGUGIN. I do not care about that, but the first sentence of this provision reads:

Any person who violates any provision of this act or any regulation promulgated under this act.

Mr. JONES. Of course, the gentleman does not want any bill; but that is his right, his American liberty that he talks about, to vote against it.

Mr. McGUGIN. We are not dealing solely with counterfeiters. If the provision were intended to reach counterfeiters only, why include the phrase "any provision of this act or any regulation promulgated under this act"?

Mr. JONES. That is only the usual penal provision, and is in accordance with measures the gentleman has voted for time after time. The same provision was carried in the Agricultural Adjustment Act, for which act the gentleman himself voted, except that some violations are made penitentiary offenses punishable by a $10,000 fine, instead of a $100 fine. The gentleman from Kansas voted for that bill and he has voted for similar bills from time to time.

The question he is talking about does not arise on my amendment; it arises on his amendment. It is his privilege to oppose the bill, and I cordially and freely concede him the right to his free opinion. I hope he will make the same concession to me.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I want to say to the gentlemen of the committee that if my efforts have done nothing else but to call attention to the severe penalties of this bill, which the chairman is willing to strike out by the amendment he has just offered, I believe they will have saved years of imprisonment, in the aggregate, of those people who were intended to be the victims of the bill as it was first drawn. It will save them from being threatened with the penitentiary, save them from being bulldozed and browbeaten by threats of a $5,000 fine and 2 years in the penitentiary.

Motives have been assigned to those who opposed the provisions of the bill; it is claimed they are against the whole bill. If they must submit to iniquities, they want the iniquities made as small as possible. That is the reason I voted for the proposal the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] just made, to strike out the $5,000 and 2 years imprisonment and insert instead a fine of not more than $200.

If this is going to be placed upon the necks of the people in my section of the country, I want them to have as little punishment as we can get for them, because they are American citizens, and work, labor, and sell commodities useful to mankind. This bill provides that—

Any person who violates any provision of this act or any regulation laid down by the Department of Agriculture promulgated under this act shall upon conviction be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or imprisonment for not exceeding 2 years, or both.

I opposed this bill in the beginning, and I am glad to see the gentleman coming around to the idea that the American people are not so bad after all that they have to be sent to jail for 2 years and fined $5,000. I congratulate the gentleman in arriving at the conclusion to cut this down to a measly fine of $200 when the people who do not have permits fail to turn over to Uncle Sam half of what they make with one mule on their own farms growing cotton.

Is it contrary to the principle under which our forefathers founded this Government for men to labor? Is it contrary to the rights of free men to grow cotton without first having gotten a permit to do so? Are you making that which is perfectly legitimate a crime by statute? This bill is in direct conflict with every guaranty under the Constitution—if we still have a Constitution of the United States. It seems to have been abandoned. Certainly we have no more pride in it. Where are the defenders of the Constitution?

Mr. FULMER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. FULMER. Is it not a fact that under the program of national recovery we are cutting the hours of labor from 8 hours to 6, that it was previously cut to 8 hours, and, as a matter of fact, under this administration we are controlling the output of industry? If industry is going to have to be controlled, we are not doing anything more than that by this bill.

Mr. BUSBY. Is the gentleman going to try to discuss all those things incident to this bill?

Mr. FULMER. No.

Mr. BUSBY. I am not informed on all of them.

The sponsors of this Bankhead bill are hiding in every hole they can devise so that they may conceal themselves for their action in bringing this legislation before you. They are dodging and ducking into every excuse they can think of to warrant the procedure that is being put on here. I am not surprised. I would do the same thing. I will not say that I question their judgment, but I just do not understand. I am mystified. Are we still in the United States of America, or is this Russia we have been transported to? I cannot understand why legislators propose such a thing for our American citizens. Let us study the teachings of Trotzky and Lenin and become more moderate in our methods. When did we reach this distressing state that we are trying by this kind of methods to wreck the American Government? Ten years of this stuff and men will again fight for their personal liberties and for the overthrow of this government of autocracy and oppression—a veritable oligarchy.

I have studied this bill carefully, and the more study I have given it, the more determined I am that there is nothing American in the principle in it. It is being laid on a helpless and unsuspecting people back home, who will hear of the trouble confronting them for the first time when they start administering this bill.

In conclusion, they say the people are for this. They do not know what its provisions are. The people do not know what this is all about and have had no chance to learn about it. Even many Members of Congress do not know what the terms of this bill provide. I am perfectly happy under the contract plan, the plan that we have been operating under and which has brought us to the wonderful condition we are in. Our people are satisfied. Let us use the processing tax and collect that way to carry the program of reduction as we have done. Let us go on and preserve this plan. Let us preserve the liberty of the American people, and by all means let us preserve their freedom and not send them to jail for doing a perfectly legitimate business of labor, of growing cotton without a permit if they wish and selling the fruits of that labor, their cotton, in the open markets.

The pro forma amendments were withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The substitute amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES: On page 17, after line 3, insert the following: "(e) Any person who willfully violates any regulation issued by the Secretary of Agriculture or the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Treasury under this act for the violation of which a special penalty is not provided shall on conviction thereof be punished by a fine not exceeding $200."

Mr. MCGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute amendment by Mr. MCGUGIN: Page 16, line 3, after the word "who", strike out everything down to the word "with" in line 6.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MCGUGIN] is not a substitute amendment for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. MCGUGIN. The gentleman from Texas offered an amendment that would affect this provision.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman's proposition is not a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Texas. It might be a substitute for something else.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman wants to offer the amendment, he may offer it at the proper time.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. PATMAN). The Chair holds that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas is not a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

The point of order is sustained, and the question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WHITTINGTON: Page 15, line 17, after the word "transport", insert "except for storing or warehousing under the provisions of section 4 (f)."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, that amendment is satisfactory.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. MCGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I now offer my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MCGUGIN: Page 16, line 3, after the word "who", in line 3, strike out everything down to the word "with" in line 6.

Mr. MCGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is for the purpose of meeting the objection which the gentleman from Texas offered to reducing the penalty for a violation of this act.

The words which I strike out are—

Any person who violates any provision of this act or any regulation promulgated under this act, or who willfully fails to pay, when due, any tax imposed under this act or who.

If my amendment is adopted it will read:

Any person who, with intent to defraud, falsely makes—

And so on.

I am willing to have a strict penalty and a heavy penalty for anyone who counterfeits or by forgery, or otherwise, perpetrates a fraud to beat this tax, and I favor making such a crime a penitentiary offense. What I do object to is that you provide that when one does not pay any part of this tax he shall be sent to the penitentiary. You are striking right back at the small individual cotton producer who may evade some of this tax, and while I am perfectly willing to send to the penitentiary a counterfeiter or a forger, I am not willing to send to the penitentiary a citizen of the United States whose only crime is that he has failed to pay a tax on the production of a bale or two of cotton. Mind you, this is the way you are making it compulsory under this bill. This is the ingenious manner in which you are sending a man to the penitentiary for producing more cotton than someone thinks he should produce. You provide that you may tax him so that his cotton, over a given amount produced by him, is confiscated by a tax, and then if he does not pay that tax you send him to the penitentiary.

If you would meet this thing fairly, frankly, and manly, your violation in the first instance would be that if one produces more cotton than he was allotted by the Secretary of Agriculture, he shall be sent to the penitentiary. The man who does not pay the tax on his excess production is put in the classification of a tax dodger or a tax defrauder and sent to prison. I am not willing to do that. I am not willing for a small southern cotton producer to be sent to the penitentiary even if he does dodge this tax.

A penitentiary offense for dodging income taxes is one thing, but making it a penitentiary offense for a man to escape a confiscatory tax because he produces more cotton than the Secretary of Agriculture tells him he can produce, is a tyranny that has no place in American law. If the gentleman from Texas is really serious in his remarks made a few moments ago, when he stated that he wanted a stiff penalty because he wanted to reach forgers and counterfeiters, he will accept my amendment and then provide a modest penalty for the man who evades this tax.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Now, as an honest man, and I think the gentleman is that, perfectly, does the gentleman stand here and assert that under this bill if a man produces more cotton than he is allotted, he can be sent to the penitentiary for it? Now, answer that categorically.

Mr. McGUGIN. If he does not pay the tax on it, he is sent to the penitentiary under this bill.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. But he has to sell it first.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; he has to sell it before he has to pay the tax.

Mr. McGUGIN. And that is the disreputable part of your bill. You will not write it in the bill under your name that you will send a man to the penitentiary for producing two bales of cotton when you think he should produce a bale and a half, but you do write in this bill that you will send him to the penitentiary if he does not pay a confiscatory tax on that extra half bale. This is cowardly legislation, it is contemptible legislation, it is dishonest legislation, and it is tyrannical legislation.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas strikes this language from page 16 of the bill, which is the very substance of the enforcement provision of the bill under consideration, "or who willfully fails to pay when due."

The provision which the gentleman seeks to strike from this bill is the customary provision that obtains in all revenue acts—willfully fails to pay. It is a provision that obtains in the manufacturers' sales tax that we passed in 1932. It is a provision that obtains in the Revenue Act of 1926.

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. In just a moment. I want to complete the sentence, if not the statement.

It is the provision that substantially obtains in the Agricultural Adjustment Act which the gentleman voted for a year ago.

Moreover, Mr. Chairman, it is a provision that obtains in all acts for the enforcement of excise taxes that I recall at this moment. The foundation of this act, which is the enforcement, depends upon the excise tax levied upon the excessive production of cotton, and if it is to be worth while there must be teeth in the enforcement section. There must be a willful refusal to pay the tax and not simply a raising of more cotton or anything of that sort.

Mr. McGUGIN. No; but he must pay taxes on what he raises.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. He pays on the cotton sold in excess of his allotment. But let me point this out to the gentleman, and I have before me a copy of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, without this provision there could be an evasion of the tax and there could be bootlegging of cotton, for the preceding paragraph of this section provides that no seed cotton shall be transported to a foreign country or exported, and without this provision for a tax there might be the exportation of cotton in seed rather than in lint and thereby a complete evasion of the tax.

Mr. Chairman, I have before me the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and I call attention to the enforcement provision of that act which provided for a processing tax upon cotton and other agricultural commodities in this language:

All provisions of law, including penalties applicable with respect to taxes imposed by section 600 of the Revenue Act of 1926, and the provisions of section 626 of the Revenue Act of 1932, shall, insofar as applicable and not inconsistent with the provisions of this title, be applicable in respect of taxes imposed by this title.

I respectfully submit that you will find in that act substantially the same words as the gentleman moves shall be stricken out. I insist that if this act is to be enforced, if there is to be teeth in it, if there is to be compulsion, the provision that the gentleman moves to strike out is essential to the bill.

Moreover, I called attention yesterday when interrogating the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE] to the fact that in the Agricultural Adjustment Act there is a provision authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to make regulations for the enforcement of that act, and the general provision for a penalty is $100. That will be found on page 7 of that act. The provision for violation of regulations of this act is substantially as incorporated in the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

Mr. McGUGIN. As I understand the gentleman, his justification is because it is used in the provisions of a revenue act. Does the gentleman think that a man down in his district who may bootleg cotton and escape the tax should be given the same penalty that Al Capone was given for evading the income tax?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. No; I have confidence in the discretion of the courts to punish according to the degree of crime for which one is convicted.

Mr. McGUGIN. In other words, the gentleman thinks the court will have more respect for the farmer, more respect for his personal liberty and rights than the legislation?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Of course, the penalty for an individual who only sells a small amount of cotton in violation of law would not be the same as that which would obtain for a man who sells a large amount in violation of law and sought to evade the tax.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected. The Clerk read as follows:

REGULATIONS BY THE SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE

Sec. 15. (a) The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to make such regulations as may be necessary to carry out the powers vested in him by the provisions of this act.

(b) The Secretary of Agriculture may make regulations protecting the interests of share-croppers and tenants in the making of allotments and the issuance of tax-exemption certificates under this act.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Gentlemen of the Committee, we are nearing the end of this bill. I wish Members of this House were willing to let us proceed in the cotton-growing sections of the country in the manner that has been agreeable and satisfactory, rather than fastening this type of legislation on our people. I wish you would continue to let us exercise our own discretion and let us continue to decide what is best under our civil rights.

You have been told—and I agree—that it has worked satisfactorily up to the present time and brought about splendid results. Why not let that continue, that we may not fear the coming of the Federal officer who is armed with a writ under regulations issued by the Secretary of Agriculture, but which regulations do not appear on the statute books, but which regulations prescribe a penal offense under this law?

Let us continue as we have, let us carry on as we have. It is true that gentlemen here who are today sponsoring this bill say that the penal provisions will not be brought into play against the small farmer and small operator.

This will be a means of creating fear among the people. It will do even more among the poor class. We are told that the small person will be benefited. We are benefiting the small person at the present time under our present plow-up and contract plan. All I ask you to do is to allow us the privilege and right as American citizens of freedom of contract, the right to the pursuit of happiness, according to our own wills, the right to do perfectly lawful things in a perfectly lawful way. Do not brand us as "chiselers" and "scabs" and every other low and mean thing because we do not accord to some regulation formulated by the Secretary of Agriculture or of some bureau head here in Washington. You know when a bureau is once set up it grows. This bureau will be formulated to take care of cotton, but it will spread to wheat and corn and everything else, and the American citizen will wake up to find himself surrounded by a network of laws and regulations which threaten him with fines, jail, and the penitentiary, and which make his condition intolerable. Did our forefathers in the Revolutionary War fight for nothing? Who remembers the Stamp Act—a little thing, a pitiable thing in comparison with the Bankhead bill that you are now considering. Deprived of our liberty! There was no such thing in the Stamp Act, there was no such thing in the enumerated offenses that England had committed against the Colonies, as set out in the Declaration of Independence. Read that document again and see if the Colonies had any cause to rise up and fight for the freedom that you have enjoyed until we began this type of legislation.

Look back and see if they had any cause to complain as compared with our people who are threatened by the provisions of the Bankhead bill—fines, jails, humiliation. You will hear the complaints of the people, you will hear the rumblings, for they will rise up against you and me as having been servants placed in position of power, in high place, who have betrayed them and laid down their liberties at the feet of greed. Who has personal liberty any longer? Who has the right to use his own property unmolested? Confiscation of property has become common. Threat of bodily harm and high-handed methods are tools of the tyrant.

I am sorry to see this type of legislation. If it means my going out of Congress, that will not bother me. If I must betray what I believe to be my oath that I will defend the Constitution in order to stay in Congress, I cannot pay the price. How I wish today for L. T. C. Lamer, James Z. George, E. C. Walthall, and a horde of others who have gone on before that they might stand erect and defend that bedrock of our liberties, the Constitution of the United States. If it means that I have to get down and crawl under the weight of this type of legislation, I tell you I will not do it. You and I know better than the people do who sent us here, for we have had a better chance to study it, that this bill is a betrayal of the liberties of our people. I think more of the liberty of the individual than I do of this bill. Our country is all right. If this Congress and the administration would rise up in its might and throw off the shackles the money powers have put upon us, this bill that strikes down human liberty would not be necessary. We are going on month after month selling tax-exempt bonds and mortgaging the country more heavily to the wealthy class who will pay no taxes—$1,250,000,000 each year will soon be the interest bill of the people. If money were put into circulation, money issued against the credit of the Government just like the bonds are, we would soon recover, but the powers that have always borne down on the poor and the masses in their suffering prevent such a thing from being done.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I do not think there is anything controversial in this section. I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

APPROPRIATIONS AUTHORIZED

SEC. 16. (a) There is hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

(b) Out of the sums available to the Secretary of Agriculture under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act are authorized to be made available.

(c) The proceeds derived from the tax are hereby authorized to be appropriated to be made available to the Secretary of Agriculture for the purposes of carrying out the cotton program of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, and for administrative expenses and refunds of taxes under this act.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The chairman of the committee has been eminently fair in permitting the fullest consideration of this bill. There is no doubt of his sincerity in the support of this legislation. He believes it is for the benefit of the cotton producers of the South, and all that I ask from the proponents of this legislation is that they will appreciate and realize that those of us who are opposed to the legislation are genuine in our opposition just as the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BUSBY], who says that he takes his political life in his hands. I am not taking my political life in my hands in opposing this legislation. I might be taking it in my hands if I voted for it. But those of us who are voting against it oppose it in principle from beginning to end. We are opposed to regimentation in our economic life, and we believe that this is the beginning, this is the first step of regimentation that will spread into other industries, into other agricultural crops, and eventually sovietize our economic structure. That is why most of us on the Republican side, and I believe many on the Democratic side, will in the final test vote against it, no matter what is contained in the bill, no matter what its merits or demerits may be, just so long as it calls for compulsory regimentation. They will do it on the general principle that this is the beginning of the regimentation of our economic life, and the American people do not want a regimented life. They do not want socialism nor the help of politicians in conducting their own business.

I look with some little suspicion on a bill coming from the Department of Agriculture and from the Agricultural Adjustment Administration.

Mr. BANKHEAD rose.

Mr. FISH. Oh, I assume that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], as he has already stated, is the author of the bill. His name is on it. I accept that; but, in any event, it has the blessings of the Department of Agriculture and of Professor Tugwell, of Prof. Mordecai Ezekiel, of Jerome Frank, and of Smith W. Brookhart. One cannot help being somewhat suspicious, whether it emanates from such source or merely has the blessings of those men who believe in socializing our industries, not only in the farming industry but our entire economic system.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Not now. I am going to talk once or twice again on this question, and then I shall yield. I have here a clipping that I cut from a paper a few moments ago of a speech made by Smith W. Brookhart, special adviser to the Department of Agriculture, receiving five or six thousand dollars a year. I do not know what else he is doing beyond advising the Department of Agriculture. He made this speech, according to the Associated Press report, yesterday in New York. He said:

The greatest mistake in the statesmanship of the United States was when the Government decided to part with the title to land.

If that is not pure 100-percent socialism I do not know what it is. He says the Government should have taken all the land. That was the gigantic blunder of the American Republic, according to Mr. Brookhart, that we believed in property rights in the past, and that some of us benighted Members of Congress still believe in property rights. It is inconceivable even in these days of radical experiments, but here is a man drawing pay as special adviser to the Department of Agriculture who comes into my State and yesterday makes the statement that ownership in private property is wrong and that it is a gigantic blunder and that the Government should have title to all land. That is one reason why I am suspicious of this kind of legislation. It is not the only reason, but it is a substantial reason. That is why I am led to believe it is just the beginning. It is just the first step. I do not want to say this bill amounts to socialism or communism but it is a distinct step in that direction. It is well to remember what happened over in Soviet Russia in 1917. The Communists promised the land to the peasants, and the factories to the workers, but just as soon as they seized the Government they took the land away from the farmers and the factories from the wage earners.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. The distinguished gentleman from New York finds some fault with this bill because, as he says, it is playing into the hands of those who are Communists and ultraradicals, and so forth. I have great regard for the gentleman's opinion. The other day the distinguished gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. LEMKE] opposed the bill because he said it was playing into the hands of those who are inimical to our best interests, the international bankers, and that crowd. I have great regard for the gentleman from North Dakota and he and I usually agree on farm legislation. If the bill is subject to both criticisms, I think we who are in favor of it are in a pretty good position. If it is too communistic for the gentleman from New York and too conservative for the gentleman from North Dakota, it must be about right for the average Member of the House, and I hope the bill passes. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Mr. Chairman, I have heard many gentlemen on the floor of this House say they are opposed to the regimentation of the farmer. Those same gentlemen evidently are not opposed to the regimentation of millions of industrial slaves for the benefit of the Wall Street bond clipper and the money kings. Some gentlemen say there are still some of us who believe in private-property rights. I admit the truth of that statement and say that there are also some gentlemen in this country who believe in the absolute domination of property rights over human rights.

It is quite interesting to note that a large part of the opposition to this bill comes from the poor farming widows of the State of Kansas, but the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGugin] mentioned something about the Ohio gang. The only Ohio gang that I know of is the one that came down here in 1921 with a Republican President, and that is when the human liberties we have heard so much about were trampled underfoot, through a 12-year period, in the interest of private-property rights. Someone mentioned that we are trying to bring in the N.R.A. procedure with industry on this proposition. Why should we not bring it in? They have cut the hours; they have raised the wages; and who yet on the floor of this House has offered to cut the hours of the American farmer and increase his wages at the same time? That is exactly what this bill proposes to do. It tells him he will have to work less, he will not have to work so many hours; that he will not hear the crack of the slave driver's whip, and for the first time in this country we will lift his prices, we will double his prices, we will pay him twice as much for his product, and he will only have to work half the hours.

Mr. HOPE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. That is what I want to see. I want to see men on the floor of this House propose to cut the hours of the farmers; propose to cut the number of days' work; propose that we elevate their prices, and whenever you do that you are getting down to the grass roots, and you will produce real prosperity in this country. You will not produce real prosperity until you do that very thing. [Applause.]

Mr. HOPE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. I, for one, am completely sick, tired, and disgusted with gentlemen who have never done anything except farm the farmers on Wall Street and on the sidewalks of New York, telling us what precedents we are establishing, what liberty we are wrecking, when we seek to at least give the American farmer who produces the food that they eat and the raw material for the clothing that they wear, a living wage; give him the right to send his children to school and to college and accumulate a competence for his declining years. Liberty? Yes; that is the greatest word in the English language; but the liberty of the farmers ceased in 1921 when Andrew Mellon and the Federal Reserve Board said that deflation must start with American agriculture. From that day to this, with each succeeding year, the price of every farm commodity has dropped day by day and month by month. When this committee, representing a majority of the cotton growers of the South, decided upon this bill, when they said it was the only solution of their surplus problem, and when they are opposed by the minority and not the majority, as one Member of this House, I am willing to go along with them. I am willing to accept their judgment rather than the biased and selfish judgment of those who come from the streets of New York. I, for one, Mr. Chairman, hope this bill will pass. As I said at the opening of this session, I am sorry we will not be able to vote on it today, but since it is going over until Monday, I am sure the majority will be even larger. I say to you people who are going to vote for this bill, I want you to do it in the belief that you are writing a new declaration of independence for the farmers of this great country of ours. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I am in entire sympathy with the hope of the gentleman from Ohio that we can reduce the hours of labor and increase the wages of the farmers of this country; but I remind him that under this bill we are going to give a lot of poor tenant farmers a vacation for 365 days in the year. That is what we are going to do to the class of farmers for whom the gentleman from Ohio has proclaimed his sympathy on the floor of this House times without number.

It seems to me that one of the most objectionable features of the bill is that it comes up here under what might be called false pretenses. In the first place it comes up under the guise of being a tax bill, yet everybody knows this bill is not going to raise any taxes. That is not the purpose of the bill; it is purely a regulatory measure.

It is provided in the declaration of policy in this bill that one of the purposes of it is to raise revenue to enable the payment of additional benefits to cotton producers under the Agricultural Adjustment Act. Let me call attention to the fact, however, that there is no provision in this bill for any additional benefits to be paid to the producers of cotton under the Agricultural Adjustment Act; and, as a matter of fact, we are at the present time levying a processing tax which is sufficient to bring in the revenue needed to pay the benefits the law provides shall be given to those who cooperate under the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

So there is no basis whatever for saying in this bill that we are raising money to pay additional benefits, because we are not. We are not going to raise any money, nor are we going to pay any additional benefits.

Then, this bill is brought in under false pretenses when it is said it is needed to cure an economic emergency in cotton production. If there is a single agricultural commodity today which is not going through an emergency it is cotton. The price of no other agricultural commodity is so near the parity price as cotton. Cotton today is selling for 12.5 a pound; and the parity price for cotton is only 14.9. Now, are wheat, hogs, cattle, or any other agricultural commodity anywhere near as close to parity as that? We all know the answer is "no." The chairman of this committee, the distinguished gentleman from Texas, who comes from a great agricultural district which produces in addition to cotton a great amount of wheat, and which is also one of the great cattle-producing districts in this country, is aware that the cotton producers are getting a much better price for their product today than are the wheat producers; and he is fully aware of the fact that every cattle producer in his section is broke, and has been broke for the past year.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. I yield.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. My colleague and others have had much to say about the increase of unemployment amongst tenant farmers producing cotton.

Mr. HOPE. I have not had very much to say about that. I think this is the first time I have mentioned it. A number of gentlemen from the cotton section have spoken about it, however.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. With respect to the reduction program of 1933 and 1934, the Secretary of Agriculture is stipulating in regulations that tenants must have the lands free of rent to use for food and feed even though the Government is paying rent for the land.

Mr. HOPE. Under the voluntary program.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Is he not given the same privilege under this act?

Mr. HOPE. He is given the same privilege, but we do not know whether he will exercise it.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Is it not also true that the rights of the tenant farmers are protected by the bill; that they are protected against any landlord who undertakes to secure one of these certificates of exemption from his tenants by sharp practice? Are not the rights of the tenants safeguarded in every way in the pending bill?

Mr. HOPE. The fact we had to put that provision in the bill indicates to my mind very clearly that is what we can expect.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. How can we better safeguard the rights of the tenants than they are safeguarded here?

Mr. HOPE. If it had been thought necessary to safeguard their rights against the landlord in this particular, then those who wrote that provision into the bill naturally expected there would be such an effort made by the landlord to reduce the number of his tenants, which is a natural thing to have happen because, being allowed to grow only one half or three quarters as much as he formerly did, the landlord cannot supply employment to as many tenants as he formerly did.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The pro forma amendments were withdrawn, and the Clerk read as follows:

OFFICERS AND EMPLOYEES

SEC. 17. The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized, in order to carry out the provisions of this act, to appoint, without regard to the provisions of the civil-service laws, such officers, agents, and employees, and to utilize such Federal officers and employees, and with the consent of the State, such State and local officers and employees, as he may find necessary, to prescribe their authorities, duties, responsibilities, and tenure and, without regard to the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, to fix the compensation of any officers and employees so appointed, except that rates so fixed shall not exceed the rates of compensation prescribed for comparable duties by such act, as amended, and to pay the premiums on bonds required of any such officers and employees.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES: On page 18, beginning in line 14, after the word "amended", strike out the remainder of the section.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to take the time of the House on this amendment. This is simply to make this section conform to some other measures. In view of the observations of the gentleman from Kansas, I think that I ought to make the statement that if the gentleman knew cotton he would understand the tax situation under this bill. It is absolutely certain that if the gentleman was familiar with the cotton business he would recognize that this is true. If the gentleman had read carefully the language on page 17, beginning with line 20, he would realize that the proceeds of the tax can be appropriated to the cotton fund. The amount of benefits under the Adjustment Act are to be gaged by the amount collected. They can pay additional benefits under the cotton program out of the tax under this bill. There is not any question but what we will collect some taxes. That is one of the purposes of the bill.

Mr. HOPE. Will the gentleman yield? I would like to make an inquiry of the gentleman.

Mr. JONES. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. HOPE. Is it not true that if there is a considerable amount of taxes collected the bill will fail in its purpose?

Mr. JONES. No. You may have considerable taxes, just the same as on other acts that have been formulated. For instance, I am not in accord with some of the provisions of the Oleomargarine Act, but we have collected millions of dollars in taxes. I do not think the gentleman would be favorable to a repeal of that act. A bill may have more than one purpose. If this goes into effect there will be additional funds to pay additional benefits to those who comply with the program. It will help in the balancing of the program. If any considerable amount is secured in this way, if there is an especially good year, the farmers will collect additional benefits.

Mr. HOPE. If it is true that we are going to have a catastrophe in the cotton section of this country if we produce and sell more than 10,000,000 bales of cotton, assuming we produced 12,000,000 bales and sold the additional 2,000,000 bales, collecting the tax, and the cotton producers being willing to pay the tax on the 2,000,000 extra bales, would not that bring about the catastrophe?

Mr. JONES. The gentleman knows that every merchant sells some of his goods at certain times of the year at a loss. He can afford to take a loss in order to get rid of his surplus stock. There will be some excess cotton, but the limit will be such that a man cannot afford to grow a great amount. He will not be able to go into the business, as he can now, and break down the program, because it will be too heavy a burden. He may grow a small amount of excess, but he will not be especially injured if he has to pay a tax on 1 or 2 bales above the 20 or 30 bales allotment. I think this will work out. I did not rise to get into an argument with the gentleman but simply to challenge his claim. I did not want the gentleman's statement to go in as if by common consent.

Mr. Chairman, we are trying to get through, and this is Saturday afternoon. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto do now close.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I object. I will make a point of no quorum. I am going to maintain some of my rights here. I want to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. JONES. All right. I am only asking that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close. This does not close debate on the section.

Mr. BUSBY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. BUSBY. If a farmer is allotted three bales of cotton and he accidentally raises four and wants to sell the extra bale for $60, how much will he have to pay into the Treasury?

Mr. JONES. He will have to pay $30.

Mr. BUSBY. Thirty dollars?

Mr. JONES. He would have to pay $30 into the Treasury. However, if he has run over the allotment, he can store that bale and use it in his next year's allotment and pay no tax whatever. If this program goes through, in lieu of the $30 he might have to pay as a tax if he sold the cotton, he would get next year $150 more than he would if the gentleman succeeds in defeating this bill.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in 5 minutes.

Mr. HOPE and Mr. BUSBY objected.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

May I ask the chairman of the committee a question in reference to the administration of this proposed act? In the first place, can the gentleman give us an idea as to the amount of money it is going to be necessary to appropriate to carry out the purposes of this bill as provided in section 16?

Mr. JONES. That would be a very difficult matter to estimate. It will probably all be accounted for in the final amount of taxes collected. This would take some money, but most of it will be collected by the Bureau of Internal Revenue, and I do not think there will be any great amount of additional money needed.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Is the section so worded that this money will eventually come back into the Treasury of the United States? Will the Government get its money back?

Mr. JONES. The money collected will go first to the payment of the administrative expenses, and then into the cotton program.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The section provides for the administrative expenses of the Secretary of Agriculture being paid, but does not provide for payment of the administrative expenses of the Secretary of the Treasury, who controls the Division of Internal Revenue.

Mr. JONES. If there is any question about that, it could be taken care of by limiting the appropriation.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I am talking about making an appropriation and the Government never getting it back. We appropriate or authorize an unnamed amount to be appropriated in this bill, but we do not provide, so far as I see, that this money which will be used by the Treasury Department in part is to be returned to that Department.

Mr. JONES. There is no thought of making this an out-right expense to the Government. There may have to be an appropriation authorized to begin with, but it is intended that this whole program shall be self-supporting. May I state to the gentleman that there has been about $110,000,000 paid to the cotton farmers under the program of last year, and the Government has already collected back $90,000,000. Of course, part of this was a floor tax. They collected in actual processing taxes in the first 4 months thirty-nine and a fraction million dollars.

So the cotton program is paying its own way.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Has it been successful?

Mr. JONES. I think it certainly has been successful for the year.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Then why change it?

Mr. JONES. If the gentleman had stayed here, he would know why. We explained very clearly that last year the plow-up program was made after it was too late to use fertilizer. This year, while the sign-up is sufficient to make the program successful, there is a possibility in a great many parts of the South of making the production just as large by using additional fertilizer and the program may wreck itself this year. These men who are undertaking this want to have this method of protecting themselves against themselves and against the outside man who will not go along with the program. It is to keep the program from breaking down and it comes up from the grass roots.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The gentleman from Missouri has stayed here all the time and assisted the gentleman from Texas to hold a quorum, something that many Members from the cotton States have not done.

Does not the gentleman think the time is ever going to arrive when those on whom the Government spends money in trying to benefit them should do something to benefit themselves, and if they are not going to do so, should we not stop trying to help those who will not help themselves? I feel our citizens who we are trying to help should cooperate and not require us to provide penalties if they fail to help.

Mr. JONES. That is it exactly. I call the gentleman on that statement. That is exactly what they are doing. This program, as shown by the collection, stays within the industry and this is one of the great commodities of America that for 50 years has carried the burdens of the tariff with none of the corresponding advantages. This is an effort to equalize and restore them to the level of the rights of the common industries of the country.

Mr. BUSBY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. BUSBY. I want to ask the chairman of the committee this question: If all these benefits and satisfactory results have not been obtained under voluntary contracts entered into by the cotton farmers with the administration?

Mr. JONES. Exactly; and I was showing why even those who are administering and those who took part in the cotton program know they probably cannot do that this year, because of the things I have stated. This leaves the allotment about where it was and tries to make it effective.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I want to ask the gentleman one further question. Of course, I am a "city boy" and perhaps I have no business talking to you country fellows, but I have received several letters from my home, St. Louis, asking me to find out if this is a starter. You know the city people are interested in such legislation. Can the gentleman tell me whether or not it is going to be proposed that we do the same thing with other commodities? My people feel this is only a starter and that other bills will follow.

Mr. JONES. This is not offered as a starter. This is not offered from any such point of view. This is an effort that has arisen among the cotton growers of the South. They have talked it at their meetings; they understand it; they want it simply for its own merit or what they think is its own merit.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Suppose the wheat, corn, and tobacco growers, as well as those who raise hogs and cattle, come in with a similar request, will you do the same thing for them?

Mr. JONES. Whether others will adopt it will depend, I take it, upon whether others want it and whether it would seem practicable as to them. It is not intended that this shall be used for that purpose.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Many times I feel, Congress having made such a mess of trying to help the farmer, especially when we find today such low prices to the producer, that we should let him alone for a while and see if he cannot help himself. I have an idea he might do better if we would let him alone by taking the shackles off, such as repealing all the laws that he is now subject to.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 16 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.
The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BAILEY: Page 18, line 14, at the end of section 18, insert a new subparagraph to read as follows:

(B) The Secretary of Agriculture shall employ a sufficient number of persons expert in classification and grading of cotton, so that one such expert at least may be stationed at each compress in the cotton-growing area.

Immediately upon the receipt of any cotton by such compress such expert shall thereupon proceed to classify and grade such cotton, and to have such cotton accurately weighed, in order that the market price of such cotton upon the market may be at any time determined. Such bale shall then be so tagged as to show such classification and weight, and the information obtained from such classification and weighing shall thereafter be forwarded to the Department of Agriculture and be available to all persons who have theretofore or thereafter owned such cotton.

The information of such classification shall be prima facie evidence of the correctness of such classification in any action at law or in equity in any court of competent jurisdiction.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I think the members of the Committee will probably see from the reading of this amendment the purpose of it. When a farmer takes his cotton into town and sells it, he is selling to a purchaser who is skilled in the game. The farmer himself, frequently, does not know the classification or the grade and the staple and sometimes not even the weight of his bale, accurately; and if you understand this amendment you will see its purpose is to make an accurate tabulation of all this essential information and to place it as a permanent record in the Department of Agriculture. If you do this it means that any farmer who sells his cotton which has already been marked by a bale tag can subsequently write to the Department of Agriculture and obtain accurate information concerning its worth by finding out its classification, its grade, its staple, and its weight. Or, better still, the Department, having all this information, including the farmer's address, can write to him and give him this information.

And then if he finds that the purchaser bought the bale on a basis or staple less in value than the Department records show the facts to be and he has been defrauded by the person who bought the bale, he can come back to such purchaser and, under this amendment, present prima facie evidence from the Agricultural Department in any court and sustain his claim for any shortage in price that may have been paid to him.

In addition, there is an added advantage in that the Government and the cotton farmer have an accurate check on exactly the crop that is produced—the kind, quality, staple, and weight—something which we have never had accurately before. We often hear that the carry-over of a crop is a linter crop, poor cotton, but in this way we will get an accurate check on the cotton produced, as well as on the grades.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield; gladly.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Is it proposed to have an inspector at each compress?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. How many compresses are there?

Mr. BAILEY. Three hundred and fifty.

Mr. DIRKSEN. What would be the cost of an expert grader at these compresses?

Mr. BAILEY. That would be difficult to answer, but the salary would be paid out of the funds derived from the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and the processing tax would pay for furnishing the information.

Mr. DIRKSEN. How are the compresses distributed among the States?

Mr. BAILEY. I should say about equally among the cotton-producing States.

Mr. FULMER. If the gentleman will yield, I am in sympathy with his proposition. In the Sixty-second Congress I introduced a bill known as the "Cotton Standard Grading Act." Before that they did not have any grading act. Now that standard is accepted in all foreign countries. In the last session I introduced a bill to provide a grading agency in each State, where a farmer from a little town that had no grading agency could find out the specific grade of his cotton.

Mr. BAILEY. I know that, but that act did not go far enough to furnish the information on the whole crop. I am offering this amendment as a suggestion to the committee. If it would interrupt the program or the purpose of the present bill, I have no objection to having it withdrawn in conference or having it placed in a subsequent bill amending the Agricultural Adjustment Act, which I understand is pending.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I am somewhat in sympathy with the gentleman, but I want to ask him what would be the benefit to the farmer who sells from a wagon in a town where there are no compresses?

Mr. BAILEY. The farmer would have to have his cotton ginned and get his bale tagged, which would identify it, and then if he sold it, it would go to a compress. Later the farmer would receive from the Department the information upon which he could base a calculation as to the price he should have been paid. The farmer would then know what he did receive and what he should have received. If the price received was not a fair price, he could demand the difference. If the buyer had taken advantage of the farmer, how could he refuse to pay the difference? He would be sued and made to pay. Of course, if we could furnish this information before sale it would be better, but the cost of an expert at each gin would be too great. And this way the final result is the same.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I think we are all in sympathy with the purpose outlined by my distinguished colleague [Mr. BAILEY], and I think that whatever legislation is necessary to accomplish that purpose, and if no legislation is necessary, then whatever appropriation, should be had. I compliment the gentleman upon the thought he has given to it, and his presentation. However, I do not believe we ought to go into this matter in enacting this bill. Therefore, I insist upon the point of order that the amendment is not germane, in that it adds additional matters to the bill.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, that is an additional section to this section which deals with the employees of the Department of Agriculture in carrying out the provisions of this bill and of the Agricultural Adjustment Act. Therefore if the Secretary of Agriculture can, as he ought to, have these employees in the carrying out of those acts.

The amendment may not be entirely germane to the provisions of this bill, but I should not like to agree that it should go out upon a point of order. I accordingly respectfully ask a ruling of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. An examination of the section shows that it deals only with the employment of officers. An examination of the proposed amendment reveals that the amendment introduces new subject matter, namely, the classification of grading of cotton, and the dissemination of information in reference to such classification and such grading. Therefore, the point of order is sustained.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 18, after line 15, insert a new subsection, as follows:

"(d) The sums expended in carrying out the provisions of this act shall not exceed, during the calendar year 1935, twice the amounts due and payable as taxes under this act during the calendar year 1934; and shall not exceed during any calendar year subsequent to the calendar year 1935, the sums due and payable as taxes under this act for the preceding calendar year."

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is very simple. If you are really in good faith that this is a revenue bill, you will accept this amendment. All the amendment provides is that there shall not be more money expended on this program than is collected by taxes from it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 minutes on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, it does seem to me that the House is entitled to the information that has been asked, and that is, how much will this cost, how many new inspectors will be required under the provisions of this bill, and how much of their salaries will be paid by the Government and how much out of the taxes that may accrue from the bill itself? The distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] a few moments ago offered an amendment. It may be that the amendment was a good amendment; I do not know. It calls, I think, for 300 or more additional employees. The gentleman from Kansas is interested only to find out whether the bill will carry its own weight and pay the salaries of hundreds of new inspectors out of the taxes raised by the bill.

The issue that is more important than everything else, even the bill itself, is, are we going to continue to build up a gigantic bureaucracy in Washington. That is what the people back home want to know. It is involved not only largely in this bill, but in almost every bill that comes before Congress. I hold in my hand figures as to the salaries paid to some of the employees in the Department of Agriculture at the present time. I have purposely omitted stenographers, filing clerks, and general clerical help receiving salaries below $3,000. There are, however, the astounding number of 1,038 drawing pay in excess of $3,000 a year. There are 35 officials drawing salaries between eight and ten thousand dollars a year, 19 drawing salaries between $7,000 and $8,000 a year, 83 drawing salaries between $6,000 and $7,000 a year, 140 drawing salaries between $5,000 and $6,000 a year, 216 drawing salaries between $4,000 and $5,000 a year, and 540 between $3,000 and $4,000 a year. Probably while we have been discussing this bill during the past week additional agricultural experts have been added to the pay roll, and if the bill is enacted into law it will mean actually hundreds of more Government officials with salaries over $3,000.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I have only a few minutes.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Does not the gentleman think that these employees are doing good work inasmuch as farm commodity prices are rising throughout the Nation and the farmers are getting extra pay and prosperity is returning to the country generally?

Mr. FISH. If the cotton producers are prosperous under voluntary agreements, what is the use of insisting on this compulsory regimentation? No one is more eager to see prosperity among the farmers than I am. I represent one of the largest fluid-milk districts in the United States, but if we are going to build prosperity by building an enormous bureaucracy at Washington and throughout the Nation at the expense of the taxpayers, that is something entirely different and an utterly novel and unsound proposal. What we need is less bureaucracy, not more.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, if the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas should be adopted, you could not start on the program at all. You could not hire your first man. You could not start until you found out how much you were going to collect in the year and you could not collect it before you started. I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

PURCHASES AND SERVICES

SEC. 13. The administrative expenses provided for under this act shall include, among others, expenditures for personal services and rent in the District of Columbia and elsewhere for law books, periodicals, newspapers, and books of reference, for contract stenographic reporting services, for bond premiums of administrative officers or employees required to carry out the provisions of this act, and for printing and paper in addition to allotments under the existing law.

LXXVIII—300

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, in line 22, page 18, I move to strike out the words "for bond premiums of administrative officers or employees required to carry out the provisions of this act."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. JONES: Line 22, page 13, strike out the words "for bond premiums of administrative officers or employees required to carry out the provisions of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Supplementing what I have said, Mr. Chairman, in opposition to this bill, I want to add that this is sectional legislation. It is class legislation, dealing with a commodity which is the principal commodity that is raised on the farms in this country, which enters into international trade; and it gives the President of the United States authority to enter into trade agreements with other nations of the world on this special commodity, cotton. It takes from the Congress of the United States the right to handle the question of international trade through tariffs, a right which is fundamental to our form of government. I want to reiterate that this legislation is unconstitutional, and any Member of this House who votes for this bill violates his oath of office, because the oath of office of a Member of this House requires that he will protect the Constitution of the United States from both foreign and domestic attacks.

This bill violates the Constitution of the United States, and I want to make that as plain as I possibly can in regard to legislation of this kind. This is not the initial act which violates the Constitution. There have been several other acts. This is simply one of the stones in the arch. There will be other pieces of legislation which will follow this, which will also violate the Constitution, all tending to set up a new form of government. In referring to what the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BUSBY] said in the controversy he had with the Chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, in which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] said he was tearing up the bill, if I have a choice between tearing up this bill and the Constitution of the United States, I will do everything within my power to tear up this bill rather than the Constitution. I want to make that as clear and decisive as possible.

I want to say also that the difficulty in selling cotton abroad is entirely different than that which has been discussed today. The reason more cotton cannot be sold abroad is because of the fact that the foreigner has not the means with which to buy cotton or other products.

An added reason why the foreigner does not buy more cotton and more wheat is the fact that our financial system, under international control which dominates it, forbids transactions and sale of American commodities in foreign ports. The three-cornered arrangement which has been in operation for several years between Great Britain, South America, and the United States compels the United States to pay hundreds of millions of dollars to Great Britain, which is in its operation a strangle hold upon America's right to do business not only with Great Britain but with the other countries of the world. I say we are still dealing with the effects and not the causes of our economic and financial ills. What should be done is to so regulate the control of our finances in this country that the free flow of the surplus production in this country can go into world markets; and they will not go, no matter what legislation you enact, until you correct the control of your financial system.

I yield back the balance of my time.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

COLLECTION OF TAXES

SEC. 19. The taxes provided for by this act shall be collected by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury. Taxes collected shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered. There was no objection.

TREASURY GOLD

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, this section has to do with the taxes collected and placed in the Treasury of the United States.

GOLD SHOULD NOT BE SIPHONED OUT OF TREASURY

February 27, 1934, we had $3,222,653,786.02 in gold in the general fund of the United States Treasury that belonged to the people of this country. I notice that a part of that gold has gradually been withdrawn. March 14, 1934, the amount of gold in the general fund of the Treasury was $2,998,499,734.55. I asked for this time to express the wish and hope that that gold will not be siphoned out of the Treasury into the Federal Reserve banks. In the revaluation of gold the United States Government profited $2,700,000,000, approximately. This gold can be used, with the gold we have in the Treasury, as a basis for the issuance of approximately $8,000,000,000 and still have 40 cents in gold as coverage for every dollar of money that is issued. No country on earth has ever declared that it should have more than 40-percent gold coverage for its money.

FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS WILL NOT USE OWN GOLD

The Federal Reserve banks have plenty of gold. They have about $4,000,000,000 in gold. They are not using the gold they have. They are not using the money they have. I do not believe that our Secretary of the Treasury will permit the Federal Reserve banks to siphon this gold out of the United States Treasury into their own vaults, especially in view of the fact that they will not use what they have now. The Federal Reserve bank at Dallas, the eleventh Federal Reserve district, which includes Texas, has $111,774,000 in gold, a sufficient amount to issue $279,435,000 in Federal Reserve notes—new money. It has only $66,000 in discounted bills outstanding. At one time, I understand, the amount was down to $30,000. The Federal Reserve Banking System has failed to function in the interest of the people. These banks are buying Government securities with Government credit and collect interest on the Government securities so purchased. This is a safe, profitable business for them.

DIRECT LOANS TO INDUSTRY

I invite your attention to a statement appearing in this morning's New York Times in regard to the proposal of Hon. Jesse Jones, Chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, in regard to direct loans to industry. I also want you to read the proposal being considered by the administration in regard to direct loans. It is also very interesting, and in the same newspaper. Something must be done in the way of furnishing a medium of exchange to the people, either through the direct issuance of currency or through the issuance of sufficient credit, or by using both methods. Mr. Jones is evidently very much discouraged—in fact, appears to be disgusted—with the Federal Reserve Banking System. The people, generally, are also very much disappointed over the failure of this System to function properly.

It will be noticed that the Federal Reserve banks have on hand a very small amount of discounted bills or loans for the benefit of commerce, industry, and agriculture.

We must have some way of granting long-term loans at a low rate of interest to industry. Direct loans will be preferable.

Notice the amount of Government securities held by the Federal Reserve banks. The Dallas bank, for instance, will receive around $2,000,000 a year interest on these securities that were purchased with Government credit. This bank, like all the others of the System, pays no taxes, except taxes on the small amount of real estate it owns for its own use. The bank collects sufficient interest from the Government to pay its officials high salaries, and in addition to pay regular dividends to member banks.

Mr. Jones has proposed a system which will in effect take over most of the duties of the Federal Reserve banking system. In his statement he makes the assertion that his proposal shall not be considered in opposition to the Federal intermediate credit bank system that has been proposed by the Federal Reserve banks and is being considered by the administration. But, regardless of what is done, I am expressing the hope that something will be done in the very near future to extend direct loans to industry.

SMALL BANKS RETARDED

The small banks of the country have been trying to do their part; they have been retarded in their efforts, however, by the Federal Reserve banks in the districts where they are located. They are afraid of the Federal Reserve banks; they are afraid to get in debt to the Federal Reserve bank; and as long as they have this fear, they will not willingly make sufficient loans to industry and agriculture. So, in order to remove this fear, I think Mr. Jones is to be congratulated, and the administration is to be congratulated for suggesting a long forward step, the longest step that has been proposed since this depression commenced, to restore this country by providing sufficient credit facilities. I am also hoping that a few billion dollars in actual money will be put out along with this credit.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that about 3 weeks ago a bill was before the Banking and Currency Committee to extend the powers of the R.F.C. At that time Mr. Jones took a very decided stand against direct loans. Can the gentleman reconcile these divergent positions? Had he spoken in favor of such a bill at that time, it would have been law at the present time.

Mr. PATMAN. I do not know anything about the views of Mr. Jones that were expressed by him before the Banking and Currency Committee referred to by the gentleman from Michigan.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks by inserting therein excerpts from a statement made by Mr. Jones, and other information about the Federal Reserve Banking System.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn, and the Clerk read as follows:

SEPARABILITY OF PROVISIONS

SEC. 21. If any provision of this act, or the applicability thereof to any person or circumstance, is held invalid, the remainder of this act and the applicability of such provision to other persons or circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, in my complaints today against the excessive penalties provided in this bill I have been confronted with statements from gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber that similar penalties are involved in the Agricultural Adjustment Act. They point to the fact that I voted for the Agricultural Adjustment Act. I call to the attention of the House the fact that when we had the Agricultural Adjustment Act before us it was here under a gag rule, House Resolution No. 61, which prohibited any possible amendment to that bill. Therefore I nor any other Member had any opportunity to correct the penalty provisions or any other provisions of that act. Incidentally, the gag rule was presented by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], the author of the bill now before the House.

There are some provisions in the Agricultural Adjustment Act to which no man can point with pride. In the manner in which that act is being administered I cannot point with pride to the fact that I voted for it. But I say here and now that every man who voted for that act at that time had the right to believe in the statement made by President Roosevelt in his Topeka speech before the election. Every last one of us had a right to believe the words of the President when he sent his message to the House asking for that bill. We had the right to believe that the act would be administered in harmony with the preelection speech at Topeka and the message to Congress by Mr. Roosevelt.

When President Roosevelt came to my State of Kansas during the campaign and made his speech from the steps of the Capitol of Kansas, he made the pledge to the farmers of the United States that the farm program which would be carried out under his administration would not be compulsory. He made the pledge that any farm program which was carried out under this administration would be voluntary; yet today where do we find his farm program drifting?

This bill provides that if a cotton farmer does not join this program that which he produces will be stolen from him by the Government under the hypocritical pretense of taxation.

This bill is not only dishonest; this bill is not only an economic monstrosity; but it is a fraud; its very soul is hypocrisy. You undertake to tell us that it is not a compulsory bill, but in the next step you tax a man and steal from him in the name of taxation that which he produces. When President Roosevelt sent his message to this Congress asking for the farm bill, he made another sacred pledge to the Congress and to the country. He made the pledge that if his program did not work he would be the first to acknowledge it. What do we find today? You men from the cotton section tell us that the program did not work; you say it will not work without this bill. If it has not worked, then I hope that the Democratic Party and the President of the United States will keep common faith with that message which President Roosevelt sent to the Congress in which he made the pledge that if it did not work he would abandon it.

By this bill the President and the Congress are not keeping faith with that pledge and are violating another pledge—the pledge made in Topeka before the campaign by Mr. Roosevelt, in which the promise was made that the Roosevelt program would be voluntary. So today this bill stands as a complete repudiation of the farm statement of President Roosevelt before the election; it stands as a repudiation of the message he sent to this Congress. If I had known those pledges were to be repudiated, I would not have voted for the Agricultural Adjustment Act. I am not inconsistent today. I voted for the A.A.A., believing that the pledges of the Topeka speech and the message to Congress asking for the A.A.A. would be kept.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mrs. GREENWAY. Our cotton growers have been considering this bill for a long time. I was wired some time ago to support it. Wanting to be sure, I called up Phoenix a few minutes ago and was told again of further meetings and to support it even more strongly.

In this connection I cannot refrain from saying that I feel that we are so obviously in an era of experiment that our problem becomes one of discriminating as to which experiment is justifiable.

I defy any Republican or any Democrat to call themselves consistent in almost anything today. [Applause.]

Our consistency in the last year lies in "trying."

This bill legalizes an experiment for 2 years, and a large number of cotton growers in Arizona have expressed their willingness to abide by such an experiment, because their condition is so substantially improved since the Government tried to help them, and I believe their desire to give this experiment a reasonable trial shows a fine American faith. The purpose of this bill, as I understand it, is to regulate the plan by tally through bale rather than acre.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I cannot help but call attention again to the fact that the price of cotton is determined by the value of American money. No one can successfully dispute this. If the foreigner has to buy high-priced dollars measured by a definite weight of gold, he does not trade with us. If our dollars are reduced 40 percent, he buys our commodities and pays no more in his own money. He is naturally induced to trade with us. I want to get this over to the gentlemen who are sponsoring this bill: If you are interested in securing a greater price for cotton, double the price of gold, because that is what determines the price of cotton. If 23.22 grains of gold were worth $1 in 1932 and cotton worth $35 in 1932, and you make the same 23.22 grains of gold worth $2 you will accordingly make your cotton price $70 a bale. There is no escaping this conclusion.

We export and always have exported more than half of the cotton raised in this country and when the foreigner buys a bale of cotton for a fixed amount of gold and our dollars are cheapened by half, he can buy twice the number of bales for the same fixed amount of his own money, or, to put it another way, he can buy a bale for half the amount of gold he formerly could, and he will certainly trade with us in preference to some other cotton-growing country in the world, which requires more gold by weight for its cotton. It is useless for us to think that we can pass a bill here that will reduce the supply of cotton in the United States and not expect the foreign cotton grower, because of the better price, to increase his production.

BANKHEAD BILL IS TO HELP COTTON GROWERS IN EGYPT, INDIA, AND FOREIGN COUNTRIES

Why do we not pass a bill here applying this program to all the cotton growers of the world? We would be getting somewhere then. Why do we not apply this to the cotton grower in India, in Egypt, and in the Argentine? Under this bill we reduce the American production 25 percent, thereby reducing the world production only 12½ percent, because we produce only half the cotton. We are passing a bill for the benefit of the cotton grower in India, in Egypt, and in other parts of the world, because he will get a better price for a full crop while we will have only three fourths of a crop.

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. McGUGIN. I understood the gentleman to refer to this as a program. It is a pogrom rather than a program.

Mr. BUSBY. The question has been raised as to the President's good faith in connection with this agricultural program. I do not think the President ever sponsored this bill. I think it was with the utmost persuasion that he was induced to keep quiet and not voice opposition to this bill. I have not seen a line from the President backing this bill.

Mr. GLOVER. The gentleman has not read the Record. The President sent a message from the White House to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] favoring the bill, which was read into the Record. The gentleman from Mississippi has not read the Record and does not know what is in the Record.

Mr. BUSBY. I heard gentlemen saying they had been to the White House to try to get the President back of the bill; that is all. Then they have a cotton bill here with a $5,000 fine or 2 years in the penitentiary provision, and they are striking out part of the President's program

That is a lot of hodge-podge, and I do not think the President ought to be charged with this kind of a monstrosity. I believe the man who concocted it should take the full blame. It may seem to be worth while for a year or two, but in the end it must fail. The English plan to boost rubber did boost the price for a brief time to $1.25 per pound; then the plan failed and rubber dropped to 7 cents per pound and the rubber growers were ruined. In the meantime other countries had begun to grow rubber in large quantities, and England awoke to find she had lost her market for all time, because rubber groves had been planted in many parts of the world. Brazil has as much cotton lands, if cleared, as the United States almost. What will happen to the South when other countries open up cotton fields and we lose for all time our advantage by finding others supplying the cotton we used to supply?

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I take this very brief time to say something more upon the question of revenue. It is perfectly ridiculous for anyone to contend that the purpose of this bill is to raise revenue. If you will read the 166 pages of the hearings, you will find that the entire purpose of the sponsors of this bill was to regulate and restrict cotton production. If this had been a revenue bill, it would never have gone to the Committee on Agriculture in the first place. It would have gone to the Committee on Ways and Means. The sponsors of this bill are not under any illusions as to its being a revenue measure.

Several gentlemen who spoke on the floor here in the course of general debate were asked the question whether it was a revenue measure or expected to produce revenue. All of them answered that it was not expected to produce revenue. Of course, this is perfectly obvious. If we should assume that there would be a million or two million bales of cotton sold upon which the tax would be paid, the program would utterly fail, because we are told that we must have this bill in order to keep the cotton production this year down to 10,000,000 bales. If we sell eleven or twelve million bales and pay the tax on the extra one or two million bales, this is going to ruin the cotton industry, according to the testimony before the committee and according to all that has been said by the sponsors and advocates of the bill on the floor of the House. So it is perfectly obvious that the tax has been placed high enough that there will not be any revenue produced.

Mr. KLEBERG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. KLEBERG. Inasmuch as the gentleman from Kansas is so deeply interested in the revenue proposition involved in the bill, may I ask the gentleman from Kansas if the oleomargarine bill were on the floor for discussion at this time he would vote to repeal that bill?

Mr. HOPE. I may say to the gentleman that the oleomargarine bill and this bill are entirely different.

Mr. KLEBERG. With reference to the revenue feature, I should like to find out whether the gentleman is interested, because he is directly touched by the matter or only interested because of the situation in which he now finds himself in discussing the bill as an interested wheat grower and as a member of the minority side, and not as a cotton grower?

Mr. HOPE. Is the gentleman asking a question or making a speech?

Mr. KLEBERG. No; I am too hoarse to make a speech.

Mr. HOPE. If the gentleman is asking me whether or not I am in favor of the oleomargarine bill, I will say I am. Of course, I cannot understand that there is any connection between these two proposals. I merely say that anyone who contends this is a revenue bill is not stating the fact. The Supreme Court held that the oleomargarine bill was a revenue bill, and the oleomargarine law does produce revenue.

Mr. KLEBERG. Does the gentleman think that is the purpose of this bill?

Mr. HOPE. I do not think this bill will produce any revenue; and that is the difference between this bill and the oleomargarine bill.

Mr. KLEBERG. Does the gentleman have the same right to state as authoritatively as he does, that this will not raise any revenue when he compares it with the oleomargarine bill, and is not the gentleman willing to give this a trial?

Mr. HOPE. Does the gentleman favor this bill because it will raise some revenue?

Mr. KLEBERG. Of course it will raise revenue.

Mr. HOPE. Is that the reason we are passing this bill?

Mr. KLEBERG. Why, of course it is partly the reason, and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. HOPE. How much revenue does the gentleman think this bill will bring in?

Mr. KLEBERG. That is a proposition, I admit, I am just as ignorant about as the gentleman is in his whole contention.

Mr. HOPE. Does the gentleman believe it will bring in $1,000,000?

Mr. KLEBERG. I am not willing to indulge in figures in that connection.

Mr. HOPE. Is the gentleman sure it will bring in any revenue?

Mr. KLEBERG. Will the gentleman answer my question in regard to the oleomargarine matter? Did the gentleman vote for that measure because it was a revenue bill or because of his wish that it should comply with certain constitutional requirements?

Mr. HOPE. I have not raised any question about the constitutionality of this measure.

Mr. KLEBERG. The question is clearly one that goes to its constitutionality.

Mr. HOPE. I have not raised any question of constitutionality.

Mr. KLEBERG. Indirectly, the gentleman has.

Mr. HOPE. I am simply discussing the question of whether this is a revenue bill or not.

Mr. KLEBERG. Why is it not?

Mr. HOPE. I say, if it is a revenue bill, the gentleman would not be favoring it, because he would not be in favor of taxing the cotton producer in his district for the purpose of raising revenue.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of clearing up two or three matters.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BUSBY] raises the question of the position of the President. If the gentleman will turn to page 139 of the report of the hearings, he will find there the letter of the President. I shall not read the entire letter; but, after reciting his interest in the problem, the President says:

My study of the various methods suggested leads me to believe that the Bankhead bills, in principle, best cover the situation. I hope that in the continuing emergency your committee can take action.

I should like the gentleman to read that letter, if he is interested.

Mr. BUSBY. I have read that, and the bill was before your committee when the letter was written, was it not?

Mr. JONES. The President says "in principle."

Mr. BUSBY. The bill was already before your committee, was it not?

Mr. JONES. The bill was being considered with certain amendments.

Mr. BUSBY. And you were having hearings before the President ever said a word about it.

Mr. JONES. I do not know whether the gentleman knows what he is talking about or not.

Mr. BUSBY. I am asking the question.

Mr. JONES. I do not think that is important.

Mr. BUSBY. Well, it was. It was concocted and cooked up before the President ever wrote that letter.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman made the opening statement here that he had never heard of this bill being approved by the President.

Mr. BUSBY. He never initiated this proposal.

Mr. JONES. If that is what the gentleman is interested in, I am not interested in the discussion.

Mr. BUSBY. The gentleman cannot dispute that, can he?

Mr. JONES. I am not interested in that. I thought the gentleman really was under the impression the President had not expressed his position in the matter.

Mr. Chairman, I do not yield further, and I hope this will not be taken out of my time. I thought the gentleman was interested in knowing whether the President is interested in this legislation or not, and I was trying to show him that the President is interested. I am not concerned about who originated it or where it originated. I am interested in whether it has merit.

The gentleman asked why we did not apply this to India. I say in reply, for the same reason we do not apply it to the man in the moon.

As to the matter of criticism of the President, the President needs no defense at my hands. His record speaks for itself.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. KLEBERG] injected the question of a tax on oleomargarine in the discussion of this measure and asked the gentleman from Kansas whether or not he would vote for a bill to repeal the tax on oleomargarine. I should like to ask the same question of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. KLEBERG. Yes; I will.

Mr. BOILEAU. I thought that was, perhaps, the purpose of the bill that the gentleman has now pending before the Committee on Agriculture, and I think we ought to watch it very carefully. I thought there was an attempt on the part of certain interests in the country to make it appear as though it were in the interest of American agriculture, but I am glad to find the gentleman takes the position that it really is a direct attack upon the dairying industry.

Mr. KLEBERG. I think the gentleman should yield, inasmuch as we work on the committee together—

Mr. BOILEAU. Gladly, now that I have made my statement.

Mr. KLEBERG. I think the gentleman should permit a frank answer. The matter involved in the question I asked the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE] had to do with the oleomargarine bill which is now one of the laws of our land.

Mr. BOILEAU. And the gentleman would repeal that?

[Here the gavel fell.]

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

AGREEMENTS WITH FOREIGN COUNTRIES

SEC. 23. The President is authorized to enter into agreements with foreign countries to fix the amount of cotton that may be exported by the respective countries entering into said agreements, and to make all rules and regulations necessary for carrying out said agreements.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 20, line 20, strike out all of section 23, including the title on line 19, "Agreements With Foreign Countries."

Mr. FISH. The proposal to give the President power to make agreements with foreign nations regarding a limitation on export of cotton is an absurdity. All the foreign cotton-producing nations are exerting every effort to increase their production of cotton with marked results, whereas we propose by this very bill to reduce it to 10,000,000 bales by rigid compulsory regimentation. Soviet Russia has increased her cotton production to 5,000,000 acres, and expects to double that. Egypt is increasing her yield, and it is planned to develop cotton on a large scale in Uganda. India continues to be a big exporter. It is preposterous to think that any of these foreign nations will curtail their production when they know that we intend doing so without any international agreements.

This amendment is along the general lines of the proposed provision in the tariff bill giving the President power to enter reciprocal trade agreements with foreign nations, which has for its main purpose the lowering of our tariff rates. The Democrats seem determined to resurrect the bogey of free trade.

Waving aside for the moment what I conceive to be a direct violation of the Constitution, the proposed Democratic policy is utterly inconsistent with the policy it has adopted in the United States in connection with processing taxes on certain agricultural products, such as cotton. The processing tax, which is paid by the manufacturer, is nothing but a tariff against the American consumer. Now, having established the principle of a tariff against the American consumer on home products, the administration now proposes to let products of foreign labor come into the United States to further destroy American industry and reduce employment.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, as far as I am concerned, and I have talked with a number of others, I have no objection to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 24. As used in this act—

(a) The term "person" means an individual, a partnership, joint-stock company, a corporation, or a firm.

(b) The term "Commissioner" means the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

(c) The term "collector" means the collector of internal revenue.

(d) The term "ginning" means the separation of lint cotton from seed cotton.

(e) The term "tax" means the tax upon the ginning of cotton imposed by this act.

(f) The term "lint cotton" means the fiber taken from seed cotton by ginning.

(g) The term "seed cotton" means the harvested fruit of the cotton plant.

(h) The term "bale tag" means nondetachable bale tag, stamp, or other means of identifying tax-paid or exempt cotton.

(i) The term "crop year" means the period from June 1 of one year to May 31 of the succeeding year, both dates inclusive.

(j) The term "bale", when used in sections 3, 5, 7, and 8 to describe a quantity of cotton, means 500 pounds of lint cotton.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 21, line 23, strike out "(j)."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of correcting any impression that might go to the country on the curtailed statement I made a moment ago. I have no desire at any time to confuse my colleagues or any Member of this House by either an evasion or an equivocation; nor do I wish to have any statement of mine go out that might result in a misconception of what I meant in my statement.

In the colloquy between the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE] and myself a moment ago, we referred to the oleomargarine legislation as it is on the statute books today. It was based on the principle of whether or not this bill was for revenue or for other purposes. My question concerning the oleomargarine law was whether he would vote for the repeal of the oleo law now on our statutes, and I could not complete my statement because we were hurried.

There was no reference made to the bill that I introduced. The bill I have introduced is a bill which will bring a greater degree of benefit to the dairy industry than the law now on the statute books, an industry in which the gentleman from Kansas and the gentleman from Wisconsin and myself are interested.

Might I suggest to the group that is opposing this bill that if they gave intelligent consideration to it and not continually battle against it by considerations that come out of the blue sky, the results would be much better.

Mr. BOILEAU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KLEBERG. I yield.

Mr. BOILEAU. I understood the gentleman to say that his bill would materially benefit the butter industry.

Mr. KLEBERG. Over the one we now have.

Mr. BOILEAU. If that is the gentleman's bill, we ought to get together and work it out.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 25. The Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to purchase cotton that may be produced in excess of the quantity allotted to producers at a price not to exceed 55 percent of the central market price as established in accordance with the provisions of section 4 (a) of this act, in such quantities as he may deem it possible and advisable to dispose of under special conditions for charitable purposes and in the development of new and extended uses of cotton, and in other ways that will not seriously interfere with the normal marketing of cotton or cotton products. Cotton so purchased by the Secretary shall be exempt from the tax imposed by this act. If such cotton is processed into products for distribution for charitable purposes or into products found to be of low value under the terms of section 15 (a) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, it shall be exempt from the processing tax levied under such act. Funds available to the Secretary of Agriculture under the provisions of section 12 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act are authorized to be made available for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this section. Any funds obtained from the operations authorized by this section or in connection therewith are authorized to be appropriated for carrying out the cotton program of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration or for further operations under this section. The Secretary may enter into agreements with relief agencies and others in the conduct of operations under this section.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. JONES: Page 22, line 5, strike out "(a)" and insert "(b)".

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. JONES: Page 23, line 2, strike out the word "others" and insert "State, Territories, the District of Columbia, and political subdivisions and instrumentalities of the United States, or any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. We have about reached the conclusion of the consideration of this bill under the 5-minute rule, and although I regret very much the many delays that have intervened to prevent the final vote upon it, I am very happy to know that on Monday, under the unanimous-consent agreement, we will have a record vote upon the bill. Although my name appears upon the bill as the author of it, of course, I claim no pride of authorship. In fact, I am not the real author of the bill which is now pending. The bill as now presented is the composite judgment of the Committee on Agriculture, which, as I said, in its deliberations has given to it the very greatest care in the preparation of its provisions. The committee has tremendously improved the bill over its original form, and I indulge the hope that when we vote on this bill on Monday it will have a large majority vote in this House.

I regret that there have been some differences of opinion upon the part of some of our colleagues with reference to this measure. I regret that some rather harsh statements have been made, particularly by the gentleman from Kansas. I shall not undertake to reply to them in kind, because I think it is unnecessary. I think the harsh adjectives that he used have made very little impression upon the membership of the House, because in matters of this sort we are appealing to the judgment of Congress and not to its prejudices.

We have offered here a bill that we believe overwhelmingly represents the desire and the views of the cotton producers of the South. They are not ignoramuses, as some of these gentlemen from other sections of the country would have you believe. They are not morons, they are intelligent farmers who have thought this thing through from the very beginning up until its present status.

I am very glad to have the view of the gentlewoman from Arizona [Mrs. GREENWAY] carrying out the opinion that the more they think about this bill the more they analyze its provisions—the men and women who are directly interested—the stronger becomes their appeal to this Congress to pass this bill for their salvation.

I said I regretted that some Members could not go along with us, and before I conclude I shall make brief reference to one or two statements that have been made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PARKER]. The impression may have gone out among their constituents that they are opposing this bill in principle. They did offer amendments which, in their judgment, would have helped the bill, but they announced many days ago on this floor publicly, both of them, that they favored the principle of the bill, and that they would support it.

I thank all the Members of the House who have been here who have attended these hearings for the generous and patient attention they have given to the discussion of the bill. When I made my statement I said to the Members of the House that the burden was upon us to show that the bill was justified; and as we have proceeded with the deliberations, as all of the arguments pro and con have been presented to this House, I feel confident—and I feel that that confidence will be reflected in their vote on Monday—that we have convinced you that this is a constitutional bill, that it is fairly justified under the conditions with which the cotton producers of the South are confronted; and I believe, as I said then, that it is our salvation in the South, and that this bill defeated will mean the destruction of the prosperity of the South for the next 2 years. Therefore, I appeal to you, as the author of the bill, to give it your support if you can conscientiously do so when we take the final vote on Monday next.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. KVALE. Has the gentleman during the course of the debate addressed himself to the rumors that have been going about through the cloakroom to the effect that this is the first of a series of measures of a similar nature to be applied to other commodity crops; and if he has not done so, will he do so sometime before the bill is finally passed?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I am aware, of course, that those rumors and suggestions have been bandied back and forth, probably in the cloakrooms, on the floor of the House, and probably in the press, but as far as the cotton producers of the South are concerned, the sponsors of this bill, the men who are really behind it, I disclaim that there is any intention to press these propositions upon the other agricultural resources of the country. I assure you that there has been no concert of action along that line, either directly or indirectly. This is a cotton bill and nothing more. I am glad to give that assurance.

Mr. KVALE. I thank the gentleman. I wanted that in the RECORD.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. And is it not true that the matter of the compulsory reduction of the production of cotton has been under consideration in the South for years, and have not some of the States gone so far as to pass compulsory legislation?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is true.

Mr. BUSBY. Is there any peculiar reason why, if it is necessary to apply this to cotton growers to get unanimous cooperation, it will not be necessary to apply it to all other producers of agricultural commodities?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not know what conclusions the wheat growers, the corn growers, and the tobacco growers of this country may reach with reference to this question. They may have great diversity of opinion upon the propriety of undertaking to embrace this principle for their products. We are presenting this measure from the cotton section as a cotton bill, and without any purpose or intention of undertaking to crystallize sentiment in this country for this same character of legislation for any other product in which the producers thereof may have entirely divergent views from those expressed by the cotton growers of the South.

Mr. MCGUGIN. Will the gentleman yield to me to ask a question of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTINGTON]?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the gentleman from Kansas feel that he has a right to ask me to yield, when in two or three speeches in which he used some harsh terms such as "cowardice" and "thievery", which, when the gentleman from Kansas thinks over, I believe he will strike from the RECORD? Does the gentleman think he has any right to ask me to yield? However, I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MCGUGIN. I yielded to the gentleman on more than one occasion.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] has expired.

Mr. MCGUGIN. I notice the gentleman yielded after his time had expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the section for the purpose of asking a question.

I want to be enlightened a little on section 25. As I read that section, the Secretary of Agriculture, assuming that cotton in the 10 central markets is selling for 12 cents, can buy surplus cotton at 55 percent of that price, which would be 6.6 cents.

Mr. JONES. He may buy the surplus.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The cotton that he buys is exempt from taxes imposed in this bill, is it not? In other words, there is lodged in his hands surplus cotton at 6.6 cents per pound to be used for three purposes: One, for charity; the other for the development of new cotton uses; and for processing into goods of low price.

Mr. JONES. It must be limited to the funds which he has.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Is he authorized to take the 6.6-cent cotton and use it for trade purposes or for the international exchange of products of some other country?

Mr. JONES. No; he is not.

Mr. DIRKSEN. As against the domestic price of 12 cents?

Mr. JONES. No; he is not authorized to do that. My amendment, in order to make that certain, strikes out "others", and puts in "State institutions and subdivisions thereof."

Mr. DIRKSEN. But in line 10 it reads, "in other ways that will not seriously interfere with the normal marketing of cotton and cotton products." I take it that that is rather general authority, which would empower the Secretary of Agriculture to deal internationally, using the 6.6-cent cotton.

Mr. JONES. No; I do not think so. If there is any doubt about it, I would agree to put in the word "similar."

Mr. DIRKSEN. I do not say he will use it, but he will be given that authority.

Mr. JONES. That is not the intention at all, I assure the gentleman.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 26. Subsection (1) of section 8 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, is amended by inserting at the end of the first sentence thereof the following:

"Agreements authorized by this subsection shall include, among others, provisions requiring the producers who are parties to such agreements to reduce or limit acreage and/or production for market of agricultural commodities other than basic agricultural commodities, as well as one or more basic agricultural commodities."

With the following committee amendment:

Page 23, line 6, strike out the word "shall" and insert the word "may."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to House Resolution 292, the Committee will now rise.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HILL of Alabama, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill H.R. 8402, the cotton control bill, and pursuant to House Resolution 292, he reported the same back to the House with amendments adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON]?

There was no objection.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, on Monday I understand a bill is to come up under suspension of the rules to extend the provisions of the Philippine independence bill passed during the last Congress. In this connection I have been furnished with a brief memorandum on certain constitutional aspects of this whole question. Several Members of the House, and also of the Senate, have asked me to furnish them copies of this particular memorandum. It is prepared by an eminent constitutional lawyer, Mr. George Gray Zabriskie, a constituent of mine.

At the request of Members of the House, and also some Members of the Senate, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by including this memorandum in the RECORD at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The memorandum referred to follows:

MEMORANDUM UPON PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE BILL

The following notes are the result of a preliminary examination of such statutes, authorities, and arguments as it has been possible to find in a short time which seem to bear most closely upon the question of the power of Congress to grant independence to the Philippines. Particular acknowledgment is due to a brief prepared by the late Judge Daniel R. Williams and printed as Senate Document No. 328, Seventy-first Congress, third session; to the brief of Maj. Gen. Blanton Winship, Judge Advocate General of the Army, furnished to the Secretary of War under date of January 3, 1933; and to the extensive and painstaking researches of Senator COPELAND as embodied in his speeches in opposition to the constitutionality of the present act delivered in the Senate on December 8, 9, and 15, 1932. A complete examination of this question would necessitate a long and detailed study of treatises, departmental reports, congressional debates, and other material, which would require a vast amount of time and effort and would probably lead to no other conclusions than those here expressed.

Any inquiry into the validity of an act of Congress starts with a presumption in favor of its constitutionality. Yet when, as in this case, the act purports to exercise a power which has never been used before, an original question is presented and must be examined from all sides to ascertain whether or not Congress actually possesses the power.

The first proposition involved is stated in the tenth amendment to the Constitution, which reads: "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it (i.e., by the Constitution) to the States are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people."

In 1902 Congress passed an act (32 Stat. 691; 14 U.S.C., An., sec. 1490) providing that "The Constitution and laws of the United States which are not locally inapplicable shall have the same force and effect within all the organized Territories and in every territory hereafter organized as elsewhere in the United States; but the foregoing provision shall not apply to the Philippine Islands." However, this does not mean that the Constitution does not govern or limit the power of Congress in dealing with the Philippine Islands, nor could such an act of Congress override the provisions of the Constitution itself, as expounded by the Supreme Court, which has held in a number of cases that some of the fundamental prohibitions contained in the Constitution do apply to the government of Territories belonging to the United States, as will be shown below.

The specific question, therefore, is whether the power to relinquish sovereignty over territory belonging to the United States is a power delegated to the United States. If it is such a power, it could be exercised by the United States through Congress, in which all legislative powers are vested by article I, sections 1 and 8, of the Constitution.

The sovereignty of the United States over the Philippines is complete and absolute (14 Diamond Rings v. U.S., 183 U.S., 176, 179), just as much so as over any part of the territory included within the limits of any one of the States.

The argument in favor of the power of the Federal Government to relinquish sovereignty over territory belonging to the United States is based partly on implication from its undoubted and frequently exercised power to acquire such sovereignty through war or through the treaty-making power which is vested in the President and the Senate (not in Congress) by article II of the Constitution. This argument does not seem to sustain itself. It may well be that the treaty-making power would have the capacity to cede territory as the result of being defeated in a war under the doctrine of force majeure; and claims to territory the sovereignty of which is disputed or doubtful have been surrendered in the course of necessary boundary adjustments. In such cases, however, the surrender would be made by virtue of a treaty with another nation, and where the territory involved in a boundary adjustment forms part of a State, the State's consent must first be obtained, as in the case of the Ashburton Treaty. (See Fort Leavenworth R.R. Co. v. Lowe, 114 U.S. 525, 541.) But until the Philippines achieve independence they cannot make treaties; for the United States to pretend to make a treaty with one of its possessions giving it independence would be a contradiction in terms.

It is even doubtful whether Congress possessed the constitutional power to cede part of the District of Columbia to an adjoining State; see Payne v. Phillips (92 U.S. 130), discussed below. Apart from that, the power to accept or take possession of property for a principal does not under ordinary circumstances imply a correlative power to give it up; certainly not without receiving full value in exchange. Still less would this seem to be the case when the agency is a body whose powers are prescribed and limited by the Constitution and not merely by the common law. Woolsey (International Law, 6th ed., p. 63) says: "A State's territorial right gives no power to the ruler to alienate a part of the territory by way of barter or sale, as was done in feudal times. In other words, the right is a public or political and not a personal one." So Ayala, in 1582, wrote that princes are incompetent to alienate any part of their realms. This doctrine is particularly applicable to alienation of the Philippine Territory by act of Congress, because the sovereignty or supreme power which it is sought to transfer or abdicate, resides not in the ruler, that is to say the Federal Government, but in the people of the United States.

In any case, what is now under consideration is an existing act of Congress, not a treaty.

The power given to Congress in article I, section 8, to "provide for the general welfare of the United States", has been repeatedly held to be merely a limitation upon the taxing power, with which it is coupled (Ward v. Maryland, 12 Wall. 418, 428; U.S. v. Boyer, 85 Fed. 425, 431, quoting from Story on the Constitution). That power, therefore, could not be made the basis of a congressional grant of independence to the Philippines, even on the assumption that the United States would be better off without them.

The main basis for the claim that Congress has the power to give up the sovereignty of the United States over the Philippines is, however, based on article IV, section 3, of the Constitution, which reads as follows:

"... The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful regulations respecting the territory or other property of the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States or of any particular State."

In interpreting this provision of the Constitution, the first inquiry must be into the meaning of the words "dispose of." Everyone knows and the dictionaries show that this is a phrase of very broad and general meaning in ordinary use. It may and frequently does mean to sell or transfer; it also has the meanings of deal with, provide for, exercise control over, arrange, regulate, manage, order, etc. (See Century Dictionary, Murray's, Worcester's, Webster's, and Funk & Wagnall's Dictionaries.)

As used in legal connections, the term also has a variety of meanings. "The word is 'nomen generalissimum' and, standing by itself, without qualification, has no technical significance" (Phelps v. Harris, 171 U.S. 370, 381). Like any other phrase, therefore, it must be construed, with reference to its context and to the circumstances under which it was used, in order to find the meaning intended to be given it by the users, in this case the framers of the Constitution. Obviously they could not have intended to give Congress power to deal with territory in every one of the senses comprehended by the dictionary definitions; otherwise Congress could destroy property of the United States or even give away territory such as the Philippines, or West Point, or one of our navy yards, or the whole District of Columbia, to a hostile foreign power. Jefferson, as quoted by White, Justice, in Downes v. Bidwell (182 U.S. 315-317), asserted that the Government had no power to cede even unpeopled territory. Edmund Randolph was so strongly of the opinion that Congress should not be given such power that he secured the defeat in the Virginia Convention which ratified the Constitution of a proposed amendment which would have given three fourths of both Houses power to ratify treaties ceding any territorial rights of the United States.

The words must, therefore, have some limited meaning. They may mean quite the opposite of alienate; for example, in a statute authorizing a receiver to dispose of personal property, the term comprehended collecting a note, which imports the obtaining of possession of property under the note, and is the opposite of alienating or surrendering it (Fling v. Goodall, 40 N.H. 208, 219); and where a clause in a will did not direct the trustees to sell but to "dispose of" the whole estate, the words were held not to impart a direction to sell but meant that the trustees should hold and manage the estate to the best advantage of the testator's family (Sheffield v. Orrery, 3 Atk. 282). In construing the expression in the light of its context the cases follow the maxim "noscitur a sociis", and hold that it should be given a meaning in line with other expressions in connection with which it is used (Love v. Pamplin, 21 Fed. 755, 760; United States v. Hacker, 73 Fed. 292). In the latter case, where a statute forbade the cutting of timber on Government lands with the intent to export or dispose of it, the Court approved the following statement: "The word 'dispose' is used in connection with the word 'export', and should therefore be construed according to the maxim 'noscitur a sociis.' When thus construed, it does not mean simply to put in place, arrange, or manage; it means, in this connection, to alienate, sell, or transfer." This makes it clear that in different connections or constructions the phrase may mean "to arrange or manage." In article IV of the Constitution the language is, "The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful regulations respecting the territory or other property of the United States." Applying the same principle of construction, it would seem that where "the territory" under consideration is a possession like the Philippines, "dispose of" means to manage or arrange, which harmonizes with "make all needful regulations respecting", rather than to alienate or surrender the territory.

This thesis is borne out by Chief Justice Taney's elaborate and lucid discussion of the circumstances which led to the adoption of the disposing clause and the limited purposes its authors had in mind in Scott v. Sanford (19 How. 393), at pages 434-440. Section 3 of article IV of the Constitution was framed with the Northwest Territory in view and its primary object was to provide for its organization into new States and its protection and government in the meantime, thus confirming the so-called "Dane Ordinance" of 1787 of the Continental Congress. The most important part of the section was its first clause, providing for the erection of new States; the disposing clause was an appendage, to which again "noscitur a sociis" applies, directed to the period preliminary to their erection. No one would dream that the clause would have been adopted or ratified if it had meant to the framers that Congress may cede the Northwest or other territories of the United States to a foreign monarch, or provide for the erection of foreign independent governments in their midst. The last part of the clause is of great importance in this connection. When read together with the tenth amendment, which was drafted almost as soon as the original Constitution itself, and which reserved to the States or to the people all powers not delegated to the United States, it must mean that in disposing of territory the Federal Government may do nothing that would prejudice the claim of the United States to sovereignty over such territory, and that each State has the right to have its claim protected as a member of the Union, jointly interested with all the others.

Territory, in turn, is a word of more than one meaning. In United States v. Gratiot (14 Pet. 527), it was held that where the territory in question consisted of public lands belonging to the United States, Congress might, under the power to dispose of them, sell or lease such lands. In a case of that sort of territory, which is presumably what the framers of the Constitution primarily had in mind, it was obviously the intention that it should be open for settlement, or, in the case of mines, which were the subject of the Gratiot case, should be worked on lease or otherwise; but when the word "territory" is applied to a country over which the United States has acquired sovereignty but much of the land in which has already long been settled and privately owned, the intendment of the phrase "dispose of" and the extent of the disposing power given to Congress over such territory is necessarily wholly different.

It has already been said that in its dealings with territory of the United States, as in all its other functions, the power of Congress is limited by the provisions of the Constitution, whose creature it is. Under this principle the courts have repeatedly held that however broad may be the language of any statute that deals with the power of Congress over Territories in the sense of organized Territories or other insular possessions, some of the fundamental prohibitions of the Constitution still apply to and restrict the exercise of the congressional power (Downes v. Bidwell, 182 U.S. 244; Dorr v. U.S., 195 U.S. 138; Scott v. Sanford, 19 How. 393; Mormon Church Case, 136 U.S. 1; De Lima v. Bidwell, 182 U.S. 1; Hawaii v. Mankichi, 190 U.S. 197).

The following language from the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Curtis in the Dred Scott case (19 How. p. 614) has been quoted with approval in practically all the other cases cited: "If, then, this clause does contain a power to legislate respecting the territory, what are the limits of that power? To this I answer that in common with all the other legislative powers of Congress, it finds limits in the express prohibitions on Congress not to do certain things; that in the exercise of the legislative power Congress cannot pass an ex post facto law or bill of attainder, and so in respect to each of the other prohibitions contained in the Constitution." In Dorr v. U.S., supra, the Court, after quoting this language said (p. 143) that the Philippines were to be governed under the power existing in Congress to make laws for such Territories, subject to such constitutional restrictions upon the powers of that body as are applicable to the situation. (The italics here, as elsewhere, are mine.) The Court further said, referring to the treaty by which Spain ceded the Philippines to the United States: "It is clear that it was the intention of the framers of the treaty to reserve to Congress, so far as it could constitutionally be done, a free hand in dealing with these newly acquired possessions." The Court then proceeded to decide that the fundamental limitations upon the power of Congress in legislating for the Philippines, the extent of which must be decided as questions arise, did not require the enactment of legislation giving the right of trial by jury, since when the United States acquired the Philippines they already had an established system of jurisprudence affording fair and orderly trials under an acceptable and long-established code, but without the common-law provision of trial by jury. A similar decision was made in the case of Hawaii v. Mankichi, supra, with regard to crimes committed in Hawaii before the Territorial act providing for jury trials took effect, and in Ocampo v. U.S. (234 U.S. 91) it was held that neither the fifth nor the fourteenth amendment required presentment or indictment by grand jury in Philippine criminal cases.

The limitations upon the power of Congress under the Territorial clause of the Constitution to legislate for the insular possessions of the United States are discussed more specifically by the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit in Soto v. United States (273 Fed. 628), an appeal from the Virgin Islands. There the court said (p. 633):

"The only laws of the United States applicable to the Virgin Islands are the act of Congress of March 3, 1917, and the fundamental law of the Constitution guaranteeing certain rights to all within its protection. These rights have, by repeated decisions of the Supreme Court, been divided into two classes, artificial or remedial rights, which are peculiar to our own system of jurisprudence; and natural or personal rights, enforced in the Constitution by prohibition against interference with them. Rights of both kinds are embraced within the fifth and sixth amendments to the Constitution. Remedial rights there guaranteed are, for instance, the right of presentment by grand jury and of trial by jury. It has been decided that rights of this character are not among the fundamental rights which Congress in legislating for a territory not incorporated into the United States must secure to its inhabitants. (Talton v. Mayes, 163 U.S. 376, 16 Sup. Ct. 986, 41 L. ed. 196; Hawaii v. Mankichi, 190 U.S. 197, 23 Sup. Ct. 787, 47 L. ed. 1016). In harmony with these decisions it has been further held that until Congress shall extend rights of this character to the inhabitants of newly acquired territory, the judicial system prevailing in such territory—not the system contemplated by the Constitution—is applicable and controlling. But in the insular cases—De Lima v. Bidwell (182 U.S. 1, 21 Sup. Ct. 743, 45 L. ed. 1041), Dooley v. United States (182 U.S. 222, 21 Sup. Ct. 762, 45 L. ed. 1074), Downes v. Bidwell (182 U.S. 244, 21 Sup. Ct. 770, 45 L. ed. 1088), as well as in Hawaii v. Mankichi (190 U.S. 197, 23 Sup. Ct. 787, 45 L. ed. 1016), and Dorr v. United States (195 U.S. 138, 24 Sup. Ct. 808, 49 L. ed. 128, 1 Ann. Cas. 697)—where the Supreme Court reviewed nearly the whole range of sovereignty of the United States over its possessions, defining what laws, statutory and constitutional, are not applicable to unincorporated territories until Congress shall extend them it is made very certain that there are constitutional rights of a natural or personal nature of which Congress cannot, in legislating for such outlying territories, deprive their inhabitants. In these cases the Supreme Court clearly expressed the opinion, not on the point of the decisions, to be sure, but as a logical corollary, that even if the people of such territories—not being possessed of the political rights of citizens—are regarded as aliens, they are entitled in the spirit of the Constitution to be protected in life, liberty, and property and not to be deprived thereof without due process of law." (Italics mine.)

What is there said seems the necessary result of the United States Supreme Court cases upon which the language quoted is based.

If, therefore, Congress, in legislating for the Philippines, is restricted by the due-process and other provisions of the Constitution which guarantee the natural or personal rights of Philippine nationals, it is impossible to see how it is competent for Congress to withdraw the sovereignty of the United States which is the foundation of those rights, and thus destroy the whole fabric of constitutional guaranties for the Philippines. This consideration goes so fundamentally to the root of the matter that it seems impossible that the existence of the words "dispose of" in the fourth article of the Constitution can bring about a different result, especially when, as we have seen, their natural interpretation under the principles heretofore discussed would not cover the alienation of sovereignty even apart from the restrictions on the power of Congress which are spelled out of the other provisions of the Constitution.

It is true that in the case of Public Utility Commissioners v. Ynchausti & Co. (251 U.S. 401) Mr. Justice White made a remark which, taken by itself, would seem strongly opposed to what has just been said. What that case decided was that in licensing vessels to engage in the Philippine coastwise trade the Philippine Bill of Rights, which, as we have seen, is contained in an act of Congress, does not prevent the Philippine government from requiring as a condition the free transportation of mails. At page 406, however, Justice White said:

"... the mistake which underlies the entire argument as to the nonexistence of power here relied upon arises from the erroneous assumption that the constitutional limitations of power which operate upon the authority of Congress when legislating for the United States are applicable and are controlling upon Congress when it comes to exert, in virtue of the sovereignty of the United States, legislative power over territory not forming part of the United States, because not incorporated therein (Downes v. Bidwell, 182 U.S. 244; Hawaii v. Mankichi, 190 U.S. 197, 220; Dorr v. United States, 195 U.S. 138; Dowdell v. United States, 221 U.S. 325, 332; Ocampo v. United States, 234 U.S. 91, 98)." (Italics mine.)

In the first place, this observation was a dictum, wholly unnecessary to the decision of the case. The words of Chief Justice Marshall in Cohens v. Virginia (6 Wheat. 89, 112) as quoted (but misquoted) by Brown, J., in Downes against Bidwell are apt in this connection:

"It is a maxim not to be disregarded that general expressions in every opinion are to be taken in connection with the case in which those expressions are used. If they go beyond the case they may be respected, but ought not to control the judgment in a subsequent suit when the very point is presented for decision. The reason of this maxim is obvious. The question actually before the court is investigated with care and considered in its full extent. The other principles which may serve to illustrate it are considered in relation to the case decided, but their possible bearing on all other cases is seldom completely investigated."

Of more importance, however, is the fact that in support of his dictum, Mr. Justice White cited the cases he did. All but one of them have been discussed in this memorandum. In view of what the court had held in those cases, and of the fact that his own opinion in Downes against Bidwell was a 57-page dissertation on the constitutional limitations upon the power of Congress in dealing with the insular possessions of the United States, based in part upon the quotation given above from the Dred Scott case, it is evident that the observation referred to in the Ynchausti case was merely a loose and ill-considered dictum which its author would have been the last person to intend to be taken literally. He plainly meant that not all the constitutional limitations of power which operate upon the authority of Congress when legislating for the United States—the requirements of indictment and jury trials for criminal offenses, for instance—are applicable to the exercise of its legislative power over territory not incorporated in the United States. It is unthinkable that Justice White had so far changed his views since making the exhaustive study of the subject shown in his opinion in Downes against Bidwell as to have come to believe that Congress could, for example, pass a bill condemning a Filipino to death without trial. Justice Brown in his concurring opinion in the Downes case said:

"It may be remarked * * * that too much weight must not be given to general expressions found in several opinions that the power of Congress over Territories is complete and supreme, because these words may be interpreted as meaning only supreme under the Constitution * * *. Thus, when the Constitution declares that 'no bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed', and that 'no title of nobility shall be granted by the United States, it goes to the competency of Congress to pass a bill of that description'" (182 U.S., pp. 258, 277).

And at page 291 in the same case Justice White points to the distinction between the constitutional competency of Congress to pass a given act and the constitutional applicability of that particular act to the Government of unincorporated territory, saying:

"As Congress in governing the Territories is subject to the Constitution, it results that all the limitations of the Constitution which are applicable to Congress in exercising this authority necessarily limit its power on this subject. It follows also that every provision of the Constitution which is applicable to the Territories is also controlling therein." (Italics mine.)

All this shows that the last phrase of section 3 of article IV of the Constitution must mean in this connection that nothing in the Constitution shall be so construed as to make Congress competent to alienate sovereignty over territory belonging to the United States, to the prejudice of the claims of the United States or of any particular State.

It may well be that that section empowers Congress to dispose of such territory as our insular possessions by organizing them into what can be called "territories", as was done in the case of Hawaii; but there seems to be no basis in the Constitution as a whole or in the decisions which have so far been found for construing this clause as permitting Congress to take the further step of thereafter disposing of such territory in the wholly different sense of abandoning sovereignty over it.

These considerations give full support to the only direct judicial pronouncement that has been found on the subject, namely, Mr. Justice White's own dictum in his opinion in Downes v. Bidwell (182 U.S. at p. 314), where he said:

"I cannot resist the belief that the theory that the disposing clause relates as well to the relinquishment or cession of sovereignty, as to mere transfer of rights of property, is altogether erroneous."

That opinion, though not necessarily this particular observation, was approved by the unanimous Supreme Court in Balzac v. Porto Rico (258 U.S. 298, 305), as stating the law of the Court.

It has been argued that although not clothed with power to alienate sovereignty by any express provision in the Constitution, Congress may do so under some resulting or implied power which is thought to have been given it by article I, section 8, clause 18. This provision declares that Congress shall have the power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof." The difficulty with this argument is that the clause in question by its terms gives Congress power only to make all laws necessary to carry into effect powers already given to Congress or to the executive department of the Government, all others remaining reserved to the people. This comprehends the grant of any power which, in the words of the Legal Tender cases (12 Wall. 457, 533) "may be deduced fairly from more than one of the substantive powers expressly defined or from them all combined." As illustrated by General Winship the result of the clause is, for example, to give Congress power to enact the legislation necessary and proper for carrying on a war after Congress has declared it, and for carrying into effect the provisions of the treaty of peace adopted by the President and the Senate at the end of the war; but, as the Judge Advocate General goes on to say:

"The general authority to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into effect any group of the enumerated powers of the various departments of the Government, or all of them together, cannot rise higher than to carry into effect the sum total of all those specifically granted powers, together with the powers reasonably inferable therefrom. The aggregate cannot be more than the sum of the parts. To hold otherwise would be to say that this general grant of authority to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into effect the specified powers of the various departments of the Government, acknowledges no definite limits whatsoever, and may amount in effect almost to a grant of complete sovereignty to the Congress, and go far towards nullifying the intent to make the Government of the United States one of enumerated and specified powers."

It is true that these last words, written only a few months ago, sound prophetically applicable to some of the recent legislation enacted by Congress. It must be borne in mind, however, that none of these extraordinary laws, such as some of the provisions of the Farm Act or the National Industrial Recovery Act, for example, have yet been tested in the courts; and in the next place, that they were passed under the stress of a great and compelling emergency which was more disastrous than a war and was thought to sanction and require the adoption of measures that would not have been dreamed of in ordinary times. Just as the constitutional limits of the war power have always been recognized to be elastic in the extreme, so it is possible that the courts may sustain most or all of these statutes on the practical ground that the national emergency left the Government no alternative but to try them or else face national ruin. However, that may be, we may feel certain that the Supreme Court will not countenance the abrogation of all constitutional restraints on the power of Congress in every direction and regardless of emergencies, and that it will observe the distinction between the current economic conditions in the United States and the complete lack of any emergency in our relations with the Philippines which would necessitate or justify the grant of complete sovereignty to Congress with respect to them. For the court to do otherwise would be to abdicate its functions and to put our Government on a par with the present regimes in Germany, Italy, and Russia.

It is therefore impossible to see how the power to divest the United States of sovereignty over the Philippines can be implied from any other power or group of powers granted to the Federal Government by the Constitution.

Much has been made of pronouncements at various times by President Wilson and others and of the preamble to the Organic Act of 1916 to the effect that ultimate independence for the Philippines has been and is the policy of the United States. Assuming this to be true, that policy can be put into effect in due time if an appropriate constitutional amendment is adopted empowering either Congress or the Executive to set the islands free. When the United States acquired them, however, Philippine independence, either immediate or ultimate, was clearly not the national policy. It will be remembered that at the very outset a most determined effort was made to bind the Government to the policy of independence; and how the movement was defeated in connection with the ratification of the treaty that ended the war between the United States and Spain was pointed out by Senator COPELAND in his carefully detailed argument in the Senate in December 1932.

Article II of the treaty reads: "Spain cedes to the United States the archipelago known as the 'Philippine Islands.'" The same word "cedes" is used with regard to Puerto Rico. In article I the treaty provides that "Spain relinquishes all claim of sovereignty over and title to Cuba." Dr. COPELAND reminded the Senate that at the time the question was a political football, with William Jennings Bryan, the head of the Democratic Party, leading the anti-imperialists. He shows how, on the day the treaty was up for ratification, a strenuous attempt was made to put through a resolution amending it by changing the words "cedes to the United States" to "relinquishes all claim of sovereignty", so that the Philippines and Puerto Rico should by the treaty be made independent in the same way as Cuba. Another resolution offered and pressed at the same time was to that exact effect, namely, that it was the intention of the Senate in ratifying the treaty to place the inhabitants of the Philippines, Puerto Rico, and Cuba in precisely the same position with respect to their relations to the United States. These resolutions were considered together and defeated by a vote of 53 to 30, and thereupon the treaty as it stood was ratified 57 to 27.

This action shows definitely that the treaty-making power did not accept the cession of the Philippines with the intent of turning them loose then or later.

Eight days afterward, however, a third resolution was called up and adopted by a vote of 26 to 22, to the effect that by the ratification of the peace treaty it was not intended to incorporate the inhabitants of the Philippines into citizenship of the United States or permanently to annex the islands as an integral part of American territory, but that it was the intention of the United States to establish there a government suitable for preparing the inhabitants for local self-government, and in due time to make such disposition of the islands as should best promote their interests and those of the United States. It will be observed that this resolution failed to hold out any definite offer of independence to the Philippines, and, such as it was, the small attendance showed plainly that the majority Senators who had voted to ratify the treaty considered that since ratification was already accomplished the question was academic and the resolution unimportant; and so it was held by the Supreme Court in the case of the Fourteen Diamond Rings (183 U.S. supra, at p. 179), where the court said: "It is noted that this was a joint resolution; that it was adopted by the Senate by a vote of 26 to 22, not two thirds of a quorum, and that it is absolutely without legal significance on the question before us. The meaning of the treaty cannot be controlled by subsequent explanations of some of those who may have voted to ratify it. * * * If any implication from the action referred to could properly be indulged, it would seem to be that two thirds of a quorum of the Senate did not consent to the ratification on the grounds indicated."

Ever since Mr. Bryan's day Philippine independence has been kept alive as a Democratic tenet, and it was while he was Secretary of State that the present organic act was framed. Statements of policy such as those contained in that act and made from time to time by political leaders are frequently uttered with all solemnity by the heads or responsible officers of administrations, only to be reversed or ignored by their successors; and they often reflect what the party or administration responsible for them would like to see accomplished rather than what they may be or shall have been able to achieve at the time. And if the sovereignty and dominion of this country over the Philippines is complete and absolute, as has been held by the Supreme Court, and if the Constitution does not give Congress the power to alienate or abandon such sovereignty, as the Court appears also to have indicated, it is not perceived how any such pronouncements or statements by either the ex-executive or legislative branch of the Government can supply the lack of such power, with however much solemnity or good faith they may have been made. (See 14 Diamond Rings v. United States, 183 U.S. 176, 179.) If and when the people of the United States, by ratifying an appropriate amendment to the Constitution, determine to give independence to the Philippines, Congress may legally give them their freedom, but not before.

THE COST OF SOIL EROSION

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the cost of soil erosion and to insert in the RECORD a statement on this subject by Mr. H. H. Bennett.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of H. H. Bennett, Director Soil Erosion Service, United States Department of the Interior, before Illinois Farmers' Institute, Jacksonville, Ill., February 22, 1934:

Unrestrained soil erosion is rapidly building a new public domain in America, an empire of impoverished and worn-out soil; land stripped of its rich covering of surface soil or gullied beyond the possibility of practical reclamation. The estimated yearly cost of this wide-spread evil to the farmers and ranchers of the country amounts to $400,000,000, along with numerous other formidable losses, such as damage to highways and embankments of railways, silting of reservoirs, and the choking of stream channels and ditches. The wastage is not merely continuing but is speeding up with the removal of the absorptive topsoil down to less absorptive, less productive, more erosive subsoil. Over this exposed subsoil, which usually consists of relatively impervious clay, rainwater flows away faster from millions of denuded acres to increase the frequency and volume of floods. Rich bottom lands are reduced in productivity or ruined outright by overwash of poor subsoil material, sand, and gravel swept down from the hills.

Farmers operating on slopes stripped of the vitally important surface layer, the principal feeding zone of plants, have but the slimmest opportunity to make a satisfactory living, whether prices are up or down. They have been reduced to the status of subsoil farmers. Subsoil farming generally is the equivalent of bankrupt farming on bankrupt land. The productivity of most of these eroded slopes has been reduced 2 to 10 times or more as compared with the original soil. These subsistence or submarginal farmers produce in the aggregate, nevertheless, enough to compete in a price-depressing way with those tilling good land.

Fully 75 percent of the area of the United States is subject in some degree to impoverishing soil washing wherever used for the clean-tilled crops or overgrazed. More than half of this is susceptible to serious washing, which eventually leads to a condition of land destruction if not controlled.

BETTER LAND USE

Recently we have heard much about the need for improved practices in land utilization, the adoption of a better-balanced type of agriculture, better protection of cultivated fields from erosion, and the elimination of numerous marginal and submarginal areas from crop production. We have been preaching crop diversification for more than a generation, with not much more than the preaching as the principal net result. Just now, however, we are seeing some evidence of action along several lines of procedure. The Civilian Conservation Corps is closing up many ugly gullies, and plans are being rushed to get under way large regional demonstrations of practical erosion control.

With respect to methods of land use, we have been anything but discriminative. We have cut trees from steep erosive slopes and planted the land to clean-tilled crops, as cotton, corn, and tobacco, which are conducive to accelerated soil washing. We have planted all kinds of crops on land that is adapted to trees or grass and nothing but trees or grass, as if all kinds of land had the same natural adaptations. We have permitted countless slopes to wash down to a mere geological skeleton of land, assuming that erosion is a natural process not to be retarded by man, or without so much as devoting a serious thought to the matter.

In these assumptions and procedures we have been about 100 percent wrong over far too much of the country. It is time we were waking up. We cannot go along indefinitely in the old way of heaping error on error, of misusing land, wasting and destroying it—not if this is to be a permanent nation. Already there are numerous localities where not much is left to save, not much upon which to practice better methods of land use. Where all the land is poor, there is no point in discussing the advisability of selectively retiring the submarginal areas from production.

When we think of land we usually have in mind productive soil. Few of us have learned to differentiate between soil and subsoil; we have not realized that subsoil is but the material from which soil is formed through centuries of weathering and building. That our methods of land use, or, rather, misuse, have caused the stripping-off of the surface soil from more than 150,000,000 acres that once was largely fair to good land and that the process is continuing at an accelerated rate is not at all a matter of common knowledge. We have made a thorough job of overlooking the problem until now it has become a national menace.

Erosion goes steadily ahead impoverishing the land of unprotected fields and overgrazed ranges with every heavy rain. Its toll is cumulative; and since the subsoil usually washes faster than the soil, the wastage grows worse in geometric progression.

Washington, Jefferson, and Edmund Ruffin sensed the evils of erosion on their Virginia plantations with better vision than the average present-day agriculturist. In our schools we have taught the meaning of and remedy for almost every conceivable thing pertaining to agriculture except this one thing of soil devastation by erosion. Of all physical and chemical agencies affecting the land, separately or combined, this is the greatest thief of its fertility, the greatest destroyer of land, and the greatest enemy to the farmer who tills sloping fields. We have just recently begun to apply the scrutiny of research to the problem; and only within the past few years have we systematically measured the rates and amounts of soil and water losses from definite types of land undergoing various cultural treatments. This basic information, which we should have begun to procure 75 years ago, we are just now getting for the first time.

DECLINING YIELDS

In spite of all our work with breeding better varieties of corn, regardless of better cultivation and crop rotations, and the better machinery employed, along with the use of more fertilizers and soil-improving crops; and, further, in spite of all the education provided in the agricultural colleges of every State, and in books, bulletins, the press, corn clubs, and farmers' meetings, with frequent prizes for the best producers, the yield of corn, strange to say, has gone down instead of up. When we consider that corn growing has not been pushed out, on a very large scale, into the unfavorable environment of semiarid regions and that it has suffered from no far-reaching, devastating insect or disease scourges, we can reach but one conclusion, that erosion has thwarted much of our stupendous efforts to increase the acreage yields of the crop.

The average yield of corn for the 10-year period 1871-80, inclusive, was 27.04 bushels an acre, as against 26.13 bushels for the period 1921-30, inclusive. Wheat yields increased from a 10-year average of 12.4 bushels per acre for the period 1871-80 to 14.33 bushels for the period 1901-10, but for the decade 1921-30 there was a slight decline to 14.25 bushels. The average yield of cotton for the 10-year period 1871-80 was 186.42 pounds an acre, as against 152.96 pounds an acre for the period 1921-30. In numerous localities the yields of these crops have declined much more than these Nation-wide averages, even to the extent of necessitating abandonment of the worn-out fields. For example, the yield of cotton declined from an average of 200 pounds an acre in nine black-land counties of central Texas for the year 1905 to 134 pounds for 1926, while the State-wide yield dropped from 170 to 134 pounds. In these nine counties erosion has stripped off the black surface soil of many fields down to the substratum of almost lifeless chalk, causing a reduction ranging to as much as from one half to one fortieth of a bale to the acre.

In 1879, with 177,500,000 acres in cultivation, $28,000,000 were spent in the United States for fertilizers; 50 years later, with 359,000,000 acres in cultivation, our expenditures for fertilizers amounted to $271,000,000. In North Carolina there was an increase of 1,600 percent in expenditures for fertilizers between 1879 and 1929—from $2,000,000 to $34,000,000—while the crop area increased by only 34 percent.

NOT TOO MUCH GOOD LAND

While we have an enormous area of land, it is by no means all good land. Most of our better soil is in cultivation and has been for some time. Much of this was only moderately productive the day it was cleared of virgin forest or broken out of its sward of prairie grasses. Many millions of acres were so inherently poor that we soon developed the common practice of using a field as long as it would produce and then abandoning it for new clearings. We are still doing this in some localities. In the Tennessee Valley I talked with farmers last year who were clearing land so precipitous, it was difficult to climb, some of it having a slope of 70 feet in a hundred. The farmers themselves admitted that such land, if used for corn or tobacco, as they proposed to use it, would lose all or most of its surface soil within 3 to 7 or 8 years of cultivation, following which it would be abandoned to weeds. There is abundant evidence of what happens; no one can argue to the contrary with the ribs of the earth protruding from countless erosion-scarred slopes.

As an illustration of the fallacy of cultivating steep, erosive land, a single example will be given—one considerably removed, however, from the extremes that thousands of farmers have gone to in many parts of the United States. On a 220-acre farm in the heart of the famous Palouse wheat belt in southeastern Washington, careful surveys and measurements have shown that 25 percent of the farm, the steeper, more erosive fields, produces 15 percent of the crops grown, at a cost amounting to 35 percent of the total operating expense of the farm. Looked at in a different way, this means that if 55 acres could be eliminated from all consideration, or dumped into the ocean, the farm would still produce on the remaining 165 acres about seven eighths as much as the 220 acres are now producing.

The problem, however, is not quite so simple, for the reason that the water pouring off the steeper area continues to erode the better lands below and to deposit over them inferior soil washed from the erosion-exposed clay on the upper slopes.

At least 35,000,000 acres of formerly cultivated land, much of it originally good land, has been essentially destroyed in this country by erosion. So gullied it is, so deeply washed, the average farmer cannot afford to undertake its reclamation. In the ordinary sense much of this land is permanently destroyed, washed off, or gullied down to bedrock or to clay so stiff, so raw and infertile that generations would be required to restore new land having anything like the productivity of the virgin soil.

Perhaps we can afford these losses. At any rate, we have not concerned ourselves about them. If, however, a foreign nation should invade the country and dynamite 35,000,000 acres of land, or any fraction of such an area, to a state of desolation, we probably would be highly incensed. That a process of nature, rain water running wild, has been the guilty party, this essential destruction of the equivalent of 218,000 farms of 160 acres each, for some strange reason strikes us as nothing to be concerned about. We have even lost sight of the fact that all this violent chiseling away of the land would not have taken place had we not upset the normal order of things by doing away with nature's stabilizers—the trees and grass and shrubs that were sown across the face of the earth to hold the soil in place. Nor have we stopped to think that after doing away with the plant cover, we have still further upset natural processes by plowing up and laying bare to the wrath of wind and rain and melting snow the rich topsoil, whose building has required thousands of years. With plows and overgrazing the natural firmness of the ground has been destroyed. The hidden conduits of the soil, the passageways made by earthworms, insects, and plant roots have been effectively destroyed or sealed and normal porosity has been interfered with, thus intercepting downward movement of rain water.

Thus, unable to penetrate the soil, an excess of rain water flows across cultivated slopes, picking up the surface particles and sweeping them into the valleys and on to the oceans. Proceeding with every rain heavy enough to cause water to run downhill, the humus-charged, rich surface layer is gradually planed off, exposing stiff clay or unconditioned, unproductive sand and rotten rock. In this way sheet erosion has caused the loss of all or the greater part of the topsoil from 125,000,000 acres of the land now in cultivation. And still the gouging effects have not stopped. It is at this stage of depletion that gullying usually sets in—that final stage of erosion that permanently destroys land.

SHEET WASHING

Bad as is the combined effect of gullying, it is the slower sheet washing that causes the most wide-spread impoverishment of land. The process goes on so slowly and evenly over entire fields that farmers usually are unconscious of what is taking place until infertile clay spots, and even bedrock, make their appearance, at which stage it is too late to save the soil. And here is where the tragedy comes in: Tens of thousands of hard-working farmers are now tilling clay subsoil, which bakes and cracks in dry weather, refuses to absorb the rains when they do come, and resists the efforts of animals and machines straining at the plow. The evil of erosion is not a threat of the future to those operating on these denuded areas. Here is a tragedy of the present—farmers without real farm land, working from sunrise to sunset to gain the barest subsistence, even when the prices of their products are above the level of "hard times." The houses of many of these farmers and the grounds about them bear the depressing stamp of neglect, poverty, and hopelessness. Men, women, and children have been beaten down to the lowly level of subsoil farming, such as we are coming to understand as decadent farming.

In some regions subsoil can be made to produce fairly good crops; in other places this can be accomplished only by adding fertilizers and lime and manure by growing soil-improving legumes and by plowing, harrowing, and replowing. But generally even with all these efforts the yields are not so good as they were without any special treatment before the land was dispossessed of its surface covering. It should be observed in this connection, too, that fertilizers, lime, soil-improving crops, and intensive tillage are not to be had for the asking.

THREE BILLION TONS SOIL LOSS

Our estimates indicate that 3,000,000,000 tons of soil material are washed out of our fields and pastures every year. More than 400,000,000 tons of suspended solid material and many more millions of tons of dissolved matter pass out of the mouth of the Mississippi River annually. This comes largely from the farm lands of the Mississippi Basin. The greater part consists of super-soil, enough of it to build 1,250 farms of 160 acres each, having a depth twice that of the average upland soil of America.

When the soil is gone, it cannot be hauled back. We can restore to the land the elements of fertility which have been sapped by continuous cropping and by the leaching of rains, if the solid-soil material still remains in the field; but soil removed by erosion cannot be restored to productivity, for the simple reason that not merely the plant food is taken but that and the humus and the mineral soil particles are all bodily removed, to be dumped where they are just as permanently lost insofar as pertaining to those places whence they came as if consumed with fire.

OUR HABIT OF WASTE

America's original wealth of natural resources was so vast, it is little wonder we early fell into the habit of thinking our herds of buffalo, our forests and rich agricultural lands were limitless and inexhaustible. We killed off the buffalo for their hides, we have about completed cutting down some of the greatest forests of hardwoods and softwoods on the face of the earth. Now we are doing our best to finish up the sloping farm lands of the Nation.

There was a time in this country, and not so long ago, when we felt that we were too richly endowed with natural resources to spend anything to put chains upon our reckless prodigality or to waste time with planning for the future. That the present was thought to be well enough served to turn our faces from the shadows cast by coming events. Trees were looked upon as weeds, hence our "log-rollings" or fire festivals having to do with the quickest possible disposal of the timber of new clearings. Land was limitless, we thought; accordingly, we cleared a field, used it until it was exhausted, and then cleared another field to put through the mill of erosion and destruction.

Mathematically, an end had to come to this. Now we are beginning to think in the opposite direction. Perhaps some of us have thought recently that we are getting too poor not to do something to check the waste. At any rate, we are not merely thinking nowadays, we actually are beginning to do something.

EXAMPLES OF EROSION

Our surveys indicate that of all the land now cultivated and formerly cultivated throughout the 50,000,000 acres of the piedmont region, the eastern foothill country extending along the Appalachians from New Jersey into east-central Alabama, 65 percent has been stripped of its topsoil. In one county alone, in the central part of this belt, 297,000 acres that formerly consisted of productive sandy loam and loam, as shown in remnants of virgin hardwoods, have been denuded of its original cover of 4 to 8 inches of mellow, humus-charged topsoil. All of this now consists of clay loam and clay. These man-made subsoil lands have been carefully classified and mapped. They constitute approximately half the total area of the county in which they occur. In addition to the removal of the topsoil and part of the subsoil much of it has been gullied beyond repair.

EXAMPLES OF PRODIGALITY

In one of the old South Carolina piedmont counties 90,000 acres of formerly good upland have been essentially ruined by gullying, and 46,000 acres of bottom land, once the richest soil in the State, have been so covered with sand and otherwise damaged by deposits washed down from the uplands that it now consists of practically useless swamp. In a Georgia piedmont county more than 100,000 acres of upland have been washed to a state of worthlessness, and the process is steadily cutting into every cultivated sloping field.

A recent survey of a representative eroded area of approximately 9,000 acres in the southern piedmont has revealed that 73 percent of the area surveyed had suffered severely from sheet washing. Gullying, representing the last or destroying stage of erosion, had set in over 52 percent of the area. The survey has clearly shown that slope very largely governs the intensity of soil washing, where the land is cultivated. There was no gullying whatever on slopes of less than 3 percent; but where the declivity exceeded 12 percent, 89 percent of the land was gullied and 57 percent had lost all the topsoil.

That this menacing condition of soil erosion is not described in any comprehensive textbook, or any other book, is ample cause for our school children, and grown-ups too, to believe that the millions of gullies and the millions of acres of erosion-exposed clay now distributed throughout the piedmont country, from New Jersey to Alabama, as well as in many other parts of the United States, were all there when white man established himself in America. Every indication is that there was not a single gully of the kind we are discussing in all the 50,000,000 acres of the piedmont plateau, nor so much as a single acre of "raw", erosion-scarred upland clay when this region was taken over from the Indians. And yet, we have not considered these facts important enough to insert them into our literature or textbooks, although we have liberally discussed in one form or another practically every other conceivable phase of land-use procedure. We are now beginning to see that we have left something undone, that we are some 75 or a hundred years late in beginning work on a problem that we shall never again be able to overlook. Always the problem of erosion will confront the farmers of America over at least 75 percent of the cultivated area—at least, until we have made sweeping readjustment in land use and carried through an enormous amount of practical erosion control. The process of erosion never stops of its own accord; some of it cannot be prevented at all, but much of it can be controlled or largely slowed down, and it is with this that we must concern ourselves without further delay.

EROSION IN THE COASTAL PLAIN

In the coastal plain of southeastern Georgia 70,000 acres of formerly good land, much of it the best soil in this great region, are now permanently destroyed. This erosion-denuded area is that of one small county. There are many other similar tracts in neighboring counties. Some of these gullies that have ripped to pieces former fields of the richest soil in all south Georgia are 200 feet deep. Last year I talked with a gentleman who went to school in a schoolhouse that stood in the center of what is now known as "Providence Cave", 8 miles west of Lumpkin, Ga. If this schoolhouse were there now, it would be suspended 200 feet in the air. It has toppled into the gully, and along with it has gone a tenant house, the barn from whose roof dripped the rain water that started the chasm, and a graveyard with 50 graves. Thus, the remains of human beings and human habitations, intermingled with rich farm soil, have passed down through the trough of the Chattahoochee River in the direction of the Gulf of Mexico as so much erosional waste.

Five counties in central Alabama include more than a half-million acres of formerly cultivated land, most of it originally of good quality, but now largely gullied and washed beyond further use except for trees. Great white scars splotch many parts of the black belt of central Texas, a cotton-producing area long known to the ends of the world for the productivity of its soil. This is no longer a black belt but a region of mixed black soil and white or yellow subsoil, the latter representing land from which the dark rich surface layer has been stripped by sheet erosion since the beginning of farming about 50 years ago. Two years ago a single rain washed off 23 tons of surface soil per acre from a black belt cotton field near Temple, and with this went much of the water that should have been absorbed by the ground for subsequent use by the crop. This was a measured loss, not a guess or an estimate.

Only a few decades ago land was being given by the Government to the first comers of those racing across the plains of Oklahoma, at the crack of musketry signaling the rush. A recent survey by the Agricultural College of that State has shown that of the 16,000,000 acres in cultivation, approximately 13,000,000 acres are suffering from erosion, about half of this already having reached the stage of gullying.

EROSION IN ILLINOIS

The most productive upland farm soils in the humid parts of the United States are those of the central prairie States. In studying the resources of this great central empire, I gained from the books and information that came my way the idea that the lands of this region were as permanently fixed to the landscape as the rock of Gibraltar. Under natural conditions I think this concept was not very far from correct, and even now the perfectly level areas undoubtedly are likely to endure without any vast fundamental changes, although they will, of course, be impoverished from place to place by severe cropping.

But this beautiful concept has been undermined somewhat by the facts that are gradually coming to light. These facts are disturbing, for the simple reason that many of us have felt that here is our permanent breadbasket, our sheet anchor of safety, our indispensable richlands. Now, I am not going to say that this great region is on the verge of destruction, but I am going to say that the information we have, our surveys of the land and our measurements of the rates of erosion, show that many parts of this inland empire have already been essentially destroyed with gullies and deep sheet washing, and that a very much larger area has been severely impoverished, with the process going forward now faster and faster. Many parts of Illinois, Missouri, Iowa, Wisconsin, Kansas, and other States are affected.

I can remember when the word "Illinois" was essentially an adjective to me. It meant a great area of tremendously durable productive land. I still think this applies to many parts of the State; but we have learned that it does not by any manner of means apply to all the State. There is, for example, an area in the southern part of Illinois where erosion has dug many gullies and ruined many slopes, and where it is very actively gouging at every cultivated field not situated on a flat. Surveys indicate that in the southern part of this State and in an adjacent State something like 10,000,000 acres have already reached the condition of gullying, a condition which we have come to realize means the beginning of the death stage of agricultural land.

The picture is even more darkly colored by the fact that in the neighborhood of 12,000,000 acres of moderately sloping Illinois land, much of it high-grade soil, are suffering seriously from sheet washing. In numerous fields little gullies have already begun to develop; over some of the steeper areas real gullies have developed here and there. But the principal evil is the sheet washing, the slow but never-ending process that gradually shaves off the productive layer of topsoil from unprotected fields. Gradually soils that were formerly dark-colored are becoming yellowish, owing to the cutting-off of the topsoil, down to yellow subsoil. When fields are freshly plowed, you will notice these yellow spots on many slopes in many parts of the State. They mean, with but few exceptions, that the natural productivity of the land is waning. When we consider that 12,000,000 acres are undergoing this sort of thing in this State alone, it seems to me it is time that we were getting very much concerned about it. And we are—so much concerned indeed, that as quickly as possible we are going to undertake to apply to a large demonstrational area in McLean County every practical measure that we know about and can induce the farmers to adopt, with the purpose of finding out whether or not we have learned enough to meet the challenge of the vicious evil of land depreciation by erosion. This project is located on the watershed of Sangamon River. I am not going to describe it in detail now. Mr. Fischer, our regional director, will probably have something to say about it before this convention has adjourned. I do want to say, however, that we sincerely hope that you will look upon this project as your very own. It will not help us in this fight, which we know is an exceedingly difficult one, for people to say, "Well, here's another program set up to show Illinois farmers how to farm." It is not such a program. It is a program to cooperate with the landowners in a back-breaking attempt to find out if we cannot meet this challenge of a man-accelerated natural process, which is impoverishing and ruining land that belongs as much to posterity as to ourselves.

It will not be quite sufficient, probably, for anyone to say, "Well, boys, you have my good wishes; go to it." No; what we want is real cooperation, suggestions from practical farmers, good advice from experienced men. We want you to come to see this work when it gets well under way; and if we are not doing the right thing or if you can think of a better thing, we want you to tell us. We do not care if you cuss us out, provided you do not stop at that. Cuss us out and then tell us wherein we are wrong and how we should proceed to do a better job at this or that place. If we can all get together working along this line, cooperatively and with that persistence which does not give up in the face of the scores of obstacles that surely will come at us from many different directions, I am convinced that we can do a good job, an impressive job; but let me earnestly appeal to you for your cooperation, your sympathy, your advice, and your support. All of us might as well recognize in the beginning that we are fighting the most powerful agency affecting the character of this earth, save only the light of the sun. We are not in the least blinded with respect to realization that we have undertaken a man-sized job, multiplied by 10 or some greater number.

NATIONAL PROGRAM OF SOIL CONSERVATION

It should be clear from what has been said that we have not made much progress in this country toward prevention of ruinous soil washing. Not only this, but until recently nothing had been done in the way of experimental effort to determine the most effective methods of prevention and control, not to mention the working-out of the basic principles of erosion processes or the measuring of the losses, as they vary on different kinds of soil undergoing different cultural uses. In practically every other field of agricultural endeavor an enormous amount of research has been carried out. We have experiment stations in every State, with numerous substations, and still more experiment stations in outlying fields. A very considerable part of this work has related to increasing yields and the maintenance of soil fertility through the use of fertilizers, soil-improving crops, crop rotations, better tillage, and so on. In other words, this work, indispensable as it has been, has had no specific direction toward the prevention of soil decline by erosion. This most impoverishing of all agencies or combination of agencies affecting the land has been neglected almost as if it represented something untouchable. It is true that in the Southeastern States terracing and contour cultivation were brought into use long ago, but no studies were made to determine the best width, grade, and height for these soil-saving embankments or the best grade for contour cultivation on different types of land having different rates of erosion. (The field terrace was greatly improved forty-odd years ago by Mr. Priestly Mangum near Wake Forest, N.C., and this instrument is now being effectively used on land of moderate slope in many parts of the country, principally in the South, in slowing down soil washing. Terracing alone, however, does not prevent erosion on the steeper, more erosive lands, for the simple reason that washing begins where rain strikes the ground, thus causing erosion between the terraces.)

EFFECT OF VEGETATION

During the past few years it has been shown by actual measurement that thick-growing vegetation, as trees, grass, lespedeza, and alfalfa, is the most effective implement known for slowing down run-off and erosion. Nevertheless, we have made far too little use of this means of control. But for the crop rotations practiced by many good farmers in various parts of the country there would have been even more eroded land. Unfortunately, enough farmers have gone on cultivating corn year after year, or cotton or tobacco or other clean-tilled crops, to bring about disastrous washing in nearly every part of the country, not even excepting the potato belt of Aroostook County, Maine, the famous Palouse Wheat Belt of the Pacific Northwest, or the bean districts of southern California.

Recognizing the actual need for better knowledge of erosion processes and better methods of control, a national program of soil and water conservation was inaugurated by the Department of Agriculture about 3 years ago, following a general survey of the erosion situation in the country carried out by the writer. Measurements made at these stations have completely altered the course of thought with respect to the permanency of sloping land, its impermanency, rather. No one had ever supposed, for example, that in the rolling parts of the Missouri-Iowa Corn Belt, 85 tons of soil per acre were being washed from land having a fall of 8 feet in a hundred in a single year, along with a run-off amounting to 30 percent of the rainfall. Nor had any one supposed that on the same type of land devoted to alfalfa the same amount of rainfall removed only two fifths of a ton of soil per acre, accompanied by a run-off of only 2 percent of the rainfall.

Probably no one had ever dreamed that one rain could wash from southwestern Wisconsin land of about average slope as much as 35 tons of soil an acre. This enormous wastage did, nevertheless, take place near La Crosse, as the result of the off-flowage from a summer rain, in 1933, amounting to 40 percent of this single precipitation.

STRIP-CROPPING TO SAVE SOIL

A considerable number of farmers in the hill country of Wisconsin, sensing the prodigious soil-saving capacity of grass and other thick crops, for a long time have been strip-cropping their sloping fields to protect them from washing. They have left the steeper upper slopes in woods; below the woodlands they have planted grass or alfalfa at intervals along the contours. Between these parallel strips crossing the fields along the same level they have sandwiched in the clean-tilled, erosive crops, as corn, potatoes, and tobacco. The rainwater flowing down the slopes is caught by the thick-growing vegetation and made to sink into the ground, thus protecting the plowed strips below.

In tests this practice has proven effective in the Corn Belt of Iowa, the Cotton Belt of Texas, North Carolina, and Oklahoma, and in the Wheat Belt of Washington, Oregon, and Idaho. During a year and a half only 1 pound of soil per acre was lost from a large field in southwestern Iowa, where corn was grown in alternate strips between parallel strips of alfalfa. The same kind of land used for corn according to prevailing regional practice lost during the same period 9 tons of soil per acre, or 18,000 times as much. The land used in these comparisons represented one of the best types of upland corn soil in the country, if not the world.

On a 7,500-acre farm near Itasca, Tex., 6,000 acres have been protected from erosion by strip-cropping. On some of the steeper slopes where the stands of thick-growing crops, as Sudan grass and sorghum, have not effectively controlled the washing, terraces have been introduced as an effective supplementary measure.

Vegetation in the form of forest or as thick grasslike growth is nature's permanent cure for erosion. In one form or another, plants of this kind can be used on all kinds of land, on all degrees of slope, and under all varieties of climate where there is enough warmth and rain to make them grow. Of course, all land cannot be used for forests or the thick-growing crops. We must devote large acreages to the erosion-provoking, clean-tilled crops, such as corn, cotton, and tobacco, but it has been definitely shown that these two types of crops can be grown in conjunction with one another in such manner as enormously to reduce soil and water losses. It now remains to educate the farmers of the Nation as to the advantages of the soil-protective types of agriculture—the advantages of strip-cropping, of cover crops, permanent grass, or forest on the steeper slopes, and of those cropping schemes which supply vitally needed humus to the soil. This can be done when the Nation makes up its mind to go after better farming methods, those methods which call for use of the land more nearly in accordance with its adaptability and fitness, and for efficient protection of all cultivated slopes. It cannot be accomplished before such a country-wide revolution takes place.

DEMONSTRATION IN EROSION CONTROL

Recognizing erosion as our most serious land problem, a new organization was recently established in the Department of the Interior for the purpose of carrying out impressive erosion and flood-control projects on representative watershed areas in the various regions where erosion is known to be a serious problem. The plan of the Soil Erosion Service calls for as nearly complete control of the erosion as may be possible on representative watersheds. These working areas will range in size from about 100,000 to 200,000 acres. A larger project will be that on the Navajo Indian Reservation in Arizona and New Mexico. Here experimental and practical work will be undertaken to reestablish better range conditions in order to control the severe erosion that has followed overgrazing. The Navajo plan also calls for the most effective use by the Indians of all areas having any promise for crop production.

All practical methods are to be employed in conformity with the adaptability and needs of the various classes of land occurring within the working areas. It is felt that if these projects can be put through in an impressive manner, it subsequently will be comparatively easy to spread out from such focal demonstrations over the various regions to complete the prodigious task of saving our remaining area of good land. These initial undertakings will have a far-reaching educational effect. Farmers, merchants, bankers, and men and women of all business occupations will be urged to come frequently from every section to inspect the work that is to be carried on in their interests as well as in the interest of the Nation. The program is to emphasize the conservation of good farm land, not the reclamation of hopelessly gullied land. It calls for control of erosion, reduction of the flood hazard, protection of rich bottom lands from worthless sand and gravel washed out of the hills, prevention of silting of stream channels and reservoirs, and readjustment of land-use practices.

Here is the first attempt in the history of the country to put through large-scale comprehensive erosion- and flood-control projects, such as will apply to complete watersheds from the very crest of the ridges, down across the slopes where floods originate, and on to the mouths of the streams. These will not be engineering projects or forestry projects or cropping projects, but a combination of all of these, operated conjointly with such reorganization of farm procedure as the character of the land indicates as being necessary.

The major regional demonstrational projects thus far selected are as follows: Upper Mississippi Valley, near La Crosse, Wis.;

north-central Missouri and south-central Iowa, near Bethany, Mo.; central Illinois and a small area in the southern part of that State; central Texas; South Carolina piedmont country, near Spartanburg; Pacific Northwest in the Palouse section, near Pullman, Wash., extending into Idaho; Oklahoma Red Plains, near Stillwater; north-central Kansas, near Mankato; the Navajo Indian Reservation in Arizona, New Mexico, and Utah; and east Mississippi, near Meridian.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the Senate amendment to the War Department appropriation bill.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman explain all the Senate amendments to that appropriation bill?

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. I will explain the important ones.

Mr. SNELL. I wish the gentleman would do so; I think it is a good idea.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I have reason to believe that Members shortly will be deluged with letters and telegrams urging support of those amendments of the Senate to the War Department appropriation bill with respect to the civilian components of our military forces. I feel, therefore, they would appreciate having the facts congregated and made conveniently accessible.

The amounts included in the War Department appropriation bill, H.R. 8471, as reported to and passed by the House and as passed by the Senate for the civilian components of the Regular Army, contrasted with the amounts available for expenditure during the current fiscal year, are as follows:

	Available for expenditure, present fiscal year	House	Senate
National Guard (armory drills only).....	$8,261,715	$10,302,949	$11,756,221
Organized Reserves or Reserve Officers' Training Corps.....	3,184,068	3,986,859	6,500,000
Reserve Officers' Training Corps (schools and colleges).....	2,629,900	3,108,701	4,467,461
Citizens' Military Training Camps.....	1,000,000	987,213	2,687,213

NATIONAL GUARD

With the exception of the first item—armory drills for the National Guard—the House figures are in exact agreement with the President's Budget. The Budget included provision for 36 armory drills for the National Guard, the number with pay to which the Guard has been limited the present fiscal year by budgetary limitation. The House made provision for 6 additional drills, or 42 with pay, all told, upon the assurance, and only upon the assurance, that 42 drills with pay would be acceptable to the National Guard Bureau and the National Guard Association. I and other members of the War Department subcommittee have every reason to believe that there has not been, and will not be, a change of front by those directive forces of the National Guard. The committee and the House have been able to depend upon them heretofore, and there is no basis for believing that our faith is not well grounded. Personally, I resent any imputation to the contrary. I quote the following by permission of the writer from a letter dated March 15, 1934, from Gen. E. A. Walsh, the adjutant general of the State of Minnesota, as follows:

Will you please * * * convey my thanks to Mr. COLLINS and the members of the committee for the splendid manner in which they treated the National Guard for the coming fiscal year. I am perfectly satisfied with their action in every respect, including the 42 drills. I feel that we shall be in most excellent shape for the coming year.

General Walsh was the chief spokesman for the National Guard Association at the hearings of the committee.

ORGANIZED PROPAGANDA

I am reliably informed that a move is afoot, sponsored by persons affiliated with or interested in the Organized Reserves, to have the National Guard join forces in organized propaganda to support the Senate increases for the National Guard and the Organized Reserves.

ORGANIZED RESERVES

These are the facts as to the Organized Reserves: According to the official statement on page 399 of the House hearings on the War Department appropriation bill, the Reserve force is as follows:

	Reserve Officers' Training Corps graduates	Citizens' Military Training Camps graduates	Flying cadets	Former officers and enlisted men
Combat.....	33,739	2,521	706	21,407
Noncombat.....	6,506	37		21,422
Total.....	40,245	2,558	706	42,829

Of the foregoing, manifestly we should be chiefly concerned about the training of the combat group apart from those who have served with the regular forces either as officers or enlisted men. Excluding the latter, the total is 36,966. Normally it has been the endeavor to give training biennially to Reserve officers. The bill as passed by the House will more than permit this to be done as to the Reserve officers referred to, taking into consideration those who will be receiving training with the Civilian Conservation Corps. I shall include as a part of my remarks that part of the report on the War Department appropriation bill with respect to the Organized Reserves, namely:

There is no subject dealt with by this committee which receives more earnest consideration than the Officers' Reserve Corps, because of its great potential value, if properly organized and administered, and because of the sincere and genuine interest therein so generally manifested by real, unselfish exponents of national defense. If the crystallized views of persons thus actuated might find expression in law and practice, this component undoubtedly would freely get a full measure of congressional support.

On June 30, 1933, the total strength of the Officers' Reserve Corps was 119,485. Of this number 33,147 simply are deadwood. They have not manifested a proper degree of interest and have been classed as unassignable. Of the 86,338 classed as assignable, 58,373 are in the arms or combat branches and 27,965 are distributed among the services or noncombat branches. The picture is presented on page 399 of the hearings, part I, which shows also the sources of prior military service or training of all Reserve officers.

Another table appears on page 404 of the hearings, showing the ages of the Reserve officers classed as assignable. Unless we expect to have an army with a lot of junior officers (in rank only) old enough to be the fathers and grandfathers of some of us, how utterly silly it is to be spending the taxpayers' money on a war reserve of officer personnel of that sort, or to harken to the urge of, no doubt, sincere but uninformed persons that training funds are inadequate for active-duty training when they have reference to and specifically point to the total number. In the age list to which attention has been called, in the grades from second lieutenant to lieutenant colonel, both inclusive, there are more than 35,000 officers beyond the maximum appropriate ages for their grades.

The committee was gratified to learn that this is a question now under study by the General Staff. It has been proposed by Reserve officers themselves that an age in grade maximum be established and some plan devised to eliminate those who fail to qualify for advancement on or before such age limit has been reached. Such a plan should have the united support of every person whose primary interest in this organization is genuine military preparedness.

The appropriation for this activity for the current fiscal year is $6,354,348. As a result very largely of administrative action but $3,491,356 of such sum may be obligated. The Budget for 1935 looks to a larger expenditure by $495,503, or a total of $3,986,859. The accompanying bill is in the Budget figure. The training this year and next, estimated in both instances, will be as follows:

14-day trainees.....	10,000	14,000
More than 15 days' training:
Special service schools.....	44	200
Command and General Staff School.....	11
Army War College.....	0
War Department General Staff.....	6	5
Extended active Air Corps duty.....	233	200
Total.....	10,295	14,405

For the current year, in addition to the number to be trained as above indicated, many Reserve officers have been and still are on extended active duty with the Civilian Conservation Corps. On February 14 last, 5,139 Reserve officers were on or had been on such duty. As the policy is to substitute Regular officers almost entirely with Reserve officers in the C.C.C. camps, before the year is up a substantial increase will have occurred in the number of 5,139 and as the camps have been extended until April 1, 1935, this demand for Reserve officers will continue. The Adjutant General stated to the committee that this experience in the C.C.C. camps has materially increased the value of Reserve officers to the Government, since it gives them valuable training in mobilization processes and leadership.

Looking at the table previously referred to on page 399 of the hearings, we find a total of 36,966 assignable Reserve officers of the combat branches who are products of the R.O.T.C. and the C.M.T.C. Of course, they constitute the very heart of the assignable group and no doubt are mostly of appropriate ages for the grades they occupy. Considering the number of trainees contemplated by the Budget and bill, plus the Reserve officers who will be on duty with the C.C.C. camps, we get a proportion of such portion of the assignable group that seems reasonable and should have popular support. We are working more or less in the dark until the over-age officers in the assignable group are weeded out and the present organization has simmered down to a reserve force in fact and not in name.

For reserve aviation, apart from the 200 Reserve officer pilots who will be on extended active duty with the Air Corps during the ensuing fiscal year, the training provided for, contrasted with that which it is estimated will be given during the present fiscal year, is shown in the comparative table on page 421 of the hearings, part I. The committee is not satisfied with the allocation. It believes in giving an adequate amount of training with combat planes to all Reserve officer pilots who are graduates of the Air Corps training center. This is considerably more important than training all classes, such as mentioned on pages 410 and 411 of the hearings, part I, and could be given within the amount appropriated if the training of other classes of flyers were suspended or abandoned, as it should be, with a limited budget.

R.O.T.C.

The Senate action with respect to the R.O.T.C. looks to the establishment of additional units in a number of schools, largely of junior grades and high schools. The Senate hearings do not definitely list the institutions.

C.M.T.C.

As to the C.M.T.C., I repeat the statement in the report to the House on the War Department appropriation bill, viz:

The committee has adopted the Budget estimate of $987,213 for C.M.T.C. training. The amount available the current year, owing mostly to budgetary restrictions, is $1,000,000. The lesser amount, a net figure, may be said to be because ammunition requirements will be financed out of P.W.A. funds. During the current and ensuing fiscal years it is estimated that 14,000 boys will be given training.

The amount added by the Senate is designed to take care of 37,500 boys.

COTTON

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Speaker, in connection with the bill we have just been considering, I ask unanimous consent to insert a statement in the RECORD concerning cotton production and consumption in the United States in comparison with total exports of domestic merchandise and world production.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks, I am again calling attention to the importance of considering the world production of cotton, the amount of cotton produced in foreign countries, and the small effect we can expect the bill before us to have in raising the price of cotton on the entire world production. Cotton being a product which finds its market throughout the world, and being directly responsive to the gold value of the money of any country, finds its price fixed absolutely by the value of the gold content of the dollar or the unit of the currency measured in gold by weight. In order that we may better understand this matter more fully, I am herewith submitting full information concerning cotton as it fits into the world picture of trade and commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Senate, which was read, as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, March 19, 1934.

Hon. JOHN N. GARNER,
President of the Senate.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: On March 5, 1934, the Committee on Enrolled Bills of the Senate presented to the President of the United States the enrolled bill (S. 1724) authorizing the reimbursement of Edward B. Wheeler and the State Investment Co. for the loss of certain lands in the Mora Grant, N. Mex., which had passed both Houses of Congress and been signed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President pro tempore of the Senate.

The Senate at 5:36 p.m. Thursday, March 15, 1934, took a recess until 12 o'clock noon on Monday, March 19, 1934.

On Friday, March 16, 1934, the President of the United States sent by messenger a message addressed to the Senate, dated March 15, 1934, giving his reasons for not approving this bill. The Senate not being in session on the last day which the President had for the return of this bill under the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, in order to protect the interests of the Senate so that it might have the opportunity to reconsider the bill, I accepted the message, and I now present to you the President's veto message, with the accompanying papers, for disposition by the Senate.

Sincerely yours,

EDWIN A. HALSEY,
Secretary of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read and ordered to be printed, with the accompanying papers, as follows:

To the Senate:

I return herewith, without my approval, Senate bill 1724, entitled "An act authorizing the reimbursement of Edward B. Wheeler and the State Investment Co. for the loss of certain lands in the Mora Grant, N.Mex."

The parties to whom payments are authorized by this bill entered into a stipulation with the United States on March 6, 1917, in consideration of a suit to be brought by the United States to quiet title to lands within the tract known as the "Mora Grant", whereby they obligated themselves not to molest any bona fide settler within the disputed strip, and further agreed to make quitclaim deeds to such settlers in the event that the lands claimed by them should, as a result of said suit, be found to be within the limits of the grant. Such quitclaim deeds have already been furnished by these claimants covering the greater portion of this acreage.

I am attaching hereto a memorandum from the Secretary of the Interior setting forth more fully the reasons for this action.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 15, 1934.

Mr. HATCH. I ask unanimous consent that the message of the President of the United States be referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Virginia, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

House joint resolution to memorialize the Congress of the United States for a reduction of the internal-revenue tax on tobacco

Virginia collected $41,131,000 taxes for State purposes during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933. The Federal internal-revenue tax on tobacco and tobacco products took from Virginia the sum of $92,380,436.89 during the same period, a sum more than twice as great as the aggregate of all State taxes, including the gas tax.

While Virginia has a population of less than two and a half millions of inhabitants, and is relatively poor as compared with many of her sister States in our great family of 48, her contribution of tax money to the Treasury of the United States is exceeded by only 5 other States, viz, New York, North Carolina, Pennsylvania, Illinois, and California.

Except for a few nuisance taxes imposed in times of emergency, and except also the liquor tax imposed years ago and again now since the repeal of the eighteenth amendment, no other product of any State has been subject to a Federal tax.

The State of Virginia, like other States, is in dire straits to find money for her necessary purposes, and her people are overburdened with taxes.

It is not fair that one product, the product of the fields and factories of a few States only, should be singled out to the exemption of all other products of other States, and taxed for the use of the Federal Government, and taxed so heavily by that Government as practically to exclude the levying of a substantial tax on that subject by the State whose product it is.

While the tobacco tax is a fair and convenient instance of a sales tax, surely the States adapted to its production and which foster its manufactures should have the right to tax it, in part at least, for their own purposes. Whence, indeed, will those States derive the money required for their needs if not from the wealth produced within their borders?

To repeat, Virginia pays into the United States Treasury through the tobacco tax alone more than twice as much as she raises for herself through all forms of taxation from all sources and for all purposes.

Virginia is in sore need of more money than she is now collecting and her people need relief from the burden of taxation they are now bearing. If the United States Government would release its tobacco tax, or a reasonable portion of it, it would be a measure of justice to the tobacco States now long overdue, and those States would be largely relieved of the pecuniary embarrassments that now beset them by the simple expedient of being allowed to tax the products and wealth of their own people within their own borders—a right which has not heretofore been denied or so abridged in other States.

Impressed with the correctness of the foregoing assertions and with the justice and reasonableness of the relief suggested, it is

Resolved by the House of Delegates of the General Assembly of Virginia (the senate concurring):

1. That the representations and implications of the foregoing preamble be commended to the thoughtful and serious consideration of the Congress of the United States to the end that relief may be obtained by Virginia and the other tobacco States from the hardship and injustice they suffer from the heavy Federal tax on tobacco and tobacco products, amounting practically to an inhibition on the States against taxing for their own use their chief product and source of wealth, or one of their chief sources of wealth.

2. That the Senators and Representatives of Virginia in the Congress of the United States be, and they hereby are, requested and respectfully urged to do all in their power to present this matter to the favorable consideration of Congress, and to seek by all proper means to obtain the relief desired to the extent of at least 50 percent of the present Federal tobacco and tobacco-products tax.

3. That copies of this resolution be forwarded by the clerk of the house of delegates to the Vice President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from Virginia, and to Chairman DOUGHTON, of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, and to Congressmen SHALLENBARGER, MCCORMICK, BACHARACH, and WOODRUFF, constituting a subcommittee of the Ways and Means Committee having to do with the subject matter of this resolution or matters related to it.

Agreed to by the house of delegates, February 21, 1934.

JNO. W. WILLIAMS,

Clerk of the House of Delegates.

Agreed to by the senate, March 7, 1934.

O. V. HANGER,

Clerk of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a resolution of Local Union No. 2516, United Mine Workers of America, of Rock Springs, Wyo., favoring the passage of the so-called "Wagner-Lewis unemployment-insurance bill", which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also laid before the Senate a paper in the nature of a petition from Kenneth R. MacFarland, of Roxbury, Mass., praying for the passage of legislation providing for the immediate payment of the so-called "soldiers' bonus", which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate a letter in the nature of a petition from Harold P. Wilder, of Aiken, S.C., praying for the passage of legislation providing for the immediate payment of the so-called "soldiers' bonus", which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate a petition of sundry citizens of Corona and vicinity, in the State of California, praying that the United States be kept free from foreign entanglements, and protesting against ratification of the World Court protocols, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the council of the city of Cleveland, Ohio, favoring the passage of the bill (S. 752) to amend section 24 of the Judicial Code, as amended, with respect to the jurisdiction of the district courts of the United States over suits relating to orders of State administrative boards, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the municipal government of Bolinao, Province of Pangawinan, P.I., favoring the passage of the so-called "King Philippine independence bill", which were referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the municipal government of Bolinao, Province of Pangawinan, P.I., protesting against the extension of time for the expiration of the so-called "Hare-Hawes-Cutting Law" relative to the Philippine independence, which were referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

MANUFACTURE AND SALE OF ARMS AND MUNITIONS

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the resolution (S.Res. 206) appointing a special committee to make certain investigations concerning the manufacture and sale of arms and other war munitions, reported it with amendments and moved that it be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, which motion was agreed to.

PRIVILEGED CHARACTER OF PETITIONS PRESENTED TO THE SENATE (S.REPT. NO. 499)

Mr. KING, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred on April 14, 1933 (73d Cong., 1st sess.), various petitions and other papers signed by sundry citizens of the State of Louisiana, relating to alleged acts and conduct of Hon. HUEY P. LONG, a Senator from the State of Louisiana, submitted a report pertaining to the limited privileged character of such petitions and papers.

ENACTMENT OF A LAW (S.DOC. NO. 155)

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, by direction of the Committee on Printing, I submit a motion in the form of an order relating to the printing of a manuscript entitled "Enactment of a Law", and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arizona?

There being no objection, the motion as reduced to writing in the form of an order was agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That the manuscript entitled "Enactment of a Law", being a history of the legislative proceedings of Congress in connection with the passage of a Senate bill from its introduction through the various parliamentary stages until its enactment into law, be printed as a Senate document.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED

CREDIT BANKS FOR INDUSTRY

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, a letter has come from the President transmitting a bill to the Committee on Banking and Currency providing for the creation of credit banks for industry. With the consent of the Senate, I introduce the bill at this time. It will, I believe, supply a demand for assistance to industry and probably will call for a capital of some $700,000,000, which the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board assures me he will be able to provide. It will cause a continuance in employment of 345,000 people and provide for 378,000 additional employees.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 3101) to provide for the creation of credit banks for industry, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred as indicated below:

AMENDMENTS TO THE TAX BILL

Mr. CONNALLY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H.R. 7835) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE submitted amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H.R. 7835) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes, which were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

DISTRIBUTION OF COTTON AND COTTON PRODUCTS TO THE NEEDY—AMENDMENT

Mr. FRAZIER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2500) to aid in relieving the existing national emergency through the free distribution to the needy of cotton and cotton products, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

R. S. HOWARD CO.

Mr. KING. On February 6, 1934, the bill (S. 2002) for the relief of R. S. Howard Co., Inc., was passed. There was an understanding between the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] and myself that the bill was not to be transmitted to the House until certain information was furnished me. This information has since been given to me, and I therefore have no objection to the bill being transmitted to the House at this time.

ST. PATRICK'S DAY ADDRESS BY SENATOR LONERGAN

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an address delivered by my colleague, the junior Senator from Connecticut, Mr. LONERGAN, last Saturday evening on the occasion of the one hundred and sixty-third anniversary banquet of the Friendly Sons of St. Patrick at the Bellevue-Stratford Hotel, Philadelphia.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. President, and members of the Friendly Sons of St. Patrick, I am sincerely grateful for this opportunity to be with you on your one hundred and sixty-third anniversary, and to share with you the friendly comradeship and patriotism which is always demonstrated at these gatherings, and on all occasions when the Friendly Sons come in contact.

Throughout the world today Irishmen have been and are celebrating the anniversary day of Ireland's patron saint. Everywhere we see the Irish smile, the Irish Shamrock, and the Irish greeting. America, as always, has turned out to honor the apostle of Ireland in its own enthusiastic way. Nowhere, I am sure, could there be more enthusiasm than we have here tonight in Philadelphia, where, I am informed, the first big celebration of St. Patrick's Day took place 163 years ago.

Already I feel that my visit here has furnished me with unusual returns in good-fellowship and inspirations. I have just observed your impressive and excellent tribute to ex-Judge Jenkins, and the conferring upon him of the honorable position of president emeritus—the first to hold office in 163 years. His devoted service to the Friendly Sons at the completion of his fiftieth year of membership in the organization impresses me deeply, as I am sure it does all of you. This tribute to him is richly deserved, though it is but a small token of the esteem which I know the Friendly Sons of St. Patrick of Philadelphia hold for him.

And when I think of the record of Judge Jenkins I think also of the remarkable record of service which the organization as a whole has rendered, primarily for the relief of emigrants from Ireland, but ultimately in the interests of patriotism, and the spirit of true Americanism. Back on March 17, 1771, when the Friendly Sons of St. Patrick were organized, I am sure that its leaders could not possibly have dreamed of the chain of events to follow in its history, which have meant so much to all Americans. From the moment of its inception to the present time, the society has not only fulfilled the object for which it was organized, but its members have ever shown the spirit of patriotism that has illumined the pages of the Republic's history.

It is significant to recall again the fact that George Washington himself was a charter member of the organization, and with him in the Revolution were at least 15 other members of the Friendly Sons who distinguished themselves as officers. The records of the Army and the infant Navy of the Revolution show numerous names which are found among the original membership of the organization.

Altogether, during the Revolution, there were enrolled the names of 47 colonels who were Irish born, 37 Irish naval captains (a rank on water equal to that of a colonel on land), and 17 Irish-born generals. This was but a small portion of the Irishmen who fought in the Continental Army for American freedom.

It is important to recall also that at least four of the signers of the Declaration of Independence were born in Ireland—Edward Rutledge, George Taylor, Matthew Thornton, and Col. James Smith. And in addition, there were at least four more who were sons of Irishmen—Charles Carroll, Thomas Lynch, Thomas McKean, and George Read. To these names must also be added that of Charles Thomson, scholarly confidential secretary of the Continental Congress, and an intimate friend of Benjamin Franklin.

Of the 36 delegates by whom the Constitution of the United States was, in 1787, promulgated, 6 at least were Irish—George Read, Thomas McKean, and Edward Rutledge, already mentioned as signers of the Declaration, and Pierce Butler, of South Carolina, Daniel Carroll, of Maryland, and Thomas Fitzsimmons, of Pennsylvania.

We find the names of the Friendly Sons, and of the Irish people generally, so frequently reported in the significant events of our national history, that it is impossible to trace our progress as a nation without recognizing them as among the leading contributors. Indeed, there are many events in the history of our national life, and particularly of our American Congress, which indicate that without the margin of support represented by Irish people of America many great and fundamental issues would not have carried.

The first Governor of Pennsylvania, after the adoption of the Federal Constitution, was George Bryan, a native of Dublin, who was recognized mainly for procuring the passage of a law for the gradual abolition of slavery in his adopted State. Other Irish patriots of the State who distinguished themselves were so numerous that it would consume time to even mention them. In Philadelphia alone, where from the very beginning of our Nation the Irish people had enjoyed some degree of civil and religious liberty and where the ideals of the Irish people have been so carefully stimulated and preserved by such organizations as the Friendly Sons, the names of distinguished individuals and families would make a small directory. Among them are the Meades, Fitzsimmons, Gareys, Flabavens, the Barrys, and hundreds of others.

It will reconsecrate us to the ideals of patriotism and Americanism, which are traditional with the Irish people of America, if we recall for a brief moment also a few of the names of those of the Irish who served in our wars after the Revolution, and in our public and political life. The Nation has paid tribute to Commodore John Barry, known as "the Father of the Navy of the United States" and to those who served with him in that early period. I am always impressed when I come to Philadelphia and view again the monument erected to his honor by the Friendly Sons of St. Patrick.

Later in the War of 1812 the names of Andrew Jackson and many of his followers in the Army, as well as those who served in the Navy, stand out prominently. In the Civil War, the Spanish-American War, our campaigns into Mexico, and in other activities in which our Armies and Navies have engaged in the cause of liberty and national progress, we find the names of Friendly Sons of Ireland among the leaders as well as among the rank and file. The first American soldier to land in France during the World War was Col. Daniel McCarthy, who led the advance guard of General Pershing's staff. Following him were thousands of others of Irish lineage who fought and died, as had their ancestors of America, for the cause of liberty.

Associated with the Irish contributions to education and science of America have been the names of Allison, Thompson, Remsay, Fulton, Colles, Adrian, and Matthew Carey. Politically, there have been many leaders and contributors to the Nation's history. Charles Carroll and Thomas Fitzsimmons were among the first Senators of the First Congress, and John Sullivan and George Read were among the Representatives of that Congress. After them have followed scores of others prominent in our national life.

America has been fortunate in drawing to her shores men and women of the most enterprising and liberty-loving races of the world, and in none has she been more fortunate than in the Irish. From the brief recollections I have presented of our historical progress this will be self-evident. But the outstanding characteristic of the Irish people of America, during all the periods of our history from the time of the Thirteen Original States, has been the domination among them of the true American spirit. It is important that we recognize this natural characteristic, because, fundamentally, it is a spirit which has endured and which has carried this Nation through trials and triumphs which at first appeared insurmountable. It is the true American spirit which is everlasting. And this spirit that endures is so important and necessary in our life of today in fighting the forces of depression.

Each generation has its own problems to face, and upon the correctness of their solution depends the stability and welfare of the State. The trials of adversity fell upon the fathers; the trials of prosperity are ours. This is true though it seems an absurdity to declare that our problems of today are the problems of prosperity. It was the duty of the fathers to lay the foundations of liberty under popular government; it is ours to preserve it under the ever-changing conditions that confront the march of civilization. Since the day when Washington, by the unanimous choice of the representatives of the Nation, was elected as the first Chief Executive of the Republic, we have grown in population from fewer than 4,000,000 to more than 120,000,000 on this continent, exclusive of our island possessions, and in territory from 13 sparsely settled States along the Atlantic seaboard to a realm reaching from ocean to ocean and from the Great Lakes to the Gulf. We have multiplied the power of man a hundredfold by steam, electricity, and water, and multiplied the productivity of the earth and lengthened the years of life by searching out the causes of disease and providing against them.

From the foundation of religious freedom to the foundation of political freedom was but a brief period in our national life, yet they were years of wonderful growth and development for the ideals of freedom in a virgin soil. The little sapling of liberty that was rooted in the earth had grown to a majestic oak whose branches spread over the Thirteen States, typifying in its strength and grandeur that religious and civil liberty are one and inseparable. The War of Independence was inspired by the distinct hope and purpose to enlarge and secure individual freedom, and that hope was, by wise men with prophetic statesmanship, developed into a reality in the charter of our confederated unity, the Constitution of the United States, whose preamble recites that it is adopted in order "to secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and to our posterity."

America stayed out of the World War until she saw it was to be a battle to the finish between democracy and military despotism. This was the leading representative of free government in the world, so we realized that if the other popular governments were crushed our turn would come next, and we might have to face most of Europe in competition. We joined with other countries to crush despotism, and succeeded, but out of the war came new problems which have since tested our spirit as American people. Great economic questions arose abroad, and then spread to America, where, with the prevalence of selfish craving for power and wealth, our people precipitated a chaos which for a time threatened to become the counterpart of our greatest military wars—the war of depression, and now the war of recovery.

The American spirit, which somehow had endured through all previous trials, was put to the test. The spirit of liberty, of tolerance, of ingenuity, of thrift, and of the love of humanity, which had so successfully overcome all obstacles in the past and which had been the beacon light to the world, was itself becoming the center of doubt and controversy. "Would the spirit of America endure?" This was the question round the world when step by step new economic problems and new demands by individual and selfish interests gradually undermined the confidence of the American people in their institutions and their leaders.

What has happened since the collapse of finance is fresh in the minds of most of us. How can we ever forget it? But, above all, how can we ever forget how the spirit of the American people rallied and became again the beacon light of America and the world? Like the small but powerful voice of our inner conscience which whispers to us in confidence when as individuals our everything seems lost, the spirit of recovery, which was the spirit of America, was soon transmitted throughout the land. It so welded our people in unison that every movement of our Government, of industry, and of finance is guided by that small but all-powerful something of the American people which says, "We are watching you . . . we must come through . . . we must come through." No leader in America today, whether he is in politics or in industry, can fail to hear that repeated command of the people . . . and no one dares to violate it.

We are at peace with the world. Though our troubles are akin to those in other nations, we do not face the problems of war and of hatred and of intolerance and selfishness which other nations confront in addition to their new economic woes. We have witnessed in Europe a fall of royalty. It was tested by the centuries but did not endure. In America we are observing the disappearance of wealth from the hands of the few. The system by which it was created, which enabled too much of the Nation's goods to rest in the control of certain groups, could not endure. Everywhere, in the midst of plenty, there were thousands of people without food . . . people willing and anxious to work who did not have the opportunity and who saw just beyond their reach vast supplies of food which could not be bought even at prices which did not offer the farmer and producer his actual costs.

Despite all of the other economic forces which had their part in the causes of depression, however, the result would not have been so serious had it not been for the disregard for the unemployed. Somehow everyone seemed to forget that the law of American life must be the law of work; not the law of idleness, not the law of speculation, not the law of self-indulgence or pleasure, but the law of work and production.

When employment was denied it ran contra to every principle of Americanism, and it was only because of the tolerance and patience of the American people that they went so far as they did without open revolt. Again we found the true American spirit to be that of confidence and hope, and of patience.

We have passed through the earlier trial periods of both depression and recovery. The problem that now confronts us is how we can, with determination and intelligence, solve new problems which we find in the way at every turn. In charting our course we have to aid us the energy and foresight of an able and good President, supported by his indomitable courage, and the flaming spirit of unity and hope of the American people. Throughout his works we find the golden thread of humanitarianism. With him we face the rising sun, and with the ingenuity of our people and their leaders we will and must succeed.

We all must admit that we were living in a fool's paradise. We had built a house of cards on a foundation of quicksand. Nothing has been more helpful to the Nation than to recognize these truths, even though the realization is bitter and painful. We as a nation have been the patient whose ills have gradually been diagnosed, and we now feebly try to walk again as the remedy is being administered. Like any patient, we cannot return to health in a day. Time is necessary, together with great care in the application of the remedy, so there will be no relapse.

The country of a century ago was our fathers' small estate. That of today is our noble heritage. Fidelity to the spirit and principles of our fathers will enable us to deliver it enlarged, beautified, ennobled, to our children of the new century. Unwavering faith in the absolute supremacy of the moral law, the clear perception that well-considered, thoroughly proved, and jealously guarded institutions are the chief security of liberty, and the unswerving loyalty to ideals, made the men of the Revolution and secured American independence. The same faith and the same loyalty will preserve their independence and secure progressive liberty forever.

Patriotic Americans need have no fear for the fate of our country. Out of the clouds of unrest that now envelop the world she will come stronger than ever. All civilization looks to us for guidance and they will not look in vain. From generation to generation people in other lands have been indoctrinated with the principles of the American family, and the wonder and beauty of it all has been that the infection has been so generously easy. For the principles of liberty are united with the principles of hope.

Every individual, as well as every nation, wishes to realize the best thing that is in him, the best thing that can be conceived out of the materials of which his spirit is constructed. We must not destroy the initiative and the incentive which drive men and nations alike toward a higher level. It has often been said that merit is the measure of the man. Upon this fundamental concept we must build out new structure. The conscience of the individual in his love for freedom and self-improvement has inherently become the spirit of the American people, and that spirit has, in turn, become the measure of progressive civilization throughout the world. The lamp of individual hope and aspiration in America has never flickered, and we must keep it burning brightly.

While we are building for the Nation and for the world, we must build for humanity. We must see to it that people who are in need of the ordinary necessities of life do not want, until they are given an opportunity to resume gainful employment. In the same spirit with which the Sons of St. Patrick dedicate themselves to the relief of emigrants from Ireland, and to the stimulation and preservation of Irish-American ideals, let us devote ourselves to the needs of all Americans who are in want . . . that the spirit of our people, that the hope of our United States shall not be crushed.

The thing that counts in our lives is the thing that endures. Beneath every rise and fall of this Nation there is a divine law which is supreme. We occasionally permit it to disappear from view in our excitement to reach, like the infant child, for something that glitters. The fall of wealth which we have witnessed, our utter disregard for human and spiritual values, and our apparent satisfaction to accept for many years a fictitious and superficial happiness, are not but examples of what happens when we fall as individuals and as a nation, to follow that law as our fundamental purposes of life.

As sons of the patron Saint Patrick, and as Americans, let us reconsecrate ourselves to fundamentals and pursue again the enduring values of life. In the place of disappointment and decay, our reward will be happiness and progress.

"THE REPUBLIC'S RECOVERY"—ADDRESS BY SENATOR CONNALLY

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask that there be printed in the RECORD an address delivered Tuesday, March 13, 1934, over the National Broadcasting System by the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] on the subject of The Republic's Recovery.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Through the generosity of the National Broadcasting Co., for which I desire to make due acknowledgment, I am privileged tonight to speak to the vast radio audience on the Republic's recovery.

From March 4, 1933, to March 4, 1934, will ever be a memorable period in the history of our Republic. When we speak of the Republic we have in mind not simply the constitutional structure of our Government but we include all of the people under the flag and their industries, callings, and enterprises, to which are devoted their talents, their energies, and their resources. On March 4, 1933, the Republic was grievously ill. Gloom enveloped the land. Difficulties more numerous and threatening than at any period within a century converged upon us with grim and hostile purpose. Business and industry were at the lowest ebb. Closing banks threatened the paralysis of our monetary and financial system. Fear had disarmed sturdy and daring spirits. Despair depressed many of the stoutest.

Languishing business and sickened agriculture, anemic finance, and swarming battalions of the unemployed, recruited from misfortune and misery to a maximum of thirteen millions, were symbols of the disaster that, like a poisonous blight, had laid its fatal curse upon the prosperity of a proud people.

Dark and dreary and dismal was the dawn of March 4, 1933. By high noon the clouds began to lift. A shaft of sunlight shot through the fog as the new President thrilled the Nation with an inspiring message of hope and vision and action, as he assumed the high functions of the loftiest station on the globe and there was inaugurated that liberal, forward-looking, courageous President, Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Another March 4 has come—March 4, 1934. The New York Times described the year just past as "a wonderful year"; a year of marvelous changes throughout the business, agricultural, and commercial life of the Nation. March 4, 1934, dawned upon a people uplifted with hope and stimulated by the striking contrast between the fine feeling of optimism which was breaking all about them and the dejection and despair and gloom which had oppressed them only a short year ago. Increasing recovery in business and in manufacturing, in agriculture and in finance had routed the stubborn spirit of pessimism which had assailed them in the midst of their woes and misfortunes.

And what is it that has wrought such marvelous reversal? What has been the magic which has performed such miraculous changes? From the moment President Roosevelt subscribed the oath of office his superb courage and lofty leadership challenged the devoted admiration of his countrymen. The old order and its policy of drifting and doubting and hesitation seemed linked with our tragedies and economic collapse. He seemed to personify the new deal. Here was a man who embodied within himself a new and virile policy of action. Here at last was a leader who placed human values above the sordid and the gross. Here was a champion of the "forgotten man" who scorned an obsequious servitude to special groups and powerful factions. He would serve no master save the people. President Roosevelt could not have triumphantly led the way, he could not have performed the memorable achievements of the past year but for the backing of a Congress devoted to the program of recovery. He was supported and sustained by Senate and House majorities pledged during the campaign of 1932 to advance the cause championed by Franklin D. Roosevelt and John N. Garner.

And what are some of the achievements of the Congress? The Farm Relief Act has done much toward converting agricultural distress into recovery through enhanced prices for farm products and the stabilization of farm production and consumption. A year ago agriculture was at its lowest ebb in 300 years. Today it is on the road to restoration.

Farms that were threatened with mortgage foreclosure have been refinanced and the farmer is again the master of his fields. Homes that were under the shadow of the auctioneer's hammer have been saved through the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. Factories that were idle now send their clouds of smoke skyward and fill the air with the whirring of their busy wheels. Several million men who were idle are now busy with the implements of their toil. Provision has been made for the hungry and the needy until business and industrial improvement may absorb them in normal occupations.

The Securities Act, designed to prevent the exploitation of the gulleless investor by unscrupulous adventurers who reaped where they did not sow, has been enacted. Banking legislation and financial management have provided for the reopening of the banks and the salvation of their depositors, their reorganization, and the guaranty of their deposits. Confidence has been restored and an impregnable fortress has been erected within which their resources may be preserved.

The hours of labor have been shortened and the wages of the man who toils have been protected. Increased purchasing power is opening the channels of business, and through them the current of trade with quickened pace has begun to move. A great enterprise has been inaugurated in the valley of the Tennessee. Exports are increasing and industry is reviving.

The most fundamental and sweeping policy adopted by the administration was the devaluation of the dollar. The gold standard was temporarily abandoned, but it was restored in a modified form and reached its climax when the Congress provided for the devaluation of the dollar and in the subsequent reduction of its gold content by the President to 59.06 percent of its former gold value. This action was taken to carry out a broad policy of lifting commodity prices and enabling debtors to discharge their mortgage and bonded indebtedness in dollars of a value somewhat comparable to the value of the dollar of the time such debts were incurred. The predictions that disaster would ensue and that ruin would engulf us have vanished. Without the slightest tremor business continued to improve and nowhere were observed the terrors which existed only in the excited and distempered imagination of those who resisted change. Instantly exportable commodities rose in price. More gradually domestic prices will respond.

Such are some of the accomplishments of the past year—the first year of the Roosevelt administration. There are yet a number of measures to be considered by the Congress. The program is not complete. Control of the stock and commodity exchanges are yet to be reached. The matter of reciprocal tariff agreements with other nations awaits the action of the Congress. A new tax bill, designed to readjust the tax burdens and yet to provide sufficient revenue for the Government, is now pending in the Senate.

The genius of the administration, and of the Congress under its leadership, is the frank avowal that whenever an error may be committed it will be acknowledged and corrected. It is admitted without question that new fields are being explored and problems which challenged the ability and initiative of the strongest and the proudest must be overcome. Obstacles more insurmountable than have ever heretofore challenged us must be removed or conquered. In this spirit and with lofty courage these problems will be met and mastered. So long as such motives actuate the powers of Government, devoted to the interests of the great body of the people and determined that the welfare of the hundred and twenty millions of American citizens shall always be subserved, there is strong assurance that America will be lifted out of the depths and resume again the powerful and prosperous place to which she is entitled among the nations of the earth.

From March 4, 1933, to March 4, 1934, is only a little while, measured by the calendar. It was a year crowded with action. It was charged with dynamic and vigorous achievement. There is no claim that everything which has been done reached perfection. Of course, there have been mistakes. Those mistakes, we hope, may be corrected wherever they appear. Many of the measures are temporary. They were designed to meet a grave emergency. Others are designed to establish a permanent policy. No one professes that every serious problem has been satisfactorily solved. No one asserts that every difficulty has vanished. We are still living in a world of actuality rather than fancy. Here and there will appear rough places in the picture. Some of the measures have been experimental. They blazed a new trail. They plowed a virgin soil. Only in the laboratory of experiment, only in the retort of initiative or change can progress be achieved. The old policy of standing still and doing nothing never pushed the world forward an inch. Running all through the program has been a purpose. The great objective has been the Republic's recovery.

The first year of the new deal has been a glorious one. Restored confidence, revived industrial, agricultural, and commercial, and financial activity bear witness to the faith of our people in the new deal. Rip Van Winkle, after a sleep of 20 years, awoke and rubbed his doubting eyes as he looked about him in amazement at a world new and dazzling when compared to the one he left when he fell into his famous slumber. Had a modern Rip Van Winkle failed to awake on March 4, 1933, and forgotten his woes and misfortunes in continuous slumber, until aroused on March 4, 1934, his bewildered gaze would have looked upon an America as astounding in its revived business, its restored confidence, and its marvelous change as that which greeted the fabled Rip Van Winkle after the lapse of a score of years.

March 4, 1934, marks the end of a splendid, a marvelous, memorable year crowded with achievement and filled with promise that the Republic's recovery is assured.

FREEDOM OF THE PRESS

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an editorial appearing in the Lexington (Ky.) Herald of March 11, 1934, entitled "The Freedom of the Press and the Duty of the Press."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Lexington (Ky.) Herald, Sunday, Mar. 11, 1934]

THE FREEDOM OF THE PRESS AND THE DUTY OF THE PRESS

During the past several months there has been wide discussion of the newspaper code, particularly of the inclusion in that code of a reservation of "the freedom of the press", as guaranteed by the first amendment to the Constitution. In the Executive order approving the code the President said:

"The recitation of the freedom-of-the-press clause in the code has no more place here than would the recitation of the whole Constitution or of the Ten Commandments. The freedom guaranteed by the Constitution is freedom of expression and that will be scrupulously respected—but it is not freedom to work children, or do business in a fire trap, or violate the laws against obscenity, libel, and lewdness."

Some publicists have professed great fear that there might be a limitation of the freedom of the press, some have expressed apprehension that we were coming to a period when the Government would exercise drastic censorship of the press. How sincere has been this fear, how real this apprehension, none may know.

There is no more precious possession than the right of free speech, with its corollary, freedom of the press. The enactment of the alien and sedition laws under the administration of John Adams led to national uneasiness and wide-spread apprehension that the Government would both prohibit the right of free speech and exercise the tyranny of censorship over the press. The Kentucky Legislature of 1798 passed a series of resolutions that were the first and boldest exposition of the doctrine of the Democratic Party, upon which, as a platform, that party achieved victory in 1800 and remained the dominant party in the Nation until 1860. Those resolutions were the protest of the State of Kentucky against any effort by the Government of the United States to limit the freedom of the press.

There have been other striking illustrations of the devotion of Kentuckians to the principle of free speech and the freedom of the press that flows from the right of free speech as the shadow follows the substance. Cassius M. Clay, the Lion of White Hall, so valued the right of free speech and the freedom of the press that he installed a cannon in his printing office in the city of Lexington to defend those rights against the mob, with the certainty that he would sell his life dearly rather than surrender rights that he treasured more than his life.

After the War between the States the editor of the Lexington Observer and Reporter, a Confederate officer who, after his return from the field of battle, undertook newspaper work as a method of supporting his wife and child, gave equally as high a demonstration of his belief in the right of free speech and the freedom of the press.

In the face of passionate disapproval by his comrades with whom he had served through 4 years of war, regardless of threats, he knowingly sacrificed the certainty of election to the office of Commonwealth's attorney because of the expression and advocacy of his conviction that the freed and enfranchised Negroes should be permitted to vote and to testify in courts of justice and of equity.

In the long history of Kentucky there are other similar illustrations so that it may be accepted that there are no people who value more highly and guard more valiantly that right than the people of the State of Kentucky. And it was recognized in Kentucky from its foundation that the right of free speech carries with it a duty; that the freedom of the press imposes an obligation as sacred as the right guaranteed by the Constitution.

As stated by the President, "The freedom guaranteed by the Constitution is freedom of expression", the expression of the views, the defense of the convictions of him who exercises the right of free speech. That right was not won, that right was not guaranteed by the Constitution to ensure financial security or profit to those who publish newspapers or periodicals. It was won and the victory ratified by the amendment to the Constitution because of duty done and service rendered to citizens and to country.

The freedom of the press carries with it the duty to publish for the benefit of the citizens all facts that affect their Government, that enable them to protect their health, that tend to insure their safety, and help to bring a full realization of the performance or lack of performance of duty by their public servants.

Those, and only those, who perform that duty, who meet that obligation, have the right to claim the protection guaranteed by the Constitution. They who do not fulfill the obligation, who do not perform the duty to the public that was the moving cause for the guaranty of the freedom of the press, they who sleep on their rights and are slothful in the exercise of their obligation, have but scant reason to demand or to proclaim the sacredness of the right when they fail to perform the duty that justifies the guaranty of that right.

It is, in our opinion, as imperative an obligation not to abuse the right of free speech and the freedom of the press to publish anything that does needless injury to citizens, or causes needless pain and humiliation to man or to woman as it is to publish that which the citizens have a right to know. As President Roosevelt states, the Constitution does not guarantee freedom to work children, to do business in a dangerous building, to violate the laws against obscenity, libel, and lewdness, nor to exploit private affairs of the citizens for the pecuniary benefit of the publisher. The freedom of expression of opinion is guaranteed; freedom to print the facts about public matters and public servants, to warn the public of menace to life or health or property, not license to traduce public officials or exploit the private affairs of citizens either through malice or for greed.

CANCELATION OF AIR-MAIL CONTRACTS

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD a transcript of the testimony of Col. Charles A. Lindbergh on Friday, before the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

I also ask to have printed the testimony of Capt. Eddie Rickenbacker on Saturday before the same committee.

I also submit for the RECORD a statement by Capt. Eddie Rickenbacker; also an editorial appearing in the New York Times entitled, "The Weight of Evidence"; an editorial from the Washington Herald entitled, "Lindy Merits Praise"; and several other editorials and communications on the subject of the cancellation of the air-mail contracts.

There being no objection, the matters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TESTIMONY OF COL. CHARLES LINDBERGH BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON POST OFFICES AND POST ROADS

The CHAIRMAN (Senator KENNETH McKELLAR). Colonel Lindbergh, have you examined that bill (Senate bill 3112, which is a bill to revise air-mail laws)?

Colonel LINDBERGH. Yes, sir; I have examined the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Would you be good enough to give the committee your views on that bill just in your own way, or, if you have a statement which you have prepared, we would be glad to have that, or, if you have not a statement, just make any statement that you wish.

Colonel LINDBERGH. I have no prepared statement, Senator. I believe that this bill leaves several things untouched. The most important question in this situation is whether or not these air lines have a right to trial before they are convicted of the guilt with which they are charged.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee was thinking more of the proposed legislation. The contracts have already been canceled, and the question now before the committee is what we will institute instead, and for that reason this bill has been introduced; and we would be glad to have your views on that question or any part of that. What we would like to get now would be your views in reference to this bill.

Senator BARBOUR. Might I interrupt here? I think that the witness has in mind the latter part of section 7, on page 5, which begins about line 14, "No persons shall be eligible to bid for or hold an air-mail contract if it or its predecessor is asserting or has any claim against the United States because of a prior annulment of any contract by the Postmaster General." That is in this bill, and that is the matter which the colonel particularly stressed at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. We should be glad to have the colonel discuss any matters in the bill.

CALLS ELIGIBILITY CHARGE UNJUST

Colonel LINDBERGH. As far as that particular paragraph is concerned, in my mind it is one of the most unjust acts I have ever seen in American legislation.

This bill I have read from a technical standpoint primarily because my work with the air lines has always been largely technical. As a general principle in commenting on the items contained here, I would have a number of suggestions to make in regard to encouraging the advance of American commercial aviation as far as it is possible. The suggestions I now make are in regard to details, technical details.

On page 2 there is an item which limits the amount of mail which can be carried in any one plane. In my mind it is desirable to encourage the use of large planes wherever the traffic warrants their use. I should suggest that it would be to the best advantage of aviation to put no limit on the size of the plane which can be used where the traffic warrants the large type.

Senator LOGAN. Let me interrupt right there, Colonel Lindbergh, and ask as to whether or not there is any advantage in limiting the poundage of mail that can be carried; what would be the purpose of having such a limitation in a bill?

OPPOSES LIMIT ON PLANE SIZE

Colonel LINDBERGH. I do not know what that purpose would be. The only point I make is that I believe it is not to the best advantage of aviation, or the advance of aviation, to limit the size of a plane which can be used where traffic exists. In other words, I think this is a point here which makes it hard to use a large plane rather than two or three smaller planes, and I think it is very definitely to the advantage of aviation to encourage the development of larger types than we have today where the traffic warrants their use.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, what limitation do you refer to?

Colonel LINDBERGH. Well, the limitation of poundage which can be placed on any one plane, which, I believe, in this bill, roughly, is 300 pounds originally and 200 additional pounds; two or three hundred.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not think that there is any limitation in the language there, and it is my understanding that some of the larger planes are now carrying as much as 1,100 pounds.

Colonel LINDBERGH. Considerably more than that, Senator. A number of tons would be possible on the largest type on short routes.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not construe that language, Colonel, as meaning there is a limitation on the amount of mail that might be carried in any one plane. It merely fixes a rate of 30 cents on the first 300 pounds and a different rate on any additional within certain limitations after 300 pounds. But there is no purpose in the bill to put a limitation on the poundage.

Senator BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, if I may inject here, on page 7, from about line 10 down, you will see that the Secretary of Commerce shall consult the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy and he shall determine not only the speed but the safety features and devices on airplanes to be used on the route. Later on somewhere it speaks of the load capacity.

The CHAIRMAN. That is at present under the Department of Commerce—the aviation section, of course, and after 3 years under the bill that will be turned over to the Interstate Commerce Commission. I see the point you make, Colonel, and I do not think we should limit the number of pounds to be carried in any one plane, because I can see the desirability of having larger planes. It may be done in a few years, as the art of flying will permit much larger or greater weights to be carried.

OVERLOADS CARRIED FREE

Senator LOGAN. Let me call your attention, Senator McKellar, to what may substantiate what Colonel Lindbergh has said. There is no limitation as to the size of the plane, but there is a limitation as to the poundage for which the Government will pay. There is so much for the first 300 pounds and so much for the next 300 pounds, and anything that may be carried above that must be carried free. Of course, it seems to me that would indirectly limit the size of the plane because you would not want to be carrying large quantities of mail when you get nothing for it, when they could carry it in smaller planes and get something.

Senator MCGILL. The limitation is 40 cents per airplane-mile.

Colonel LINDBERGH. I have no suggestion as to the amount paid per airplane mile. The question of payment I feel is outside of my field, but it does limit the amount that can be paid for on one airplane per mile. My suggestion is, in order to encourage aviation to the maximum degree, it would be better not to make a limitation as to the size of the plane which can be used for a larger amount of traffic.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well, the committee will be glad to have that.

Colonel LINDBERGH. On page 8, section 13, I notice that the contractor shall be required to carry pilots of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps. I should have said copilots. I do not believe that the commercial air lines can operate to the utmost degree of efficiency unless they carry their own pilots and copilots. As it is, we have copilots who have been with the lines for a number of years, and we are able to regulate the experience these men possess.

They know the routes in each instance. As it is, a great many of our copilots have spent several years on the routes on flying, and to my mind we can operate with a greater degree of efficiency if we carry commercial copilots in each instance. A great many of our pilots and copilots are either officers of the Army or the Navy, and we draw from the Army and Navy very frequently when we are taking copilots and training them for our line. But I think it would be a mistake to require that military copilots be carried on commercial planes.

Senator O'MAHONEY. There is nothing in that language to prevent the commercial air lines from carrying their own copilots as well.

Colonel LINDBERGH. It would be impractical, I believe, to carry, or to be required to carry, an additional member of the crew at any time. Personally, I am definitely opposed to bringing the military into commercial life, and I believe the requirements for the carrying of the military copilot in times of peace is not to the advantage of aviation.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any other suggestion you have to make?

POINTS TO DANGERS OF FOG

Colonel LINDBERGH. On page 7 mention is made that only speed, load capacity, and safety features and devices on airplanes are to be specified. I am not sure that that includes all of the desirable characteristics that we should encourage on the mail lines. For instance, to maintain a regularity of service the question of range is very important—fuel range. For instance, take over here where the Alleghenies are covered with fog, and take the cities of Columbus, Cleveland, or Pittsburgh; they are so covered with fog that the plane cannot alight; if the planes have sufficient range to go on through to Kansas City or to Chicago, there are many instances where we will be able to carry the mail and some passengers through where it would be impossible to give the service in a short range.

There is also the question of ice. We find in certain types of planes we can use a device on the edge of the plane. Of course, that might be included under safety devices. Every time we build a plane we find that we can improve the next design. These specifications give full opportunity for the development of the cost of aircraft. These things I only wish to suggest, because I have never studied the framing of legislation. I only bring those to your attention, for I believe these things I have mentioned should be possible in carrying out of whatever legislation is enacted.

Senator HAYDEN. Colonel Lindbergh, would you suggest the specific word that would improve the text?

Colonel LINDBERGH. I should hate to suggest the wording of legislation. I do not believe that my field of experience warrants that.

Senator HAYDEN. Legislation is a practical matter, and if at a later date you could advise the committee in writing as to how the text could be changed, it would be appreciated.

Colonel LINDBERGH. I should be glad to help you in any way I could.

Senator O'MAHONEY. Colonel Lindbergh, I was not here when you were questioned first upon the rate structure, and I am given to understand that you took the position that part of the schedule here would somehow constitute a limitation upon the mail that could be carried.

REFUSES TO DISCUSS RATES

Colonel LINDBERGH. Upon the size of the ship. As I said, I do not wish to suggest rates for the carrying of mail. I feel that is outside of my field; but this limitation here as to the maximum amount per airplane-mile, it seems to me that limits the size of plane that can be used in heavy traffic. According to that, if you had all of the poundage, it would be better to run two or three planes than one large plane, and I believe that the construction and use of large type of planes where traffic warrants it is advisable and to the best interests of aviation.

Senator O'MAHONEY. You mean that the idea of the limitation to a maximum of 40 cents would make it more desirable to have small planes rather than large planes?

Colonel LINDBERGH. In this case that limits it to about 400 or 500 pounds, I believe.

Senator O'MAHONEY. No; that does not do that, does it, Colonel?

Senator LOGAN. Then 566½ pounds would bring it up to the maximum rate, and all above that would be free.

Colonel LINDBERGH. That is a very small load for an airplane, and in many cases much less than could be carried, especially in heavy traffic. The only point I make is if we are to encourage aviation, wherever the traffic warrants, to encourage the use of large ships. We have not yet reached the largest types of transport planes.

Senator O'MAHONEY. I do not understand how you can conceive this wording would limit the size or the amount of mail that would be carried. It is merely a limitation of the rate that would be paid.

Colonel LINDBERGH. But above a poundage of 600 pounds approximately it would be free. It would be better to use two planes.

Senator O'MAHONEY. Why?

Colonel LINDBERGH. Because of the limitation, being approximately 600 pounds, or a little under.

DISPUTED CLAUSE IS READ

Senator O'MAHONEY. No; I do not read it that way. Let's read the provision. [Reading:] "That such rates in no case shall exceed 30 cents per airplane-mile for the first 300 pounds of mail and not exceeding 6 cents per airplane-mile for each additional 200 pounds of mail or fraction thereof."

That means that if a plane is carrying 300 pounds or less that the contractor will not receive more than 30 cents per airplane-mile for that mail. It also provides 6 cents per airplane-mile for everything over that shall be paid and for each additional 200 pounds or fraction thereof. That means that the rate of 30 cents may be built up by 6-cent stages until you reach the maximum of 40 cents.

Colonel LINDBERGH. Which is about 600 pounds.

Senator O'MAHONEY. But you can continue to pile on your poundage at 40 cents, could you not?

Colonel LINDBERGH. If that is the case, I withdraw my objection.

The CHAIRMAN. I think the Colonel is right about that. That is a limitation of 40 cents. I do not think you can go beyond the 40 cents.

M'KELLAR SUPPORTS LINDBERGH

Colonel LINDBERGH. As I read this, there is a definite maximum. The CHAIRMAN. The Colonel is right about that.

Senator BARBOUR. In other words, Colonel, in the point of view of the person advertising for a contract, from the point of view of one trying to get business for transcontinental lines on the basis of this bill, you would, if these payments were to stay in the bill, have several small planes instead of one or more larger planes?

Colonel LINDBERGH. Yes; looking at it from a technical standpoint, it seems to me this limits the desirable development of future aviation.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any other suggestions that you have in mind, Colonel?

Colonel LINDBERGH. On the top of page 2 there is a limitation of 3 years for the transport lines to keep the mail contract. I should like to bring to your attention that the life of an airplane is probably a minimum of 5 or 6 years, and that they might leave the lines with planes at the end of 3 years that are only half used. Also in developing a plane we have found that it requires a minimum of 2 years and sometimes 3 from the time we begin construction until the planes are in service with the difficulties reasonably well worked out. I simply bring that to your attention for what it may be worth.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be said that after 3 years, under another provision of the bill, it goes into the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and that Commission will have the right, and it will be the duty to fix the time and the rates and everything else in connection with the actual running of the plane, and I imagine that a line that already had a 3-year contract would be in very excellent condition before the Interstate Commerce Commission, which is a quasi-judicial body, for the purpose of handling those particular things.

Colonel LINDBERGH. I simply wanted to bring that situation to your attention—the length of life of a plane and the time required to construct it.

Senator LOGAN. In connection with that same thought that you suggested, Colonel, you will find a provision in the bill, after the bid has been accepted, that the company will be given 6 months to get ready to fly the mail. If he is starting on the ground floor, he would not be ready in 6 months.

URGES SEPARATE COMMISSION

Colonel LINDBERGH. If a new plane is to be developed, we find in our experience that it takes a minimum of 2 years to get it in service with the difficulties well ironed out. I feel that any commission governing aviation should be a separate commission. I do not feel that the Interstate Commerce Commission, which is charged with the regulations of railroads, could be used to best advantage in developing aviation.

The CHAIRMAN. Let us suppose for a moment that the commission be divided up into different sections, one section having railroads and another section having aviation and another section having waterways—the difficulty that you mention would be obviated in that way, would it not?

Colonel LINDBERGH. I do not know. I simply would like to make the suggestion that, if possible, whatever branch regulates this industry be separated from the railroads or other methods of transportation.

The CHAIRMAN. How long have you been a flyer, Colonel?

Colonel LINDBERGH. For about 12 years.

The CHAIRMAN. I believe that another committee has already asked some of the questions that I wish to ask, but just to make our record complete I want to ask you, Are you interested in any of the aviation companies that had contracts with the Government?

Colonel LINDBERGH. Yes; for several years I have been technical adviser to the Transcontinental Air Transport originally and now the Transcontinental & Western Airways, and the Pan American.

The CHAIRMAN. Three?

Colonel LINDBERGH. No; the Transcontinental is now operating the old Transcontinental Air Transport.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you interested as an officer or director or stockholder in any of those companies?

Colonel LINDBERGH. As a stockholder. My connection with the companies is active, working with them as technical adviser.

The CHAIRMAN. What salary do you receive from each of the companies?

Colonel LINDBERGH. I receive $6,000 a year from the Transcontinental & Western Airways up to the first of this month, and $10,000 from the Pan American Airways.

Senator BARBOUR. That seems a very modest salary to me, Colonel. You could have very easily gotten a great deal more in your field with your reputation and popularity.

Colonel LINDBERGH. I felt more interest in aviation than any other field.

The CHAIRMAN. You are also a stockholder to some extent in these companies?

Colonel LINDBERGH. I turned in a questionnaire to a Senate committee soon after I returned from Europe, listing in detail my stock holdings and financial transactions. I cannot give you the exact figures, but they are available in this questionnaire.

The CHAIRMAN. Could we copy those figures here for us to have our record complete?

Colonel LINDBERGH. I should be glad to, but I have not the exact figures in mind.

The CHAIRMAN. Colonel Lindbergh, you objected to section 7, on page 5, and I just want to ask you if the two companies in which you are interested are comprised in the list of those contracts that are referred to in section 7.

Colonel LINDBERGH. I do not know what contracts are referred to definitely. The contract of the Transcontinental & Western Airways has been canceled.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me ask you, do you know anything about the making of those contracts with the Post Office Department?

Colonel LINDBERGH. Very little.

NO PART IN MAKING CONTRACTS

The CHAIRMAN. Did you ever take part in any making of those contracts or attend any meetings?

Colonel LINDBERGH. No; in no way.

The CHAIRMAN. I have so understood that you never attended any meetings at which these contracts were let?

Colonel LINDBERGH. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. If they are honest contracts you are for them, and if they are illegal or dishonest you would not countenance them at all?

Colonel LINDBERGH. The only point I have ever made is I feel that any organization or a citizen has the right to trial before being convicted or found guilty of a charge which is implied and not proved.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; I can understand that, but at the same time you would not want the public to understand you were defending in any way a contract that was in fact illegal?

Colonel LINDBERGH. I am only defending the right to trial.

The CHAIRMAN. And not the contract, if it is illegal. If it is honest and just, then you are defending the contract?

Colonel LINDBERGH. That is right; and under no other circumstances.

The CHAIRMAN. And under no other circumstances. That is just exactly what we thought you would say, substantially, and it's to your very great credit.

Senator O'MAHONEY. Let me ask a question. If you individually had a personal contract with another individual, and you should discover that that other individual had obtained that contract from you by fraud, would you consider yourself within your rights to cancel that contract?

Colonel LINDBERGH. Well, sir, I cannot answer that question the way it is put there.

Senator O'MAHONEY. Don't you know, as a matter of fact, that the history of commercial relations is full of cases in which one company or one individual canceled the contract with another individual for reasons that were satisfactory to the person doing the cancellation?

Colonel LINDBERGH. I do not know, sir; but I do not believe that the history of the United States Government shows where anyone has acted in the matter of convicting someone which has never been submitted for trial, or even hearing.

Senator O'MAHONEY. If there is a difference between a civil action and a criminal action, you would be willing to be guided by that difference?

DEFENDS RIGHT TO HEARING

Colonel LINDBERGH. I feel that I have not the legal background to make comment on that. I feel so obviously that these organizations have a right to trial and hearing. That is not a legal question.

Senator O'MAHONEY. They are not being accused in a criminal way.

Colonel LINDBERGH. I know that nothing has been proven so far as accusations are concerned.

Senator O'MAHONEY. I think, Colonel, you have confused the two elements, that of criminality prosecution and an ordinary civil transaction.

Senator BARBOUR. I do not think that is really fair, Mr. Chairman. To say that the colonel has confused anything. I think, as a matter of fact, that the colonel has made a very clear statement of facts. He takes the position that he would not defend the contract that was in any way an illegal contract. On the other hand, he and others who have contracts want an opportunity to prove in a court of competent jurisdiction in a proper way whether or not these contracts were illegal. Now, to ply him with some hypothetical technical questions will not, I am sure, swerve him from the point he makes so clearly.

Senator DAVIS. And also if he did have a contract with an individual and it was canceled the individual would have the right to go into court to determine whether the contract was legal.

Senator MCGILL. There is no doubt of that, but how would the suit be brought unless the cancellation first took place?

Senator DAVIS. The man that he contracted with would have the right to go into court.

The CHAIRMAN. One moment, gentlemen, I do not think that we can settle this question here, and we had better wait until the committee meets to write up the bill. What we wanted to do was to get Colonel Lindbergh's opinion. I have two more questions that I should like to ask. As I understand you, Colonel, you did not actually participate in the making of any of these contracts?

Colonel LINDBERGH. In no way.

The CHAIRMAN. No, Colonel; it has appeared in the hearing of another committee that the Transcontinental and Western Airways—and I believe you said you were the technical adviser of that company?

Colonel LINDBERGH. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And probably own stock in it?

HALLIBURTON CHARGE MENTIONED

The CHAIRMAN. That the representative of that company entered into a collusive agreement with several other companies to buy a man by the name of Erle Halliburton off so that he would not bid on a contract. If such a thing as that was done, you would not think for a moment of approving it?

Colonel LINDBERGH. I have no knowledge of the action taken by the contractors, but I do feel whatever has been done should be established. I feel it is the right of the industry, and the right of the public, and my own right, to know what things have been done definitely.

The CHAIRMAN. And you feel that in making this statement you are representing the interests of your company, and the interests of what you believe to be right?

Colonel LINDBERGH. This is the interest of what I believe to be right in this case.

Senator HAYDEN. I want to direct your attention to section 11 on the seventh page. It provides, "The Secretary of Commerce shall prescribe the maximum flying hours of pilots and copilots on air-mail lines, and the minimum pay of pilots and/or copilots on such lines, safe operation methods, and is authorized to approve any plans made by air-mail operating companies for retirement or annuity benefits to pilots and/or copilots."

That appears to be the only section in the bill that deals with the operating personnel, and in this present discussion there has been a good deal of talk with respect to the kind of personnel that operates these planes, both with respect to the use of ordinary commercial pilots and the military pilots. I think that it is advisable, if I may, that I ask a few questions with respect to the training of pilots. Where does a commercial pilot get his preliminary training?

Colonel LINDBERGH. In most cases they are drawn from the military service. They have graduated from the Army or Navy schools, and very frequently after graduation spend a year or several years in the military service, and very frequently after that they have spent a number of months, or 1 or 2 months, at least, in private flying in commercial life.

Senator HAYDEN. That has not been at their own expense, but it has been provided by the Army or the Navy or the Marine Corps, and they received some sort of pay during the time of training?

Colonel LINDBERGH. In the case of men taken from military life, if the training has been by the Government, they are numbered on percentage, and—I do not know the exact percent—but if they received their training in commercial life, that has taken a longer number of years.

Senator HAYDEN. That is the next question I wanted to ask you; how long it takes to train a military pilot and how long a commercial pilot?

Colonel LINDBERGH. That is very difficult; to state the exact time on that. A man may learn to run or to fly a plane around a field in a week or two as a student, but it requires years before he can carry passengers and mail, with what you call a reasonable degree of safety to the passengers or the mail.

Senator HAYDEN. Your commercial pilots, even though barred from military training, would also be valuable in times of war?

COMMERCIAL PILOTS WAR ASSET

Colonel LINDBERGH. I believe that the commercial aviation of the future is one of the greatest assets in the military reserve. We have had a few reserve pilots who have had no military training, but they have had years of training behind them that would be an important factor.

Senator HAYDEN. What special training has the commercial airplane pilot that a military pilot does not have?

Colonel LINDBERGH. I should say it is a case more of the amount of specialized training. A commercial pilot, for instance, particularly in carrying the mails, and also in carrying passengers, is constantly encountering all different kinds of weather every day. The commercial lines must operate on schedule, if possible, and that naturally gives the commercial pilot more training in storms, and they are familiar with atmospheric conditions. The commercial pilot has a large amount of training in flying under adverse weather conditions.

Senator HAYDEN (turning to Department of Commerce certificates which pilots must have). Do you know how many there are in the United States that possess those certificates?

Colonel LINDBERGH. Not exactly. I believe it will be in the neighborhood of 600 or 700.

Senator HAYDEN. How many of them are employed on the air-mail lines regularly?

Colonel LINDBERGH. Most of those fellows are employed on air-mail lines.

Senator HAYDEN. Do you know how much instrument flying is done by military pilots?

Colonel LINDBERGH. Instrument flying is given in the military training, but there is not any comparable amount of instrument flying in the military in comparison to that done by the commercial lines. However, such training is given to the military pilot.

Senator HAYDEN. Do you know whether there is a requirement for blind flying in military training?

ARMY EQUIPMENT INADEQUATE

Colonel LINDBERGH. There are requirements for blind flying, but not as well as in our commercial planes. There is equipment, but there could not be as good equipment, in delicate instruments, as in the commercial planes, and still carry out military maneuvers. For instance, on the question of gyroscopes, that would somewhat limit the military planes, which are required to be highly maneuverable. It would be hardly desirable for military planes to carry the intricate equipment carried upon air lines.

Senator HAYDEN. Is it necessary for all commercial pilots to have knowledge of radio?

Colonel LINDBERGH. I believe it is.

Senator HAYDEN. On commercial planes, is the radio equipment required and installed?

Colonel LINDBERGH. Practically all of them; on all of the lines I have been connected with.

Senator HAYDEN. Do you know whether the Army planes are equipped with radio?

Colonel LINDBERGH. A number of them, not as the commercial radio has been developed. But keep in mind that the commercial radio was, to a large extent, originated through military development, and it simply happens that we have more use for radio in our present type of commercial flying.

Senator HAYDEN. As to the commercial pilots, they have knowledge of aviation and aerodynamics—must they have a knowledge of postal regulations?

Colonel LINDBERGH. Yes; there is a certain amount of knowledge required of postal regulations in carrying the mails.

Senator HAYDEN. Now, we come to the question, do you think it is proper for the Secretary of Commerce to have this authority prescribed in the bill to fix the maximum hours?

URGES LIMIT ON HOURS

Colonel LINDBERGH. As to the question of the method, I hesitate to comment on that without more experience. We all recognize that beyond a certain number of hours a month, a pilot loses his best flying ability. As we call it, he gets stale, and I do feel that there should be a limitation as to the number of hours a month that a pilot flies. As to the method of limitation, I think that is very important, and I do not think that I have spent enough study on that to comment.

Senator HAYDEN. There is also a section that the Secretary of Commerce shall prescribe the pay of copilots. Has there been any difficulty in that respect between the companies you are connected with and your pilots?

Colonel LINDBERGH. I feel that there has been very little. On the other hand, that is something that is not directly in my field. A pilot is a man who spends a great many years in training. His training is very special and he has to have technical knowledge, and I think he deserves a fair rate of compensation.

PILOTS CLASSED AS PROFESSIONALS

Senator HAYDEN. From the way that you have described a pilot, he is pretty much in the class of a professional man, such as a doctor or a lawyer, and he is required to be qualified physically, and by other rules, education, etc., and then to have this specialized knowledge, which requires a long time, and for that reason you think he should be well paid?

Colonel LINDBERGH. By all means; yes.

Senator HAYDEN. Under the arrangement with respect to the rates of pay now brought about, there must be some system for the beginning on the part of the pilot.

Colonel LINDBERGH. I feel I have so little experience in relation to that question I hesitate to make an answer. In my connection with these companies and in aviation, it has been in the development of new equipment and laying out of routes in the operation of equipment. I hesitate to express an opinion in a field with which I am not thoroughly familiar.

Senator HAYDEN. As I take it from your answer generally, you do believe there should be some limitation as to the hours of flying, and there would be no harm in designating some public authority with respect to the pay that the pilots should receive?

Colonel LINDBERGH. We recognize now that a minimum and also a maximum of hours is necessary. As to the methods, I feel that that is something that requires a great deal of study, and I have not given it enough study to make a suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. Colonel, do you recall the minimum pay and the maximum pay of your companies? I do not mean for you to be accurate; just as near as you can give it from memory.

Colonel LINDBERGH. Very roughly, I should think it would vary around $500 or $600 a month, possibly a little more, for experienced men who were doing a great deal of flying and a little less for men who were being taken on without being on the regular routes. That is very roughly given and it probably includes the question of mileage.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think the maximum is probably $600 per month?

Colonel LINDBERGH. No; the maximum runs higher than that for men who are spending a great many years in that trade and who are doing a great deal of flying.

Senator BARBOUR. I think, Mr. Chairman, we have had testimony before to the effect that in some instances pilots received as high as $800 or $850 per month.

Senator GIBSON. Colonel Lindbergh, there are certain rates prescribed in this bill for the carrying of the mail. I think you are familiar with the provision. Are those rates reasonable and fair?

Colonel LINDBERGH. Senator, as to the question of rates, I have never taken any part in it. I have always been and should always like to devote my interest in aviation to the technical aspect and the question of contracts and of rates and the method of pay I hate to express an opinion on.

Senator GIBSON. It has been claimed that the Army has failed in carrying air mail. If you have any opinion, would you give some reasons which bring that about?

DENIES ARMY PILOTS FAILED

Colonel LINDBERGH. The carrying of the mail by the Army undoubtedly is not as efficient as the carrying by the commercial companies. The Army had 10 days to prepare to take over a system which had been developed by the commercial companies for a period of over 10 years. The Army equipment is not designed for the purpose of carrying the mail, and the Army pilots did not have adequate time to study the routes which they were to fly. I do not feel that that organization could be expected to take over the air-mail system of this country in anything like the short time that the Army had to prepare to take it over. If you change around the most experienced pilots we have in mail routes, giving them new routes, it would simply take them weeks and probably months before they could fly the new route as efficiently as the old route. I know if I went back on my old route, from St. Louis to Chicago, it would take me months to fly it as well as it was flown by me when I left.

Senator GIBSON. In other words, they were not qualified by experience?

Colonel LINDBERGH. Not qualified by experience in a certain type of work which they were taking over.

Senator DAVIS. Now, on the question, are the old companies being put into a position to make absurdly low bids and run the risk of losing everything they now have invested in that industry?

Colonel LINDBERGH. That is something, again, Senator, that does not come in my field, and I do not feel capable of expressing an opinion. I can see a great many difficulties which are facing them, but I do not feel on the question of bidding that I have had the experience to give testimony on it.

Senator SCHALL. I want to know what the cost is to the Army for the carrying of this mail, as distinguished from the private cost. I understand the private cost is $12,000,000. If you have any information on that, Colonel, I would like to have it.

1933 COST $14,000,000

Colonel LINDBERGH. The private companies, I believe, received about $14,000,000, or did last year, from the Post Office. I believe one half of that was returned in postage. The amount returned by postage has been increasing and in relation to the total amount of subsidy. I know of no way to find out at the present time how much it is costing the Army to fly the mail.

Senator SCHALL. It was considered on the floor of the Senate, and I have heard it elsewhere, that it would cost the Army $30,000,000 to do the same work that the private industry was doing for $12,000,000 or $14,000,000.

Senator BARBOUR. Colonel Lindbergh, when I made the suggestion that those who formerly held contracts should appear before the committee, it was because I felt that the testimony we were getting up to that time was from the War Department; and while I realized that it was, of course, valuable that the best information this committee could receive from a practical standpoint was from those who had been engaged in this kind of undertaking, and, with that in mind, I want to ask you quite a number of questions, some of which may, in some degree at least, cover a part or all of the questions that have been asked before. How long did it take the Transcontinental Air Transport to get ready for its mail service when it commenced on July 9, 1929?

DESCRIBES YEAR'S PREPARATION

Colonel LINDBERGH. Of course, starting on July 9 meant over a year's preparation for that starting. In that time passengers only were being carried, and up to that time no consideration had been given, as far as I know, to the carrying of mail. As I remember, the first mail carried over that line was in the fall of 1930, a little over a year after the start of operations and over 2 years from the time of the inception of the company, probably 3.

Senator BARBOUR. Was that the Transcontinental air service?

Colonel LINDBERGH. To begin with, it was Transcontinental air service for passengers using trains from New York to Columbus, Ohio, and planes from Columbus to a point in Oklahoma, and train again during the second night to Clovis, N.Mex., and plane from Clovis, N.Mex., to Los Angeles, making a total of 48 hours.

Senator BARBOUR. Then in a sense this was only half transcontinental?

Colonel LINDBERGH. In the beginning it was transcontinental in service, and the amount flown by the planes, it was in excess of one half.

Senator BARBOUR. Was any night flying involved in this operation?

Colonel LINDBERGH. Originally we carried passengers only by daylight. Then we also carried them by night.

Senator BARBOUR. Does the T.W.A. fly passengers both by night and day?

Colonel LINDBERGH. Yes, sir.

Senator BARBOUR. Does it use a multimotor or a single motor by night?

Colonel LINDBERGH. A multimotor.

Senator BARBOUR. Of course, I refer to the policy of your company in flying passengers by night, and only multimotor planes are used. Is that based on your recommendation?

Colonel LINDBERGH. Yes; I have always recommended that, and I believe other people also agreed with it.

Senator BARBOUR. Then you do not think it is sound policy to fly passengers by night with single-motor planes?

FAVORS MULTIMOTOR PLANES

Colonel LINDBERGH. I believe that passengers have the right to the safety of multimotor engines by night and also by day.

The CHAIRMAN. How many multimotor engines have you in your service?

Colonel LINDBERGH. I believe 16 of them.

The CHAIRMAN. On the transcontinental route from New York to St. Louis, and on to San Francisco?

Colonel LINDBERGH. That includes most of these, yes; on the route from New York to Los Angeles by way of St. Louis and Kansas City, and they also use multimotor engines on other routes.

Senator BARBOUR. Was your company carrying air mail from San Francisco to Chicago when the air-mail contracts were canceled?

Colonel LINDBERGH. Into Chicago. I am not certain about San Francisco at this time.

Senator BARBOUR. Did you have to carry passengers from San Francisco to Chicago some time before you were permitted to carry air mail?

Colonel LINDBERGH. As to the carrying of mail into Chicago I would have to check that.

Senator BARBOUR. But, assuming you did carry mail into Chicago, did you have to carry passengers into this point for some time before you were permitted to carry the mails?

Colonel LINDBERGH. We have carried passengers into these points in every instance for a good deal of time before we began to carry the mails.

LOST ON PASSENGER SERVICE

Senator BARBOUR. You operated this passenger service to Chicago and to San Francisco at a loss before you were permitted to carry the mails?

Colonel LINDBERGH. There was a material loss for the company. Senator BARBOUR. You were willing to take that loss in trying to pioneer and develop aviation?

Colonel LINDBERGH. The feeling was that private aviation could be developed to where it would be able to carry passengers without a loss, and that it was necessary to develop it to where that could be done.

(Senator BARBOUR asked about a United Aviation Co. bid in competition with the Transcontinental Air Transport and the Western Air Express for carrying the mail between New York and Los Angeles in September 1930, suggesting the company had been formed chiefly to make the bid.)

Senator BARBOUR. Assuming that all of the former air-mail carriers were disqualified from bidding as provided in this bill, and that the new contracts were let to new companies for that purpose, how long would it take, in your judgment, from the time the contracts were awarded, to get satisfactory transcontinental service in operation?

Colonel LINDBERGH. It is very difficult to know that. As I say, if you are building a new ship, we have found that it takes at least 2 years to get it into service. We have been building up these in the case of the Transcontinental and Western Air Lines since 1928, and how long it would take to reproduce that service, how many years, I do not know.

Senator BARBOUR. Then, too, of course, Colonel, it takes quite as long to build up what we might call the personnel and its morale and qualify them as it does to qualify the machines themselves?

STRESSES VALUE OF MORALE

Colonel LINDBERGH. I think one of the most important things, and one of the most difficult, is the morale of the organization, and that is one of the most important assets one has.

Senator BARBOUR. The breaking up of these air-line organizations is probably the most serious phase of the cancellation of the air-mail contracts?

Colonel LINDBERGH. Of course; in my mind the most serious thing is this action even without hearing. But, from an aviation standpoint, we have built in this country, without doubt, the best commercial aviation in the world. There is no other country, nor any other group of countries, that compares with the American commercial aviation. Now, to break down the system which is really the backbone of our commercial aviation, to me, has been an extremely serious blow to the industry, and I believe it will take a long time to get back to the position where we were in the beginning of the year.

Senator BARBOUR. Colonel, in the light of what you said about aviation in other fields, have you observed any commercial aviation abroad particularly?

Colonel LINDBERGH. Particularly the commercial aviation; yes, sir.

Senator BARBOUR. And how does our heretofore service in that respect compare, in your opinion, with the same service in other countries?

Colonel LINDBERGH. It is very definitely ahead, I believe, in service.

Senator BARBOUR. Over here?

UNITED STATES SERVICE LEADS WORLD

Colonel LINDBERGH. Over here. The performance of our planes is in advance of the performance of the European planes, beginning with the American air-cooled engines and the other equipment, and the gyroscopes are the best, and it can conservatively be said that the American commercial aviation is by far the leading commercial aviation in the world today, or was.

Senator BARBOUR. For instance, Colonel, is there much night flying abroad?

Colonel LINDBERGH. Comparatively little. Most of the night flying is done in America.

Senator BARBOUR. It is a fair statement that we lead the world in airplane operation from the point of view of safety, speed, and comfort in which we transport passengers, mail, and express?

Colonel LINDBERGH. Yes; I think that is a very fair statement. Senator BARBOUR. Do you feel the policy of Postmaster General Brown in establishing these transcontinental lines which were independent in ownership and competitive in service has proven to be sound; do you think that practice by the former Postmaster General was in the interest of aviation in this country?

Colonel LINDBERGH. Senator, I do not believe I am sufficiently acquainted with the details to comment on the method. That is something I have very little knowledge of. However, from the time Postmaster General Brown went into office to the time he went out I do know that commercial aviation in the United States and particularly in mail lines greatly improved.

TESTIMONY OF CAPT. EDDIE RICKENBACKER BEFORE THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON POST OFFICES AND POST ROADS

(The prepared statement read to the committee by Captain Rickenbacker follows:)

Gentlemen, I appreciate the opportunity to appear before this committee which is considering legislation which will determine the future of what up until February 19, 1934, was the greatest and most efficient air-transport industry in the world. Such legislation, I hope, will be passed by Congress only after a thorough study of the fundamental problems of this young industry, based upon facts and figures and uninfluenced by general opinions of a few who are not qualified by experience to speak for this industry.

During the last 17 years I have been directly associated with the aviation industry, both military and commercial, and am at present vice president of North American Aviation, the parent company of Transcontinental & Western Air, Inc., Eastern Air Transport, and Western Air Express, who are noncompetitive companies. I have occupied this position since May 1, 1933, the date on which North American Aviation Co. became affiliated with General Motors Corporation.

In this connection I wish to emphasize that not until May 1, 1933, was North American Aviation in control of any air line whatever except Eastern Air Transport. The combination of North American Aviation and General Aviation on that date was made in order to consolidate the various stock interests in Transcontinental & Western Air, Inc., in order to insure that Transcontinental & Western Air would at all times be competitive from an ownership standpoint with other transcontinental air lines, which consolidation accomplished that purpose; and I can say frankly that I know of no industry in which the spirit of competition is keener than the air-transport industry has been and still is.

OUTLINES CRITICISM OF BILL

I shall attempt to outline my criticisms of the proposed Senate bill 3012 and thereafter offer recommendations for what I believe to be a constructive plan to continue the development of the industry.

(1) I feel it will be a serious mistake if the equities of the present operators of the air transport lines of this country are not recognized and given preemptive rights on the routes which they have pioneered at great expense to their stockholders.

In justice to the hundreds of thousands of stockholders who have invested their funds in these companies, based upon the faith of what they believed to be binding obligations between their respective companies and the Government, as well as the thousands of employees highly specialized in the science of aeronautics, it is my belief that the equities of the present operators must be given first consideration.

PLEADS FOR EMPLOYEES

An air line is more than just airplanes in the air. These are incidental. Any of you gentlemen who have flown over one of these air transport lines must be impressed with the fact that for every air-line operator or an airplane there are approximately six highly trained employees on the ground.

These ground employees are operators of radio stations, weather-reporting services, traffic organizations, maintenance organizations, overhaul shops; and, last but not least, there must be recognized the knowledge of these routes acquired by them through long years of experience both from the standpoint of terrain and weather.

Further, the public good will and confidence developed by these air lines on these routes cannot, at will, be transferred to another locality or replaced by new operators.

T. & W. A. alone and its predecessor companies have lost over $5,000,000 in pioneering its particular route, in addition to the present investments of millions of dollars in fixed ground equipment, which is just as much an air line on the ground as a railroad equipment makes a railroad system.

To ask any one of these companies to bid on another route is as impracticable as asking the New York Central Railroad to bid to carry mail over a route such as the Santa Fe system.

CALLS CLAUSE UNFAIR

(2) In recognizing these equities, there should also be eliminated the unfair and unjustifiable clause reading:

"No person shall be eligible to bid or hold an air-mail contract if it or its predecessor is asserting or has any claim against the United States because of a prior annulment of any contract by the Postmaster General."

I say "unfair and unjustifiable", as it is clearly at variance with ordinary business ethics that any company should be compelled to forego its right to enter a court of justice in order to obtain any contract, let alone a contract with the United States Government. Surely it is not the purpose of any Government legislation to prohibit any citizen or corporation from asserting what they believe to be their rights.

OPPOSES 3-YEAR PROVISION

(3) The provision for a contract with a maximum life of 3 years, after which air lines will come under the supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission, is impracticable. Why should not a Federal regulatory board immediately be designated to supervise the air lines, whether that board be a separate regulatory board appointed by the President or one that already exists, such as the Interstate Commerce Commission?

If this be done, as I feel it most certainly should, immediately, would this not eliminate the need of competitive bidding?

What encouragement would there be under 3-year contracts for private capital to continue in this business except the capital that might be put in by promoters with a view to unloading it on the public at the first opportunity?

FAVORS POUND-MILE BASIS

The basis of pay prescribed by Senate bill 3012 would perpetuate the impracticabilities from the standpoint of administration of a space basis of pay as established in the Watres Act. As it shall be pointed out later, a much more satisfactory basis of pay would be the pound-mile basis, which recognizes payment in relation to the task performed for the Post Office Department.

Further, the rates prescribed in this bill apparently are based upon estimates furnished by operators of equipment who are and necessarily would have to be adequately equipped to do this job at the prices specified in this bill.

Shall this industry be paid on a basis that will encourage the development of such ships as the Douglas transport, created by T. & W. A., which recently made a record run from Los Angeles to New York in 13 hours 2 minutes 20 seconds elapsed time with a full load of passengers, mail, and express, or shall it be content to have this job done by inferior, slow, single-motored equipment?

Should not a rate of pay be adopted on a pound-mile basis which will guarantee the end of subsidy and insure, for instance, the fulfillment of T. & W. A.'s contract for the purchase of $3,500,000 worth of such equipment as the Douglas airplane, which is the outstanding transport equipment in the world today?

(5) There have been recommendations made by certain people that the transcontinental system should be broken up into two or three short systems. Setting up fast transcontinental schedules will be practically impossible under such a proposed break-down of this system and costs will be increased materially, due to various types of equipment being used and unnecessary transferring of passengers, mail, and express, as well as consequent delays through the handling of this operation subject to various policies of management.

Breaking up the transcontinental system would force this industry into the uneconomical condition faced by the railroads as borne out by the task confronting the present coordinator of railroads in his attempt to work out a more economical plan.

To eliminate subsidy and still make the lines self-supporting we must continue to develop passenger and express business. When a passenger can be taken in one type of equipment over one system from coast to coast without these delays, passenger business will grow as it has during the last few years in spite of the depression.

To force a passenger to use 2 or 3 different lines, changing from one ship to another of entirely different type, will discourage passenger business and will likewise become more expensive.

This business must be encouraged in every possible way, and there is not today, nor has there ever been, any airplane, even including the T. W. A. Douglas transport, which can pay its operating costs from passenger and express revenue alone.

(6) Any officer or director who has heretofore entered into any combination to prevent the making of bids for carrying the mails is excluded from bidding on a mail contract. Certainly, from the standards of American fairness and justice, no officer or director should be deemed to have entered into any combination for the prevention of making bids before first having received a fair trial before a regular court of justice.

(7) Certainly the clause reading, "No person shall be eligible to bid for or hold an air-mail contract which has any officer or director in any holding company holding stock, directly or indirectly, in any company engaged in any phase of the aviation industry, or in any other company engaged in the manufacture or sale of airplanes, parts, or other materials or accessories generally used in air transport" is decidedly impracticable, and in my opinion will work to the detriment of this industry.

As an example, any holding company or manufacturing company by an overt act of purchasing one share of stock in a successful air-mail company could immediately disqualify that air-mail carrier as a legitimate carrier.

RECOMMENDS LEGISLATION

My recommendations for constructive legislation which will guarantee a continuance of the rapid advance which this industry has made in the last few years' operation are:

(1) The immediate creation of a Federal regulatory board to be appointed by the President to perform somewhat similar supervision and regulation of air lines as the Interstate Commerce Commission exercises over the railroads.

(2) The issuance of certificates of necessity and convenience to all air lines operating on February 19, 1934, by this Federal regulatory board.

(3) Authorizing the Postmaster General to place mail on air lines having certificates of necessity and convenience from the Federal regulatory board, at the following rates of pay:

Two mills per pound-mile up to 250 pounds average load per airplane and 1 mill per pound-mile for all loads above this amount; such payments to air lines to be charged to the general post-office appropriation for the transportation of mails. Two mills per mile is the revenue which the Government estimates it receives from postage on mail carried by airplane. Thus subsidy is eliminated at a stroke by this system of payment.

FAVORS DIRECT SUBSIDY

(4) Authorize the Federal regulatory board to pay a direct subsidy to air lines receiving a certificate of necessity and convenience who cannot exist economically under the above rates of pay, the compensation, including the direct subsidy, not to exceed 40 cents per airplane-mile for the first year and in no event to exceed the annual loss incurred by the air lines receiving such a subsidy; this subsidy payment to be reduced 5 cents each year until eliminated entirely.

(5) A reduction in rates of postage to 5 cents an ounce for air-mail letters; the authorization of air lettergrams at 3 cents and the authorization of an air-mail postcard at 2 cents.

(6) This Federal regulatory body to arbitrate rates of pay for pilots. Our policy of pilots' rate of pay recognizes that pilots are professional men. They have entrusted to their care the lives of their passengers as well as other valuable cargo. They are the captains of their ships. Rates of pay to Army pilots should not influence rates of pay to air-line pilots. They should be paid high salaries in order to attract to and keep in this profession the highest type of young manhood.

With the increased poundage which will be developed under these changes and rates of postage, I am convinced from studies which I have made that not only would all air lines which operated on February 19, 1934, be able to exist without subsidy within a relatively few years, but new routes might be added to the network of air lines which existed at that date. Further, the Post Office Department would receive an amount from stamp sales in excess of the amount paid operators for this service.

Finally, gentlemen, I recommend that no plans should be considered which might tend to place commercial aviation under the same governmental heads or bodies as military aviation.

(At the conclusion of Captain Rickenbacker's prepared statement the following occurred:)

Mr. RICKENBACKER. May I make a statement in conclusion, Mr. McKellar?

Senator MCKELLAR. Yes, sir.

Mr. RICKENBACKER. With due respect to you all, I think I have earned my heritage to citizenship in this country. I have a fundamental interest in the country's welfare far and beyond my interest in air transport or the scene of aeronautics, and to that end I believe that in fairness to our Chief Executive, who has been guided in a measure by divine spirit up until the day of the cancellations of these contracts, should, in purging this industry of so-called "undesirable elements", which has not as yet been proven, purge his official family of those traitorous elements, few in number, I presume, who have misadvised or advised without giving full facts and caused him to act contrary to American principles and American justice and judgment to such a degree that millions of people in this country have grown to the point of questioning his judgment in times when we are on the verge of pulling out from the dregs of what has been a dastardly depression and now cause again that feeling across this continent, ocean to ocean and border to border, of unproven questionable fact.

CHAIRMAN INTERRUPTS

It is not the loss of the aircraft industry or air-transport industry in this case. That is incidental. That can be wiped off the slate and forgotten. We can forget we ever owned an airplane; but it is the question of the millions who doubt in their mind as to whether what the President has so ably accomplished in the N.R.A., C.W.A., gold content, and many others than have been proven or had time to prove they are as big a mistake as cancellation of the air-mail contracts, and whether or not tomorrow C.W.A. is also questionable—

Senator MCKELLAR. Mr. Rickenbacker, I will have to ask you not to attack the President or make a political speech. Please, Mr. Rickenbacker, in justice to the commission now let us confine ourselves to this bill. We are glad to have you here, but I do not think you should make a political speech or attack the President of the United States.

Senator LOGAN. I do not think it was an attack on the President.

Mr. RICKENBACKER. I have tried not to attack the President.

Senator McKELLAR. If you have anything further to say—

Senator BARBOUR. I do not think that was an attack on the President; it was friendly and in support of him.

Mr. RICKENBACKER. It was my confidence in him which I did not wish destroyed.

Senator McKELLAR. If you have nothing further to say, we thank you.

"ARMY PLANES UNFIT; THE BOYS ARE SACRIFICED"—CAPTAIN RICKENBACKER, ACE OF ACES, PLEADS FOR LIVES OF AIRMEN—GOVERNMENT PLANES LACK NECESSARY EQUIPMENT FOR SAFETY IN FLYING THE DANGEROUS AIR-MAIL ROUTES, HE SAYS—MADE CROSS-COUNTRY HOP TO ROUSE NATION—HASTY CANCELATION OF MAIL CONTRACTS MEANS THE NEEDLESS LOSS OF LIVES OF COURAGEOUS ARMY PILOTS, CAPTAIN EDDIE DECLARES

By Capt. Eddie Rickenbacker

That there may be no misunderstanding, let me say at the start that I am vice president of North American Aviation, Inc., and am interested primarily in the development of the aviation industry in the United States.

But over and above any such personal consideration, I feel an obligation to the youth of this country, because I came out of the World War with a new title as a result of this new instrument of transportation.

I am by way of being a daddy to these unprepared, rosy-cheeked youngsters, upon whose willing shoulders the flying of the air mail has been dumped overnight, because of my experience in the war and title of "Ace of Aces."

And far more important than that the carrying of the air mail be returned to those air lines qualified for the operation of this service is the paramount necessity of avoiding further sacrifice of lives—in what I have termed, not without bitterness, "legalized murder."

Many of my Army friends have judged me hastily upon hearing those words, but it was for their benefit that they were uttered.

We know beyond dispute that successful operation of air lines is born of knowledge gained through experience, and that cannot come over night. Yet over night they suddenly dumped this job on the Army flyers.

LEGALIZED MURDER

And when three lives as suddenly were lost I grew very bitter at this decision to switch from competent commercial lines to comparatively untried boys. I saw my own sons in the place of these boys—brave, confident, but too young, too inexperienced in the air for this task, lacking the equipment of planes and maintenance, radio and meteorological facilities, which constitute far more than half the battle—and I hoped to prevent, through my criticism of legalized murder the possibility of further sacrifices.

When first I heard of the extraordinary, possibly hasty, decision to cancel all air-mail contracts, our subsidiary, Transcontinental & Western Airways, had a new Douglas monoplane ready for air-mail and passenger service.

The ship, which cost $360,000 before it ever carried a pay passenger, was at Glendale Airport, ready to be brought East this coming week.

But when the crash came and the unexpected, the impossible-to-believe, occurred we decided that the simplest, the most direct way to bring to the public's attention the progress we had made—and to furnish a striking comparison with what was to come when the Army took over—was to take the last load of mail eastward in the new ship.

LAST ROUND-UP

We hoped to be able to bring forcibly to the attention of the Nation and of the world what we had accomplished through years of endeavor and the unbounded confidence of the men in our organization.

So we flew the "last round-up", and the success of our flight was as striking as we had hoped.

The ship in which we made our 13-hour dash from Los Angeles to Newark over, under, and through the worst storm since 1888, which since has buried the eastern cities along our route, is a low-wing, twin-motor monoplane, built by the Douglas Aircraft Corporation to our specifications.

It is one of a proposed fleet of 41, the others contracted for at a cost of approximately $80,000 each. No one ever paid that price for that number of ships. The reason my company paid it is because we pay for performance and safety.

The ship's twin motors are capable of developing 700 horsepower each at 8,000 feet. It carries 14 passengers and 1,000 pounds of mail and has a cruising range of 1,000 miles.

This last is fundamental in air transit today. You can always reach good weather within this range.

Now, the new plane, the one which has been flying over Washington the last few days, has five special features which help make it the greatest of its kind ever built. These are:

1. Retractable landing gear.
2. Variable-pitch propellers, which give maximum efficiency.
3. The Sperry automatic pilot, which actually flew the ship 90 percent of the way from Los Angeles to Newark.

4. Engine supercharged to 8,000 feet, resulting in high performance at stratosphere altitudes.

5. Air brakes on the wings.

All these features are new and necessary for the pilot to know about. Moreover, the instrument board of this new ship is like the switchboard of the Edison Electric Light Co., seemingly complicated beyond reason, yet simple as A B C to air-line pilots of experience.

MUST HAVE LONG RECORD

By way of comparison with the Army flyers, most of them young first and second lieutenants with but a few hundred hours in the air, none of the pilots of Transcontinental & Western has less than 4,000 hours to his credit. A copilot must have a minimum of 1,200 hours, and he then works for us from 1 to 3 years before becoming qualified to be a pilot.

We have six pilots who have more than 1,000,000 miles or 10,000 hours to their credit.

A feature of the new ship is its commodious comfort; a 6-foot man can stand erect with his hat on or stretch at perfect ease in the reclining chairs. The cabin is insulated and soundproof, quieter than a Pullman car, due to the rubber mountings of engines, cabin, and chairs.

It is steam heated, with positive thermostatic control. When the temperature outside was 35° below zero, on the flight eastward, we sat in perfect comfort, although the windows were frozen over. An average temperature of 72° was maintained.

This ship is the closest to a stratosphere plane yet developed, as it has a ceiling of 30,000 feet with full load, and cruises efficiently at 20,000 feet. Next we will have one with the cabin hermetically sealed. And if I were to predict what I believe we will be doing in the way of flying 5 years from now the alienists would be on my trail.

I may say, however, that I am honored to have been one of the first to visualize the possibilities of the new ship.

There she sat, at Glendale Airport, trim and ready for the "last round-up", when I arrived on the Friday morning before the flight. I immediately set about checking the weather.

Our take-off was set for 8.45 p.m. Sunday, February 18, since no one else could leave later than that hour and get into Newark before the deadline of midnight Monday, when the Army took over.

Reports about the gathering storms in the East were not encouraging to say the least.

FACED BAD WEATHER

We figured on 15 hours elapsed time from coast to coast, and our eastern meteorological experts advised us that with that schedule we would encounter a low ceiling and squalls at Columbus, Ohio, and that we would be unable to get into Newark at all 20 minutes after the expiration of the 15 hours.

I was strongly urged to leave Sunday morning, but that wouldn't have made it actually the "last round-up" of the mail.

Messages from the East said: "It is too hazardous. Wait until the following day."

But after our western weather experts had checked their observations and calculations, together with those of the East, I said, "No. We'll go through on schedule."

Our actual take-off from Glendale Airport was at 8:56 p.m. Sunday. In addition to six newspapermen, we had aboard Jack Frye, vice president in charge of operations of T.W.A. and one of its crack pilots, and Paul Richter, western division superintendent, also an expert flyer.

As a matter of fact, the automatic pilot flew the ship most of the way to Albuquerque, where we clicked on schedule in a little more than 3 hours, and everyone had a stretch while several hundred gallons of gas were taken on. The maintenance work was as perfectly timed as the ship's performance, and in 8 minutes we were off again, over the mountains to Kansas City, greeting the dawn of a new day, the last day of our air-mail service for some time to come.

We followed the radio beam, the latest directional aid to flying, and I could not help but marvel at the extraordinary sensitiveness of the automatic pilot, whose uncanny precision smoothed out every air bump and kept us dead on our course.

At daybreak we were in Kansas City, where there was another brief pause of 14 minutes, to check again the weather reports and hear once more of bad weather over Columbus and the gathering, truly mountainous storms farther to the east.

At Kansas City we left behind Richter and took aboard Larry Fritz, eastern division superintendent, another of our most skillful pilots.

EXPERTS IN RADIO

It will be noted that while we were in constant two-way radio communication throughout the flight, we needed no special radio technician. All T.W.A. pilots must be experts in radio, weather, and the mechanics of their planes. They are a marvelously self-disciplined group of men.

As a matter of fact, modern flying is the most skilled profession I know of, and it will grow more so with each new development.

Our take-off from Kansas City was into the sunrise, a greeting from the Atlantic toward which we were hurrying. Already, thanks to the perfection of the ship and the complete cooperation of the ground forces, we were well ahead of schedule. I was well satisfied to know this, for the storm heading for Newark was increasing each hour.

The first storm we encountered was over Illinois, and of about 100 miles duration. We merely set the adjustable propeller, the supercharger did its stuff in feeding the motors, and we went over the blizzard at 14,000 feet.

Arriving at Columbus, we found conditions exactly as our weather man had predicted—2 days before. There was a low ceiling, and the squalls were really more of a blizzard than anything else. But we got in and out without the slightest difficulty, despite the high wind, refueling and wasting 10 minutes so that the boys could have something hot to eat.

With the development of fireless cooking, we'll do all our eating on board.

AT STORM'S TAIL

We took off at the tail end of the storm, which was shortly to bury the East, paralyzing all ground traffic. It couldn't stop our ship. We set the automatic pilot to his task and started climbing on the radio beam. Up, up we went until it seemed that storm simply had no top anywhere. But we found it at 18,500 feet, or around $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles, and came out into the sunshine.

We kept on climbing to 19,500 feet, at which point some in the cabin were noticing the effects of the extreme altitude, particularly if they attempted to move about, so I ordered a few breaths of oxygen all around. A dozen whiffs each, and everyone felt a new man, and, north of Harrisburg, Pa., we started down through the storm at 280 miles an hour.

In this connection, I want to say that aviation experts, after hearing of our flight, thought we must have been "wide open" and asked how we kept from burning out our motors.

Actually, we used less than 75 percent of our available maximum horsepower.

About 50 miles from Newark we came out of the storm, and there we found an 1,800-foot ceiling, just as predicted. Ten miles from our goal, newsreel photographers, in a low-wing Lockheed, flew out to meet us to record our arrival. We wobbled our wings to be sure they would spot us, but their effort was in vain. For so great was our speed that before the Lockheed could turn and catch up with us we had landed and stopped, even before it approached the field.

GROUND WORK ESSENTIAL

We had made the transcontinental flight—our "last round-up" of the air mail—in 13 hours 2 minutes and 20 seconds.

Now, a point I would like to make in connection with this decisive demonstration of our efficiency is that the flight of the ship itself is comparatively the simplest feature of the performance.

It is the groundwork, the mapping of routes, the making of charts, the uncannily accurate weather forecasts, the cooperation of radio and maintenance that makes successful air-mail flying possible.

Take, as an example, the work of our weather experts on this flight. They had told us that if we took off on a 15-hour flight we would beat the storm to Newark by only 20 minutes.

As it turned out we were approximately 2 hours ahead of schedule. And we'd been at Newark just 2 hours and 20 minutes before that storm closed in, and there was no more flying for anyone that day.

Our weather experts were never more than 5 minutes off in their forecasts at any stage of the flight, and these predictions had been made for us more than 48 hours earlier.

The flight showed, as I have said, that success is born of knowledge gained by experience. It is no overnight proposition.

URGES AIR BOARD

Would it be consistent to take a cub reporter and put him at the head of a great newspaper? Or to put a young bond salesman in charge of the stock exchange? Or a young Congressman just feeling his first thrill of long words and make him President? At least, would one expect him to succeed for the benefit of the great majority?

I believe that what should be done now is to appoint a board or committee of men of experience, who have given years of effort to the aircraft industry and to their country—men of unquestionable integrity, who have the confidence of the public and the President, and who have no political axes to grind or personal motives to further—to correct evils, if there are any, that may exist in order that this Nation may continue to boast of the greatest air service in the world.

Fourth or fifth in the scale of military aviation, we are far ahead of all the other nations combined in commercial aviation. We did fly more miles, day and night, with commercial lines than all the rest of the world combined.

We are accused of being an industry of subsidy. Why, we get only $14,000,000 a year, and the Government gets seven or eight millions back in stamp revenue. Compare that with what the Army and Navy get for their organizations and what has been accomplished, comparatively.

FOR NATIONAL PROGRESS

For one thing, every large nation in the world tried to buy this Douglas plane which just achieved its record-breaking transcontinental flight. They couldn't do so, for it was our plane, planned and paid for by us.

Instead of the Government subsidizing the air-transport industry, it is subsidizing the Government. For if you took the engineering and technical fraternity and paid the price of keeping them apace with progress, if you took the administrative and maintenance personnel, the radio, meteorological and airport personnel, and the pilots, and paid the price of keeping them apace with progress and charged that to the Government, it would cost Uncle Sam $150,000,000 to $200,000,000 yearly.

However, to my mind, it isn't the destruction of the aircraft industry or the throwing out of work of 7,000 men, with 50,000 others affected incidentally, that is the principal tragedy of the cancellation of our contracts.

Rather, it is the loss of confidence by our great Government and President in what has been accomplished, that which time has not had an opportunity to prove.

[From the New York Times, Mar. 19, 1934]

THE WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE

Apparently the Senate subcommittee did not know the kind of testimony it would get from the three air-mail experts whom it summoned. The first of these, Colonel Lindbergh, was as fine a witness as one could find, searching the whole world over. Quiet and competent, he testified only to what he knew, putting aside questions which were either irrelevant or beyond the range of his personal knowledge and experience. Those Senators who hoped to win his approval of the new air-mail bill which they are pressing found it impossible to shake him in his opposition to some of its important clauses. In the matter of the original cancellation of the air-mail contracts he remained firm in his conviction that a great injustice had been done, with consequent injury to commercial aviation which it may take a long time to repair. In substantial agreement with him were the two other famous flyers, Chamberlin and Captain Rickenbacker. The latter left the Senators quite aghast by the frankness with which he condemned those who had so unfortunately given the President bad advice.

All three of these witnesses protested that they had no wish to excuse or shelter any man who might have resorted to fraudulent methods in securing an air-mail contract. If any were guilty, let them be punished to the full extent of the law. But let them be proved guilty before being condemned. Above all, let not the companies against which no collusion has been even charged be lumped with the few that may be under suspicion. All the evidence thus far given is to the effect that Army pilots had not been trained to carry transcontinental mail, were therefore not fitted to do the work, and should never have been called upon to undertake it.

What the country plainly desires and what the administration is now anxious to bring about is the speediest possible restoration of carrying the mails to the private companies which have developed the necessary technical skill. Complaints are numerous, particularly from the far West, about the disruption of the Mail Service, which had come to be a great modern convenience. If the Senate and the Post Office Department are alert to this popular demand, they will make haste to find a way out of the sad muddle which followed the Executive order of February 9.

[From the Washington Herald, Mar. 19, 1934]

LINDY MERITS PRAISE

Well done, Lindy.

This is the country's verdict on Colonel Lindbergh's voluntary appearance before the Senate Post Office Committee and on his lucid, straightforward, and manly replies to the questions addressed to him.

It was a Lindbergh day.

The largest room in the Senate Office Building was chosen for the hearing, as it was safely assumed that the appearance of America's super ace, the foremost flyer in the world, would stir great public interest.

His inquisitors were Senate politicians who are trying to pull the administration out of a bad hole. Like politicians, these Senators feel that the best way out of a blunder is never to admit it. Realizing that the civil aviation companies have been condemned without a hearing, the administration Senators are trying to make it appear that the companies were not entitled to a hearing.

They are trying to build the uncorrected injustice of such treatment into disabling conditions affecting the established companies as bidders under the new contracts, proposed in substitution for the old, which were canceled without inquiry, examination, or trial.

An American of the Lindbergh type naturally will not be a party to such a scheme.

"I feel that these charges", said he, "should have been definitely established before these contracts were canceled. I feel it was the right of my companies, the public, and my own right to have them definitely established."

"I say this only in the interest of what I most deeply believe to be right."

These words express the opinion of every right-thinking American. What else could be the opinion of a right-thinking man?

Referring to the provision of the proposed new legislation prohibiting operators whose contracts were thus unfairly annulled from bidding on new contracts unless they waived any claims against the Government, Colonel Lindbergh called it the most "unjust act ever placed into American legislation."

It is refreshing and invigorating when a man of such captivating type as Colonel Lindbergh, of so distinguished a record of valor and achievement, thus gives voice in ringing and forthright speech to the feelings of his countrymen.

But there is more to it than the feeling of approval it inspires. Here is the note of true leadership.

The gallant flying record, the simplicity and modesty that won our hearts, the thrilling exploits which have drawn the homage of the world, are apparently only a part of "Lindy."

There is a maturing man in his young head and breast.

The physical and moral courage of the youthful aviator is passing into a finer and perhaps a rarer courage—the courage of the fearless and high-minded citizen.

Such a man has great tasks ahead of him—rich possibilities of service to his country.

[Editorial from the Iola Daily Register, Iola, Kans., Tuesday, Feb. 20, 1934]

DESPOTIC INJUSTICE

As more and more facts concerning the air-mail situation are brought to light the conclusion becomes more and more irresistible that the order of the Postmaster General annulling all contracts hitherto in existing for carrying the air mail was an act of sheer despotism without any justification whatever, an act which convicted men of criminal conduct and bitterly punished them without having given them any hearing at all.

Let us consider, as a fair example, the facts with relation to the Transcontinental & Western Air, Inc., the great concern which had the contract for carrying the mail between New York and San Francisco. These facts are derived from a letter written by Mr. Richard W. Robbins, president of the company, to the Postmaster General.

The Postmaster General charges that this company obtained its contract by collusion. The facts are that the company obtained its contract on a competitive bidding, based on a public advertisement, without collusion with anybody.

The Postmaster General charges that there was a clandestine conference held in May and June of 1930. The facts are that representatives of every company that could qualify under the act of Congress in compliance with which the contract was let were present, as well as several who were not qualified, and the meeting was fully reported the next day in the press, and the then Postmaster General who is accused of having arranged this clandestine meeting issued a release to the press fully covering the meeting.

The Postmaster General charges that there was a conspiracy among the operators of the air routes to parcel out the air-mail map. The record shows that the meeting at which this alleged conspiracy was formed was called by the then Postmaster General and not by the operators; that instead of agreeing among themselves the operators disagreed; and that legal questions were raised by the operators as to the power of the Postmaster General which were referred to the Comptroller General, and that it was not until his ruling was made that the Postmaster General advertised for competitive bids.

Another point stressed by the Postmaster General is that air-mail contractors have made inordinate profits. The record shows that the T. & W. A. Co. has lost since October 1930, when this contract was made, over $1,250,000. In this connection the president of the company calls attention to a report published by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of the House of Representatives to the effect that the Government receives 2 mills per pound-mile by way of extra postage paid for air mail, and offers to have his contract changed so that his company will carry the mail for just that 2 mills, and thus receive no subsidy at all.

These are only a few instances in which it is proved conclusively that the charges made by Postmaster General Farley are directly contrary to the facts.

How much better it would have been for him, how much more to his credit as an American official, if he had given this company its day in court, had allowed it to be heard before he condemned and executed it.

It certainly is not in keeping with the established processes of this Government for one of its officials to make an arbitrary order which will deprive thousands of men of employment and in all likelihood will destroy the value of property in which millions of dollars are invested, without an orderly and legal hearing for anybody, without any judicial procedure whatever, without a record made of evidence showing just what crime had been committed, by whom committed, and to what extent damage has been done.

Later: Kansas City papers of this date report that the entire personnel of the Transcontinental & Western Air Corporation, 750 persons, have been furloughed as of February 28.

COMMERCIAL AIR SERVICE NEEDED

In the last 6 days 5 Army air pilots have lost their lives in connection with the Government's new Air Mail Service, and 2 others have been seriously injured. The significance of these distressing disasters should not be overemphasized. The fact that the new service was inaugurated under weather conditions extraordinarily unfavorable for air movements is a coincidence that must be taken into account. But these tragedies do accentuate the fact that the Army flyers are not trained or equipped to provide the service that has been developed by the commercial lines.

The Army flyers are trained for military purposes, and properly so. That is why they exist. Such training is concerned primarily with military maneuvers of many kinds and with various services of dispatch. Safety is not a first consideration in any military movements. While there are some of the most skillful and brilliant pilots in the Army to be found anywhere, the skill called for in this service is of a different order from that necessary in commercial service. Moreover, it is a constant complaint of the Army Air Service that pilots as a rule get too few hours in the air, and therefore do not get the same practice as the commercial pilots. The latter are in continuous service. Their business is to pilot planes along fixed routes to fixed destinations. Naturally they acquire an acquaintance with their routes, with all its varying topography and the vagaries of its atmospheric conditions. They have learned to fly with almost unerring skill through fog or storm to their terminal ports. Safety is their primary consideration. Carrying passengers, as well as mail and express, their responsibility for safe delivery is great. Moreover, the planes that have been developed for commercial flying are much superior for their purposes to those of the Army, which are designed for other purposes. It is too much to expect that the Army flyers, however courageous and resolute, as they undoubtedly are, can carry on the mail service in planes not built for such use, with the efficiency or the safety that characterizes the service of the commercial flyers.

In taking over the Air Mail Service, the Government is undertaking to cover less than half the mileage of the commercial service. This involves the abandonment, temporary or permanent, of many routes, some of them of great importance, as St. Louis has reason to know, since much of the most valued service from here has been cut off. That it costs, or will cost, the Government a great deal more than it paid out for the commercial service even at the rates now so severely criticized, is beyond doubt; Mr. MEAD, Chairman of the House Committee on Post Offices, whose committee has charge of all legislation affecting the mails, says it will cost more than twice as much. Furthermore, with the Government carrying the mail and the commercial operators carrying passengers and express, both losing money, there is wholly unnecessary duplication of services that is economic folly.

The sooner the Government abandons the effort to carry the mails with its own forces and equipment, the better it will be for all concerned; better in particular for the public, which has found the Air Mail Service increasingly valuable and has become more and more air-minded. The mail should be returned to private carriers on any terms that appear sound and just, and it is encouraging to learn that Mr. MEAD's committee has framed a new law which will give the concerns whose contracts were recently canceled opportunity to obtain new contracts. Most of these companies have invested large sums in airports and equipment, and are therefore better provided with the means of efficient service than any others could be without equal expenditures of money and time. If any of the officers of these concerns have done wrong in the past, they ought to be punished; but the country, the taxpayers, and the Army should not be punished. These officials should be held liable if guilty and proven guilty of illegal conduct, but the service should not be broken down to get at them. The commercial air service as a whole and as a unit—that is to say, as a carrier of passengers, mail, and express—should go on, and it is necessary to go on, for it is an essential service the country cannot afford to lose.

THE PRESIDENT RESENTFUL?

President Roosevelt, like General Johnson, apparently resented the insistence of the newspapers that a freedom-of-the-press clause be included in the newspaper code.

In approving the code, including the free-press provision, the President was guilty of the same sort of seeming vindictiveness that marked the White House reply to Lindbergh's protest against the blanket cancellation of air-mail contracts.

Lindbergh was branded as a publicity seeker. The newspapers, by inference, were branded as operating fire traps, publishing indecencies, and exploiting child labor. The language of the President was:

"The recitation of the freedom-of-the-press clause in the code has no more place here than would be the recitation of the whole Constitution or of the Ten Commandments."

"The freedom guaranteed by the Constitution is freedom of expression and that will be scrupulously respected—but it is not freedom to work children, or do business in a fire trap, or violate the laws against obscenity, libel, and lewdness."

The best comment on this that we have seen appeared in the Hearst papers, which supported the President both for the Democratic nomination and for election. It follows in part:

"The plain and obvious facts are that no publisher has expressed any desire to print in a fire trap. Moreover, State and city laws and ordinances would prevent him from doing it if he did wish to do so."

"Furthermore, no publisher does print or has expressed any desire to print indecencies—and even if any depraved publisher did want to print them, the Federal and State laws and city ordinances are quite sufficient to prevent him from doing so, and to land him in jail if he did so."

"And insofar as child labor is concerned, the Hearst papers and the greater part of the papers of the United States had been crusading for the abolition of child labor long before Mr. Roosevelt was of age; and certainly during the many years that he was in politics, without identifying himself conspicuously with that measure."

"What the publishers throughout the country are concerned about and have been fighting for is the preservation of their constitutional rights of press freedom—freedom from governmental control; freedom to print the news fully and fairly without Government restriction; freedom to express in their columns their own opinions and the opinions of citizens generally, regardless of whether those opinions support the proceedings of the Government or oppose the acts and objectives of the Government.

"The publishers of the country will not relinquish any fraction of that guaranteed constitutional right for a free press, and they have made that fight more in the interest of the public than in their own interest.

"They made it for the perpetuation of the Republic and for the preservation of essential democracy.

"There can be no popular government without a free press to spread widely the necessary unbiased information to enable the public to decide wisely in public affairs and for the public welfare.

"The Mussolinis, the Hitlers, the Lenins, and all of those who seek to establish a dictatorial form of government always begin by repressing the press; because nothing is so fatal to their plans and ambitions as general public knowledge of their purposes and proceedings, which free publication affords.

"It is not conceivable that Mr. Roosevelt has any idea of establishing a permanent personal government of the Mussolini and Hitler type.

"But some of his aides, such as Mr. Richberg, have expressed revolutionary sentiments; and General Johnson himself has gnashed his teeth and stamped his feet and issued ukases to the newspapers in the customary dictatorial military manner.

"The patriotic purpose of the publishers has been to permit no doubt or question of the preservation of the constitutional right of free publication to arise.

"And in making this fight for the freedom of the press they have made the fight for the freedom of the Nation."

SENSELESS BUTCHERY—AND ALL DUE TO POLITICS

The senseless butchery of young Army aviators through the hasty order assigning them to fly the mails must stop.

As this is written, five have paid with their lives for what can only be regarded as a political maneuver.

No doubt more will have paid by the time these lines are printed.

The people of the United States will not tolerate this needless massacre.

No people, anywhere, would.

You may think it strange that the Army has had so many accidents in the brief time that it has been flying the mails, whereas the regular air-mail pilots had few.

The miracle is, however, that the Army has not had more accidents considering the conditions under which it has been forced to fly.

Its planes are absolutely unsuited to the work. They are too light. They lack the necessary radio equipment and other devices essential for this type of flying. They have open cockpits instead of warm, closed cabins.

The Army's men are trained in formation flying, in pursuit, attack, and bombing. They are not familiar with the long mail routes nor the weather conditions along them.

Commercial pilots, on the other hand, get a year of special training along these routes before they are allowed to go it alone.

And they are allowed more discretion in making flights while in the Army "orders are orders" under all circumstances.

"Why did the Government do it?" asked the mother of Lieutenant Lowry when she learned that her son had been killed in his gallant attempt to achieve the impossible.

That question is being asked today by every man and woman in the land. Why did the Government do it, and why doesn't the Government stop it? How much longer is this awful sacrifice to politics to go on?

AIR LINES SUSPECT CONTRACTS WERE VOIDED TO OPEN UP NEW FIELDS OF PATRONAGE—CRITICS NOTE VIRTUAL IMMUNITY TO ONE OF BIG FOUR SYSTEMS FRIENDLY TO ROOSEVELT REGIME—UNASSAILED COMPANY TOOK PRESIDENT, AS NOMINEE, TO CHICAGO CONVENTION, WAS HOST TO POSTMASTER GENERAL ON JUNKET TO TEXAS, AND IT SERVES THE DEMOCRATIC SOUTH AND SOUTHWEST

By C. B. Allen

An aviation industry that was stunned by the Government's summary cancellation of all domestic air-mail contracts 2 weeks ago now finds itself groping through a fog of uncertainty for the real reasons behind this drastic move. Many who hitherto have trusted implicitly in President Franklin D. Roosevelt's sense of fair play and his enlightened attitude regarding the whole science of aeronautics, are beginning to waver in that faith as they find it assailed by certain facts and questions difficult to ignore.

Fundamentally, these doubts in aviation circles resolved themselves into the single query of whether Postmaster General James A. Farley was permitted to scrap the entire air-mail set-up for the public good or simply for the purpose of breaking this particular patronage oyster wide open, and dishing out the heart of it, not to the groups that have made America's air transportation a model for the rest of the world, but to those who have played along with the present administration.

Developments in Washington following cancellation of the contracts have heightened rather than allayed the industry's concern on this score. Congress has put forward the naive suggestion and embodied it in projected legislation which is hailed as an administration measure, that the erstwhile air-mail carriers whose contracts were canceled because of fraud and collusion, be absolved (by special amendment to the law of 1872 under which the Post Office Department abrogated its agreement with them) of the penalty accompanying this stigma—which is debarment from the right to bid on any mail contracts for a period of 5 years—"provided they can show to the satisfaction of the courts or the Post Office Department that their hands were clean."

PROPOSALS PUZZLE INDUSTRY

What a dazed aviation industry cannot understand is why, if the air lines that formerly carried the mail can show to the satisfaction of the courts or the Post Office Department that they were above reproach in obtaining their contracts, these should not be restored to them forthwith or why they should be exposed to the further jeopardy of being compelled to bid in the open market against competitors with no investment at stake, on franchises in which they possess an obvious pioneer equity. Conversely, it is equally beyond comprehension of the industry's rank and file how any air line that might be found after a fair hearing to have been guilty of crooked practices, can be purged by act of Congress and welcomed back to the Government fold.

Another matter about which there is a growing tide of comment, now the industry has recovered from the first shock of the disaster that has befallen it, is the apparent favoritism which has characterized the air-mail investigation directed by Senator Hugo L. Black, of Alabama. Even those who could not conceivably be charged with a selfish interest are beginning to ask why only three of the Big Four among the country's domestic air-line operators have been singled out for spectacular allegations and implications as well as grueling cross-examination in Senator Black's committee. It is especially pertinent because the line which, thus far, has enjoyed virtual immunity from Mr. Black, has long been known as the least defensible (on the basis of payment received from the Post Office Department and volume of mail carried) of the large systems comprising America's recently curtailed air-mail map.

STATISTICS INDICATE EFFICIENCY

In the eyes of these observers it is a singular, if not a sinister, coincidence that United Air Lines and Transcontinental & Western Air, Inc.—the two groups that have borne the brunt of Senator Black's attention—consistently have been doing the best job for the Government, if service rendered for payments received is any criterion. These companies contend, with the Post Office Department's own statistics to prove their point, that postage returns from their mail cargoes in recent months have equaled and, on certain heavy-traffic runs, far exceeded the subsidy paid to them for carrying the mail. As the entire Post Office Department operates at a tremendous yearly deficit, this is a showing for which these two air lines insist they might seem to merit a little praise rather than such wholesale damning.

"But", says some one, "what the President apparently has in mind is to wipe out existing contracts and start all over again, forcing certain of the big systems perhaps to purge themselves in the public mind by a complete reorganization, but giving them an equal chance with everybody else. Could anything be fairer than that?"

HUGE INVESTMENTS AT STAKE

Anyone who stops for a moment to consider the facts quickly will discern the speciousness of such reasoning, despite its plausibility. For this logic fails to take into account the hundreds of thousands of dollars that lines like United and T.W.A. have invested in radio ground stations, weather-reporting facilities, airport development, hangars, machine shops, etc.—all on the reasonable assumption that if they did their mail-carrying job well they would continue to have the Post Office Department as a guaranteed customer over a period of years.

Also it ignores the fact that United, a year ago, and T.W.A., within the last few weeks, each committed itself to a three to four million dollar new equipment program so that mail and passengers might cross the continent in 16 to 20 hours rather than 24 to 28. Their competitors, on the other hand—if the start-all-over-again program goes through—because of inferior planes, fewer safeguards, and a smaller pilots' pay roll (due both to lower salaries and the fact that these rival operators send out a single pilot in charge of a trimotor airplane, whereas United and T.W.A. require both pilot and copilot on such craft)—have everything to gain and practically nothing to lose. It is asserted that most of the weak-sister lines over which mail was flown in the past were bound for the scrap heap anyway, through lack of economic justification, and their operators doubtless were itching for a chance at the cream routes on which they long had had covetous eyes.

FELT FEAR OVER PROGRESS

That, for their type of operation, they could underbid the present operators of these runs, with their many safeguards and ultra-modern planes, seems fairly certain. Basically, the only question at stake is whether America is going forward or backward in commercial aviation; it is an issue on which the public should be neither confused nor misled, and the decision is one that must be made by the present administration. This is not to say that any operator or group of operators is indispensable, but that there is a definite choice between types of operation to be sponsored by the Government through the letting of air-mail contracts. Not so much, perhaps, because of the issues touched upon thus far by the Black committee as because of those left untouched, some observers in the aviation industry are attaching new and possibly unwarranted significance to a series of incidents having to do with the air-mindedness of the current regime at Washington. They stress the fact that the same air line placed a big Wasp-motored Ford at the disposal of Mr. Roosevelt for his dramatic trip to Chicago after his nomination, carried Postmaster General Farley and his friends on their famous political junket to Texas and (so far, at least) has gone unscathed in having the activities of its officials aired before the Senate air-mail investigating committee. Also, that a former official of this line resigned a much more lucrative position to become one of Mr. Farley's assistant postmasters general soon after the new deal hit Washington.

That lack of excellent headline material concerning this particular system is in the hands of Senator Black seems scarcely conceivable. The Post Office Department's own records disclose that it received three times as much air-mail route mileage as any other operator under the extensions that have so aroused the investigator from Alabama as evidence of graft and collusion under former Postmaster General Walter F. Brown. They further show that the Government has been paying to this system more than twice as much a pound of mail carried as it paid to a certain other system that was thoroughly pilloried by Mr. BLACK for the profits it has been taking out of the postal budget.

One glance at the air-mail map of a week ago, however, will show that many of this company's routes, maintained at a tremendous loss to the Post Office Department, served the Democratic South and Southwest. Which may or may not account for the fact that nothing was done about discontinuing them as non-essential to the country's industry and commerce in accordance with recommendations made more than a year ago and later embodied in the so-called "Mead committee report" to the House of Representatives.

LET US HASTEN TO RECTIFY AN INEXCUSABLE MISTAKE

The unfortunate mistake of the administration in its summary disruption of the American aviation industry becomes more distressing with each day that passes.

Attempts by various spokesmen to justify the Government's action have, without exception, proved to be unconvincing pleas in exculpation—not justification in any sense of the word. They merely reveal the extent of the complications in which the Government is involved because of its hasty and ill-considered action, and confirm the adverse judgment on the incident which is well-nigh universal.

The new deal has been welcomed in most of its processes and provisions, but there are some innovations which the American people will never adopt.

And one is the condemnation of a man—any man—without trial or even formal accusation.

This is precisely what the Government is guilty of in its headlong cancellation of the air-mail contracts.

There may have been collusion in the making of them, but it has not been shown.

They may be permeated with fraud, but it has not been proved. And yet nevertheless and despite this trampling under of common right, judgment has been entered. Sentence has been pronounced.

The supposedly guilty and the admittedly innocent have alike been struck down by a high-handed Government which refuses to permit its conduct to be reviewed by its own courts, and is indifferent to the charge of injustice proceeding from its own citizens.

It is a distressing spectacle indeed. It fills every right-minded American with sorrow. It inspires everyone obliged to transact business with the Government with a feeling of dread and insecurity.

Not only on these major grounds of basic principle is the Government's action incomprehensible, but also in the light of its practical results.

The administration has leaped to the destruction of a great American industry as if nothing short of destruction would satisfy it, an industry which the country was justly proud. Commercial aviation in the United States led the world, and was an object of envy as well as admiration throughout the world.

The administration, by its ruthless action, threw out of legitimate employment thousands of good, self-respecting, and self-supporting citizens.

It became a party to the sacrifice of devoted Army flyers, without the experience or special training requisite for the hazardous service they were suddenly ordered to undertake, and who have already paid with their lives for their Government's folly.

This folly takes on a darker hue when it is borne in mind that the Army planes are admittedly without the necessary equipment which experience has shown to be indispensable in overcoming the risks of the Air Mail Service.

The probability of these tragic results was clearly foreseen by Eddie Rickenbacker, the great flying ace, who has done so much for the prestige and marvelous development of commercial aviation in the United States.

Voicing a sincere tribute to the Army flyers—their instant courage and high sense of duty—Mr. Rickenbacker did not hesitate to denounce as unreasonable the risks which the Army aviators were asked to face and assume. Trained for an entirely different type of flying, they were compelled to take over an unfamiliar service, for which the Army airplanes are wholly unsuited in design and deficient in necessary equipment.

"While I have every respect", said Rickenbacker, "for the ability of these men to fly, still they haven't the experience or equipment necessary to fly the mails. Most of them are just kids fresh out of Kelly Field, with perhaps 400 hours of experience."

"I fear for the future."

The fatalities which promptly accompanied the Army's switch into the mail service he branded as "legalized murder."

And such it is.

Let us hope that the Government will soon reverse its hasty action and rectify its incomprehensible error.

THE AIR-MAIL INQUIRY

Postmaster General Farley's announcement that the Government is willing for a full and complete open investigation of the action of his Department in summarily canceling the air-mail contracts and wrecking the air service of the country is timely.

We believe the Postmaster General could in fairness hardly do less.

Whether the Government was justified or not in its effort to wreck the air-mail companies of the Nation would, at this distance, seem to depend upon the sufficiency of the evidence which the Government can produce to show fraud.

The public knows nothing of the facts. These air companies were lined up against the wall by a one-sided court-martial proceedings, and the execution followed.

On the one side the present Postmaster General, Mr. Farley, says there was fraud, and the Government can prove it. On the other, former Postmaster General Brown says there was no fraud; that the Government merely followed a policy openly established by Congress to promote the interest of commercial aviation and to strengthen the air reserve forces of the Nation.

No one wants to see fraud perpetrated upon the Government. A high standard of honesty is demanded. But we believe there is a growing feeling, at least among a few people, that it is not quite fair to destroy millions in property values, wrecking business reputations, and then when an impartial inquiry is asked, even by such a man as Colonel Lindbergh, to demand the request as a publicity stunt and plainly intimate that anyone who questions the action of the Government is guilty of treason.

The Government cannot accuse the air transit companies of grave and reprehensible crimes and at the same time deny them a fair trial before the public tribunal.

To demand such a hearing by those who have been gravely injured is not a publicity stunt. It is justice and fair play. Let's have it.

[From the New York Sun, Mar. 5, 1934]

POLITICS SEEN IN AIR-MAIL ACTION

Cancellation of the air transport lines' mail contracts is but a wholesale plan for "redistribution of contract favors under the 'right' party", Frank A. Tichenor says in the issue of Aero Digest, out today.

The aviation authority is scathing in his denunciation of the administration's action in abrogating the air-mail contracts without trial. He also points out in his article that he forecast about a year ago the possibility of the air mail being passed back to Army flyers.

Launching into an attack on the cancellation action, which it is held is wrecking the commercial aviation structure at the rate of a million dollars a month, he calls the devastating action a play for patronage, making a political football of the air mail.

He states that the cancellation, "we are told, was necessitated purely and simply by the manner and method of making the Government contracts", and then challenges "the motives, reasons, and capabilities of those now responsible for the Nation's present aviation policy."

"The new deal", he writes, "has swept into the discard those Government officials who were representatives of the people in the making of the contracts."

"If Government employees and advisers were participants in what is now objected to, it would seem altogether fitting and proper to inquire into the motives, reasons, and capabilities of those now responsible for the Nation's present aviation policy."

"It is not surprising that the most astute political observers at Washington are frankly speculating today on whether the administration's handling of the air-mail situation may not prove the undoing of the new deal and the cause of the first active and outspoken opposition of the entire administration. It is not surprising that this should be so. We may pass over the high-handed manner in which all contracts were summarily canceled without right or benefit of hearing by the accused; we will pass over here the hasty turning over of the task of air-mail carrying to the Army, which was improperly equipped to do the job, with such regrettable results as to cause an immediate emotional reaction by the American people and we will for the moment ignore the discourteous way in which the communication of protest of the industry's most popular and outstanding spokesman (Col. Charles A. Lindbergh) was treated at the White House in order to inquire who were the President's advisers in this treacherous act."

"The Chief Executive has frequently been hailed here and elsewhere as a figure sympathetic and understanding to aviation; it therefore becomes the more surprising that he should have received and accepted advice on such a technically delicate problem as concerns our industry from politically (but nontechnically) minded persons.

"An unexplored and incompletely defended charge that air-mail contracts were drawn and let illegally without a hearing of all the operators involved was approved as justification for summarily canceling all contracts. The first legal protest in the courts against such action drove the administration's case all the way back to that extremely weak last line of defense that no redress could be sought until such time or times as the Government gave its consent to be sued. Certainly the legal advice, wherever it came from, for the opening move, was not of the best.

"Such being the case, it might be advisable to inquire into the motives and reasons and even the ability of the men around the President who sought and did advise him upon what now seems one of the most disastrous and ill-advised moves in the year-old administration.

"Certainly, first and foremost among these titans of aeronautical thought stands James A. Farley. Late last summer, after what was a display of commendable patience on the part of the aeronautical industry, inquiry was made of Mr. Farley as to what was to be his long-promised policy concerning aeronautics. In due course Mr. Farley replied, 'The future of American aviation has been taken under advisement.'

"Mr. Farley, however, was too busy at the time in efforts to prevent the world's largest city from escaping from Tammany to pay much attention to his duties in the Post Office Department. Passing on from his defeat in New York City Mr. Farley traveled hither and yon on politics bent, and, obviously, in the course of his travels saw the political football possibilities inherent in tearing down the air-mail-carrying structure of the Nation. Not reform, not gradual change, not the legal elimination of the guilty was the plan which he evolved, but a wholesale redistribution of contract favors under the direction of the right party was the objective sought. Excepting his wisdom on the subject of politics, Mr. Farley has little to contribute in the way of advice on what the aeronautics policy should be.

"While it is true that Mr. Farley was out of Washington much of the time, and therefore not available to give his valuable advice to the President, there was available Mr. Gene Vidal. It certainly is regrettable that this source of technical and specialized knowledge, if it were called upon, was most recently gained in airline operation which had never carried air mail.

"In the meantime the administration's principal activity in laying the foundation of a new aviation policy was in charge of that sterling authority on aviation, HUGO LAFAYETTE BLACK, the senior Senator from Alabama. Senator BLACK is a lawyer by profession, a Senator by political ambition, and presumably myopic and dyspeptic toward aviation as a result of being in the Field Artillery during the World War."

Not even the highest officers in the War Department are missed by the broadside of the aviation authority who says that "once the aviation football had gotten to rolling in the wrong direction under the advice and direction of these 'new dealers'", no protest was to be heard from Maj. Gen. Douglas MacArthur concerning the ability of the Air Corps to take over the Nation's air-mail load practically over night.

"What of the lives lost purely through ill-advised haste to change for the sake of change? What of the attempt of an administration presumably interested in the economic welfare of the Nation, to discredit and wreck an entire industry for acts charged but not fully proven and for which Government employees were cooperatively responsible? And what, incidentally, of the damage done to the name and prowess of the United States Army in the eyes of its civilian supporters who see but one side of the picture and that side chalked with what they believe to be an Army failure?

"We have thrown out of the temple of Government political officeholders incapable of making, on behalf of the people, contracts considered fair and just in the eyes of another administration and installed in their places so-called 'constructive' experts who turn out to be politically minded house wreckers."

[Editorial from the Kansas City Journal Post, Friday, Mar. 9, 1934]
THESE FLYERS

It is now apparent that the administration is willing to have the carrying of air mail reopened to bids submitted by privately operated companies. In view of the unfortunate accidents, irrespective of heavy flying conditions, the wave of sentiment against using Army equipment and planes to do the job is rather a natural one.

If the air mail is to be more closely supervised under an act of Congress, as is now indicated, at least fairness would seem to dictate permission for all previous carriers to bid, in spite of the bar set up that no contractor on whom the Government ever canceled could bid again for 5 years.

Because of the pressure under which the cancellations were made, it is possible that there are inequalities and injustices in strict interpretation of that penalty. Any company could be barred for cause, and no one could object as long as the evidence was conclusive against it.

Incidentally, it is not clear that trained Army fliers take to flying the mail. That is a humdrum job compared to the development of tactics and military flying with intensive training for combat work. Regardless of whether or not Army planes are now equipped for such flying, equally to the newer type of ship used for mail, the crack Army fliers do not like to be used for this peace-time work any more than a troop of cavalry would want to be turned into dray teams or plow horses. Perhaps the analogy is a little far-fetched, but the principle remains the same.

The flying of commercial mail should be restored to the men who were trained and are being refined to do that job—forming an important nucleus for additional combat fliers or observers should the need for them arise.

It is well that the question of restoration of the previous system is being hurried in Congress. For the country is beginning to listen to the talk heard all about that in canceling those air-mail contracts the administration was both hasty and too inclusive in its penalties. In fact, it was the administration's first major political blunder.

[Article in the Kansas City Star, Sunday, Mar. 4, 1934]

EYE ON T. & W. A. ROUTE—RUMORS SAY CORD WILL BID FOR THIS MAIL PATH—AMERICAN AIRWAYS HEAD IS DESCRIBED AS PLEASED AT CONTRACT CANCELATIONS, SEEING OPPORTUNITY

A rumor is spreading rapidly that a man identified prominently with air mail when it was operated by civilian lines now welcomes the existing situation in air-mail contracts as a future means to an end.

The individual is Errett Lobban Cord, once of Warrensburg, Mo., now head of American Airways, Inc., and its holding company, the Aviation Corporation of Delaware. The means to an end is an opportunity to bid for the central-transcontinental air-mail route through Kansas City, which, until the cancellation of all domestic air-mail contracts, was operated by Transcontinental & Western Air, Inc.

A GOAL LONG SOUGHT

The one-time citizen of Warrensburg is said to have his eye on the route through this community to give him something he has wanted since the day he first saw a mail pouch go aboard an airplane. That is a direct coast-to-coast air-mail route of good potential loads and one which does not fly all around Robin Hood's barn in getting from the Atlantic to the Pacific and back again.

The Cord lines, all now designated as American Airways, operate between Los Angeles and Atlanta, Ga., Chicago and New York, and many other routes. Under the extension method of creating air-mail routes—a method now coming in for so much comment by the Senate air-mail investigating committee and others—the American Airways system profited to a greater extent than any other system, but it has no direct route between the coasts at this time and it frequently is jokingly remarked that the line operates between the Atlantic and the Pacific "by way of Canada and the Gulf of Mexico."

Thus it is believed by many that Cord sees in the present situation an opportunity later to bid in more profitable routes, the central transcontinental in particular. It also is pointed out that Cord has remained passive, openly at least, even though his mail contracts have been canceled along with those of other domestic air systems.

AN UNUSUAL POSE

The idea of this passiveness, particularly in the face of the cancellations, is so wholly foreign to the usual Cord methods that many are sure there is something behind his unusually quiet demeanor. The air magnate—and that is what his position amounts to today—is a highly aggressive citizen who never stands for his toes being tread upon and never has cared who knows it.

DELEGATED TO DIE

"A government is the murderer of its citizens which sends them to the field uninformed and untaught, where they are to meet men of the same age and strength mechanized by education and discipline for battle." (Richard Henry Lee.)

The stern warning of this American statesman, who was a Member of the First Continental Congress in Philadelphia and one of the first United States Senators from Virginia, was recklessly flouted when the Government at Washington sent six young heroes of the Army Air Corps to an utterly unnecessary death in a single week.

These young officers were ordered to fly the mails before they could inform themselves regarding the routes to which they were assigned, before they could teach themselves the art of what was for them a new and unexpected mission, before their Government could or would supply them with planes equipped to give them every soldier's due, a sporting chance in battle.

The sacrifice of those six American heroes cannot be defended upon the ground of public necessity, because no such necessity existed.

There was one Democrat in Congress who, with voice and vote, expressed the real sentiments of the American people regarding the reckless sacrifice of their defenders with the colors, while, according to the newspapers, "roars of laughter swept the big majority caucus room of the Senate Office Building", where Senator BLACK, of Alabama, and Senator McCARRAN, of Nevada, dominated the scene.

This Representative in Congress, Mrs. ISABELLA GREENWAY, of Arizona, the widow of a veteran of the Spanish-American War and of the Great War, an air-line operator herself, was the only House Democrat with the courage to vote against the fatuous bill to authorize the Army to keep on murdering its pilots by condemning them to fly the mails in planes unequipped for that errand.

Her vote Mrs. GREENWAY defended in words that should bring the blush of shame to the pusillanimous politicians who voted the other way:

"I voted against the passage of this bill, because I think the last week has proved, without reflecting upon either the pilots or the Army, that the Army planes as such are not equipped to carry mail at this time; and I think that it might be better to suspend the air mail until the equipment is adequate rather than run a hazardous service."

 DESERVE A FAIR TRIAL

The abrupt cancellation of practically all of the air-mail contracts by the Government without giving the transportation companies a chance to be heard in their own defense before a court of law brings to mind the wide-spread controversy of some few months ago over the lynching of two kidnapers in the State of California.

It will be recalled that Governor Rolph condoned the actions of the mob in breaking into the prison, seizing the two men, and hanging them on a limb of a nearby tree. He contended that it was justified because of the severity of the crime committed. It will also be recalled that President Roosevelt vigorously criticized this attitude on the part of any public official charged with the enforcement of the law. His statement at that time affirmed his belief that it is for the courts of the land to decide upon evidence of guilt and to determine the punishment that should be meted out to guilty parties.

In the case of the air-mail contracts, we hold no brief for the air transportation companies as far as collusion or fraud is concerned because only one side has been heard. If they are guilty of fraudulent acts, then they deserve to be punished, but, like anyone else accused of wrongdoing, they should be given the opportunity to testify in their own defense. They should not be hung from the limb of a tree.

According to the terms of the air-mail contracts, it is agreed that the Government has the right of cancellation upon proof of fraud. It should have this right of cancellation under such conditions. It would seem, however, that in all fairness there should be some third neutral party, such as the courts, to pass upon the evidence submitted to prove the fraud.

We have little patience, too, with those who would criticize Will Rogers or Lindbergh for publicly expressing their views in opposition to the Postmaster General's action. We believe the latter has stood as grueling a test of character as any young man in this country and has come out of it unspolled by the adulation and tempting offers which have poured in upon him since his memorable flight. His life from then on has shown him to be no flash in the pan but an expert in aviation and one worth listening to when he speaks—which is seldom. We do not think he would rush into print unless he felt he was certain he was right. We would rather take our chances with him than with some of those few who would now try to lower him in the estimation of his countrymen. There is as little need to defend Lindbergh as there is to point out the sound wisdom and logic contained in the humorous and pointed remarks made by Will Rogers in his writings and radiobroadcasts.

The danger lies not only in this instance but it is an indication that with the Federal Government's becoming apparently more and more powerful every day, the people of the Nation will resign themselves to the belief that the Government can do anything it sees fit.

COMMENT ON THE AIR-MAIL EDICT

To the NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE:

Bully for your editorial Politics and the Air. For sometime past I have wondered if I should just shut my eyes as millions of others are doing and say all is well with the present administration. But since this air-mail episode I feel more disposed than ever to criticize.

It does seem to me, though, that there should be some way of punishing the ones who were dishonest and reopen the bids and let the contract out to companies at a fair profit. It seems wicked to do anything to curtail such a growing industry as commercial aviation. But, of course, we must not thwart the administration in their dramatics. It may make better citizens of this fine class of people interested in aviation to throw them out of employment and reemploy them in the C.C.C. or C.W.A.

ARLINGTON, N.J., February 12, 1934.

Mrs. A.E.S.

To the NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE:

I am grieved to learn that Mr. Early, of the White House staff, implies that Colonel Lindbergh was motivated by a desire for publicity when he gave out to the press the text of the message to the President in connection with the air-mail contracts without giving the White House an opportunity to read it first.

Whether Mr. Early likes it or not, the fact is that Colonel Lindbergh is esteemed by millions of Americans for the simple reason that he has persisted in avoiding publicity of any kind. I am perfectly willing to let the American people be the jury on my contention. Their verdict is far more important than the stereotyped remarks of the meticulous Mr. Early.

This particular message was addressed to the President as the executive head of our Government. As such I believe that it belongs to the public. If Colonel Lindbergh had suppressed the press report to permit the White House to give it out first, and if the White House had seen proper not to release it, then it would have been embarrassing for Colonel Lindbergh to publish it. Because of its official nature, the message was handled properly.

C. ROMERO, JR.

JACKSON HEIGHTS, N.Y., February 12, 1934.

To the NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE:

It is pointed out that the Postmaster General annulled these contracts. There is just as much chance that Farley would dare to cancel the air-mail contracts without the President's approval as there is that Secretary Early released his statement to the press without the same approval. The statement was childish. Colonel Lindbergh's prestige has increased because of the manner in which he has conducted himself.

PROTESTS ON THE AIR-MAIL OVERTURN

To the NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE:

It was thrilling to read the protests made by Colonel Lindbergh and Capt. Frank Hawkes against the ruthless action taken against the air-mail carriers. It has always been a principle of American jurisprudence that a person or group of persons are guiltless until the charges are proved beyond question. Is this great principle only a scrap of paper to the President? There is no finer organization in the world in equipment and personnel than the United States air-service transport companies. The individual skill and devotion to duty of each employee is of the highest order. In the event of an armed conflict, these transport companies stand ready to take the shock of the first offense or defense—at least that is what the public has felt about them and would expect. Will the patriotism of the organization be increased by this ruthless handling? Let the Nation voice its protest in no uncertain terms.

FRED L. ROTH.

WHITE PLAINS, N.Y., February 12, 1934.

To the NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE:

If the sweeping Executive order re Air Mail Service had applied the stiff, new broom to the backs of the Government and air-mail officials who signed the air-mail contracts, those men could have received appropriate treatment.

As a frequent air traveler, I know well the care that is bestowed upon the United States mail at the airports, the ability and good judgment of the well-trained company pilots, as well as the stability of the planes.

It is the few men whose names are written on the papers involved who should be made to suffer, if they have done wrong, in such cases, not the vast number of stockholders, travelers, and employees who are in no way to blame.

S. WHITE.

NEW YORK, February 10, 1934.

To the NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE:

Colonel Lindbergh's letter to President Roosevelt in protest on mail-contract cancellation is timely, merited, and highly commendable. No greater authority on aviation could be heard. It should arouse the public to the existing grave conditions facing the Nation and to force action to combat further infractions upon our citizenship and individual rights.

WALTER S. LAMBERT.

LORDVILLE, N.Y., February 12, 1934.

To the NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE:

The aviation industry has been blacklisted by the Government. If the Government wanted to proceed against individuals, all very well and good, but to condemn an entire industry is a horse of another color.

Commercial air lines in this country carrying mail, express, and passengers, day and night, summer and winter, through sleet and fog, are the safest, fastest, and most reliable in all the world. This achievement would not have been possible without Federal aid.

With Army planes flying the mail, strong pressure will be exerted to make it a permanent service of the military branch of the Government.

I have every confidence in our President, but in this instance I feel that he has been ill advised.

G. H. LAMPMAN.

ST. JOHNSVILLE, N.Y., February 11, 1934.

To the NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE:

Although one of the staunchest Republicans for years back, I have been backing Mr. Roosevelt's moves for the last year like all good Americans. But I have at last rebelled.

When Mr. Roosevelt canceled all existing air-mail contracts, was he by any chance thinking of the average man who has invested all his spare change in an industry which he thought would be one of the greatest in time to come? Must the stockholders suffer because there may have been some crookedness which happened years ago? The least the President could have done in this case was to give the aviation companies a hearing, I should think.

NEW YORK, February 10, 1934.

To the NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE:

From now on let our motto be "Billions of dollars for doles but not one cent for subsidizing new industries." Let us stand for this principle even though other nations, such as Great Britain, have discovered that a growing industry which may prove invaluable in event of national emergency needs assistance.

D. L. STRICKLAND.

SEARSDALE, N.Y., February 10, 1934.

To the NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE:

The cancellation of the air-mail contracts is a deplorable example of arbitrary and despotic rule. Because there is a widespread (and probably well founded) belief that there have been many abuses connected with the method of subsidizing air transport, and because the victims of the order of cancellation are a few rich corporations, there is little likelihood that the order will evoke the popular resentment and protest which such a menace to sound constitutional government should evoke.

I hold no brief for the air-line companies. Neither I nor any member of my family owns, or has ever owned a single share of stock in any company engaged in air transportation. My only interest in the matter is that of a private citizen with a profound conviction that every arbitrary act by Government officials, every invasion of private right, and every attempt to destroy the great constitutional safeguards of private right, must be resisted if we are to remain a free people under constitutional government.

Section 3950 of the United States Statutes provides that any contract for carrying the mails may be annulled if the contractor has been guilty of entering or proposing to enter into any combination or agreement "to prevent the making of any bid for carrying the mails", or has "given or performed or promised to give or perform any consideration whatever to induce any other person not to bid for any such contract." There can be no sound objection to the safeguards of the public interest embraced in this statute or in other statutes or regulations which penalize unlawful and unfair practices which are manifestly against the public interest.

Obviously, however, penalty should be imposed only upon proof of guilt, not upon the mere allegation of guilt. Upon accusation being made the accused should have an opportunity to be heard, either before an authorized departmental tribunal, or a court of proper jurisdiction, to be confronted with the evidence offered in support of the accusation, and to make denial sustained by whatever evidence in disproof of the charge the accused has to offer. Obviously, too, accusation made against any individual or group of individuals, however amply sustained by evidence warranting the imposition of penalty, cannot justify the imposition of like penalty upon other individuals against whom no evidence of wrongdoing has been offered, or even accusation of wrongdoing made. Punishment en masse, without discrimination between the guilty and those not charged with guilt, violates every sound principle of law and morals. That is precisely what has happened in this instance.

There was no emergency of such a character as to preclude the necessary hearing and examination of the accused and their witnesses, to determine the accusations were true or false. If it is urged in defense that the President may be in possession of evidence not yet brought out, the adequate reply is that the imposition of penalty should have awaited the proof of wrongdoing.

JOHN SPARGO.

OLD BENNINGTON, VT., February 11, 1934.

To the NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE:

Putting the War Department into the Air Mail Service is conceivably a greater menace than the existence of fraud and graft. If cancellation of contracts means that the private companies will be kept out of the running 5 years, the Army will have time to intrench itself, and a tardy public opinion will wake up to the danger of militarizing air communications.

The Government's monopoly of mail, is on scrutiny, serious enough. And if civil administration can be perilous to freedom (witness the Burleson regime), complacency is impossible in the face of military encroachment. General MacArthur's breezy eagerness for the job does not warrant a cheery good riddance to the problem of finding a substitute plan of operation. Air mail, past the luxury stage, is bound to assume the importance of an agency of political development. In a democracy the tendency is supposed to be away from authority, not toward military regimentation.

The middle course between private profit and Army control lies in public management on a noncommercial, self-sustaining basis. If passenger traffic is needed to avoid a deficit, well and good; even without it the elimination of profit will narrow the margin between costs and rates. If Army planes are used (no passengers) and costs are not defrayed by postage, it is likely that an attempt will be made to mislead the people by hiding the loss under War Department appropriations and making nonusers of the service pay for it in taxes. Air mail must pay its own way. Experience will indicate whether rates ought to go up or down, with just wages provided for mail pilots.

A. REBEL.

The air mail must not be a tool of the Army for increasing its budget or power. Look out or the mail box will one day become a sentry box.

ALFRED LIEF.

To the NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE:

Has the United States Government come to that point of degeneration where it considers a contract as merely a scrap of paper? The wholesale annulling of air-line contracts has obviously condemned the innocent along with the guilty. The contracts of honest air lines would still be deemed as valid by an honest government.

GEORGE B. DYER.

ADMINISTRATION'S SUGAR POLICY—STATEMENT BY SECRETARY WALLACE

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, in an exceptionally clear and explicit announcement of March 16, 1934, Hon. Henry A. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture, has officially analyzed the administration's sugar policy, as embodied in the sugar bill introduced in the Senate on February 12 and now pending before the Committee on Finance.

All friends of the sugar industry will wish to read this review by Secretary Wallace. He points out that there has been a vast amount of misunderstanding concerning the purposes of the program; that the plan is one to aid the domestic industry in part by guaranteeing basic incomes to domestic sugar growers to the extent of about $6.50 per ton for more than 9,000,000 tons of beets; and that the prospect for the industry will be distinctly unfavorable if Congress should adjourn without legislation. He estimates that if no legislation is enacted, a disorganized sugar market will probably yield domestic sugar growers a total gross income of not exceeding $34,000,000, whereas under the present program, if adopted, the gross total income of sugar growers in the continental United States during the coming marketing year should be about $63,000,000.

I ask that Secretary Wallace's discussion of this important branch of farm-relief legislation be placed in the RECORD following my remarks.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY HON. HENRY A. WALLACE, SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE, ON THE ADMINISTRATION'S SUGAR PROGRAM

Stabilization of the sugar industry to prevent a threatened collapse of prices from bringing distress to some 80,000 farmers engaged in domestic sugar production is one of the principal objectives of the administration's sugar program now pending before Congress.

Operating behind high-tariff protection, the sugar producers of continental United States have not received the intended benefits of such protection because production in the island Territories, particularly in the Philippines and also in Hawaii and Puerto Rico, has rapidly expanded to displace Cuban shipments into the United States markets. Under the impulse of a tariff, which the insular shipments do not have to pay, this insular expansion has been rapid during the past decade.

The administration recognizes that domestic beet and cane producers will suffer the disastrous effects of further price declines unless the impact of insular overproduction on the domestic market is modified through a definite restriction of shipments. Therefore an approach to a more stable sugar situation is sought through the establishment of definite quotas of continental, insular, and foreign marketings.

The program, as outlined in the President's message and implemented by pending legislation, recognizes a duty to stabilize the price and production of sugar for the benefit of the continental producers and the industry of the insular possessions. It also takes into account the obligations of the United States toward Cuba as implied by the Monroe Doctrine and specified in the Platt amendment.

Protests that the program tends to eliminate or destroy the beet-growing industry are entirely without foundation of fact. There is no intention to eliminate the industry. On the contrary, the plan is to guarantee the income of domestic producers. The program gives beet-sugar producers an opportunity to obtain what no other American farmer has yet been offered—an assurance of fair exchange or parity value for their crops.

It is true that a reduction is contemplated below the abnormal 1933 production. But that crop was so large that it now appears certain that the processed sugar from this crop cannot all be sold during a single marketing year, except at extremely low prices. The quota of 1,450,000 tons of sugar, as suggested in the President's message, is greater than any single year's sales of continentally produced beet sugar on the American market.

The advantage that domestic producers have enjoyed under tariff protection is being threatened by two principal factors. The first of these is the increasing amount of sugar coming on the market from the insular areas which share in the domestic tariff advantages. Production in the Philippines, Hawaii, and Puerto Rico has expanded so much that a tremendous surplus is rapidly accumulating. The prospect of a decline in the price of sugar definitely threatens lower returns to beet and cane producers, because the prices they receive under the factory-contract system are based upon net returns to the processors from the sale of the sugar.

In the absence of any stabilizing program, the administration estimates that the returns for sugar beets may fall to as low as $4 per ton and the gross income of beet producers decline to $34,000,000. Therefore the administration proposed the present program.

Under this program stability in the market should result and the continental beet producers would be guaranteed, in effect, a market for approximately nine and seven-tenths million tons of beets, at a price of $6.50 per ton, the parity price for sugar beets as of March 1. This would mean that the income to beet producers in the United States for the coming marketing year would be approximately $63,000,000, or possibly double that income which would result if no steps are taken to stabilize the industry. This income to beet producers, based on the farm value of the crop, would be the highest received since 1920, with the single exception of 1930, when a record production of 9,199,000 tons of beets brought a price of $7.14 per ton. (Abnormal years of post-war inflation (1919-20) not considered.)

The second factor which the Agricultural Adjustment Administration has taken into consideration is the report of the United States Tariff Commission. After a 2-year investigation begun under the Hoover administration, the Commission has recommended a reduction in the tariff on raw sugar.

It is understood that the Tariff Commission, acting under the flexible tariff provision of the Smoot-Hawley Act of 1930, has unanimously recommended to the President a reduction from 2 cents to 1½ cents per pound on Cuban 96° raw sugar.

If such a reduction in tariff should not be accompanied by action such as that now proposed under the Adjustment Act, domestic sugar producers would experience a marked curtailment in their market and in their incomes, the administration believes.

The unprecedented expansion of insular production is attributed to Executive inaction upon recommendations of the Tariff Commission in 1924. The Commission then recommended that a reduction be made on the tariff from the duty of 1.76 cents per pound provided in the Fordney-McCumber Act to 1.23 cents per pound. These recommendations were not followed, and under stimulus of the 1.76-cent tariff, expansion of insular production was begun. This insular expansion was further stimulated when in 1930 the tariff was further increased to 2 cents per pound.

The Philippine Islands increased the quantity of sugar shipped duty free to the United States from 318,000 tons in 1924 to 1,141,000 tons in 1933. The Hawaiian Islands responded to the higher tariff protection by increasing shipments to the continent from 608,000 tons in 1924 to 989,500 tons in 1933. Shipments from Puerto Rico practically doubled in the same period. But while the island Territories increased production under tariff protection, the expansion of beet- and cane-sugar production in the continental United States was relatively small during that period. Beet acreage did not expand materially during the period since 1924 until the 1933 crop, although sugar production was increased in some years due to favorable yields.

Continental producers were unable to compete effectively with the insular areas. Receiving the same tariff protection as do the continental producers, these areas enjoy lower production costs. Returns to American beet growers declined from $8.99 per ton of beets in 1923 to $5.26 per ton last year.

The purposes of the Fordney-McCumber Act, and subsequently the Smoot-Hawley tariff, to maintain and increase the domestic market for domestic producers were not accomplished. Instead of bringing the advantage to domestic producers, the tariff merely shifted the American market from Cuba to the insular possessions, with resulting economic distress to the sugar industry generally and loss of markets for Cuban production, which finally came to a climax with revolution in Cuba.

In 1924 the quantity of sugar produced in Cuba and used in supplying domestic consumption in the United States was 3,384,500 short tons. This began shrinking under the handicap of the American tariff until in 1933 all that Cuba was left of the American market was 1,601,000 tons. This decline in Cuban shipments was absorbed not by domestic American producers, who increased their contribution to the domestic market only a little more than one-half million tons, but by the insular producers in the Philippines, Hawaii, and Puerto Rico, where low-production costs and natural climatic advantages contributed to rapid expansion.

If the recommendation of the Tariff Commission in 1924 had been followed, much of the existing chaos in the sugar industry might have been prevented. The rapid accumulation of surplus production both of insular producers and continental beets probably would have been checked.

During the period of decline in Cuban sugar shipments to the continental United States, the purchasing power of the Cuban people was sharply reduced. This loss of Cuban buying power proceeded to a point that the island no longer provided the once substantial market it had afforded American products. Cuba formerly had been an important customer for many American farm commodities including butter, cheese, milk, pork, lard, corn, oats, wheat flour, and vegetable oils. Translated into land equivalent, the area required to produce the purchases by Cuba in 1928 was 1,738,300 acres. In that year Cuba shipped 3,125,000 short tons of raw cane sugar or its equivalent to the United States market. The purchases by Cuba of American farm products have declined as the market for the Cuban sugar has been absorbed by insular possessions, and as the growth of surplus sugar stocks has driven down world prices of sugar to near the zero point.

In 1932 the acreage required to supply Cuba with the purchases of American farm products had declined to 921,033 acres. This meant that American farmers had lost an export outlet for farm products from 817,267 acres of land, or an area larger than the entire domestic harvested acreage of beets in 1932. In 1932 Cuban shipments to the United States market were 1,762,500 short tons, a reduction in shipments of 1,362,500 tons from the 1928 level.

The quota suggested for Cuba in the President's message to Congress constitutes a drastic reduction in shipments to the United States as compared with any year except the last 2 years. It does, however, increase permitted shipments above those of the last 2 years, which have been so low as to create economic chaos and political revolution in Cuba. The quota of 1,944,000 which was suggested by the President is 343,000 tons greater than the shipments of 1933 and 182,000 tons more than the shipments of 1932. But that moderate increase would be 496,000 tons less than Cuba's shipments in 1931.

The administration's program for sugar has five principal objectives. They are:

1. To insure stability to the domestic producers of beets and cane by giving them a virtual guaranty of fair exchange or parity returns on a level of production representing more continental sugar than has ever been successfully sold in a single year.
2. To assure greater stability to the sugar industry through the provision of adequate quotas for the insular possessions but preventing the impact of insular overproduction from so depressing the market as to decrease returns to domestic producers.
3. To contribute to the economic rehabilitation of Cuba by restoring to Cuba a portion of the American market that was lost to the insular possessions by virtue of the tariff policy.
4. To seek to restore Cuban purchasing power to some extent so that the market for the products of the 817,000 acres of American farm land which has been lost during the past 4 years may in part be restored.
5. To protect the consumers against price advances resulting from the processing tax. A tariff reduction will be made in an equal amount to the processing taxes, thus preventing any increased cost to consumers.

These five points constitute the major objectives of the administration's pending sugar program. Despite the contention of those objecting to the plan that it involves a drastic readjustment of continental sugar-beet cultivation, such a reduction is involved only in a nominal sense.

In view of the fact that beet growers in 1933 produced more sugar beets in terms of sugar than processors could possibly sell in this marketing year without a sharp price reduction, an adjustment of the abnormal acreage seems inevitable whether the administration program is adopted or not. Moreover, the nominal reduction that is involved permits a higher level of production than in any year except for the 1933 sugar-beet crop. The harvesting of 984,000 acres in sugar beets for the 1933-34 season was largely the result of low returns available from other crops in these areas; the tariff protection which was steadily crowding Cuba out of the American market, although most of this was absorbed by insular production, and the advance in the price level of sugar because of the monetary policy.

An analysis of the pending program as applied to individual sugar-beet producers shows that the aggregate return for beets produced on the proposed restricted acreage—a reduction only from the abnormal 1933-34 plantings—would exceed the aggregate that probably would be received under present conditions from larger, unrestricted acreage.

Should the domestic price of sugar decline in the absence of any stabilizing program, growers would likely receive $100 less on a 10-acre plot devoted to sugar beets than would be received on a smaller acreage under the proposed program. This calculation is based on a present return of $579 from a 10-acre tract producing 11 tons of beets per acre of 15-percent-sugar content, with a raw sugar price of 1.20 cents, the present duty and a refiners' margin of 1 cent. With the downward adjustment of one-half cent in the tariff, the probable decline in price would reduce the beet growers' income from the 10-acre tract $83, or to below $500.

With an assured price of $6.50 per ton for beets a farmer would receive about $100 more for the product of 8.5 acres than he would receive for the product of 10 acres without the proposed stabilization program.

The same relative advantages as outlined for beet growers will accrue to the domestic cane producers in Louisiana and Florida. During the last marketing season cane producers received about $3.21 per ton. The fair exchange value at present is approximately $4.62. The quota as suggested in the President's message for domestic raw cane sugar is 260,000 tons, which involves a reduction from the amount that was marketed last year. Under the proposed program the Secretary of Agriculture would be authorized to make adjustments in cane areas where production, as compared with the continental sugar-marketing requirements, is relatively small. The principle of adjustment from last year's marketings would be involved but the cane producers in these regions would be assured of higher returns on the quota than has been proposed.

Amendment of the Agricultural Adjustment Act to make sugar a basic commodity is deemed necessary because of failure of negotiations to obtain satisfactory results through a marketing agreement. The draft of the proposed marketing agreement which finally was submitted to the Secretary of Agriculture was disapproved because, among other reasons, the agreement was so worked out that benefits proposed for processors were far greater than those offered farmers. The cost involved to all farmers as consumers would have been far greater than the probable benefits to the group engaged in domestic sugar production. The proposed agreement contained no provision which would effectively adjust supply to consumption requirements. The quotas allotted the various producing areas exceeded probable consumption.

By adding sugar to the list of basic commodities, it will be possible to pay benefits to continental producers who are asked only to make a nominal adjustment in their production and at the same time the first step toward limiting the supply to the requirements of the market will be taken.

In its important attributes, the sugar program is in line with the Agricultural Adjustment Administration's plans for other crops, with the following points of similarity and distinction:

1. It asks for farmers to adjust supply in return for benefit payments. (In the case of sugar the adjustment is relatively small compared with other commodities.)
2. A processing tax is proposed to finance the program. (In the case of sugar, consumers will not be asked to bear the tax because it is to be accompanied by an equal decrease in the tariff.)
3. It seeks to attain parity income for domestic producers. (In the case of sugar this is attainable immediately, whereas in other crops it is not.)

There is an additional point of distinction between the pending sugar program and other crop-adjustment programs in the fact that sugar producers are not the only farmers who will benefit. By the allotment of a definite quota to Cuba, it is believed that through enhanced purchasing power, a portion of a lost market for United States agricultural products will be restored.

There has been a vast amount of misunderstanding concerning the objectives of the sugar program. Once the continental sugar producers understand the opportunities and advantages offered, it would seem that they would clamor for the immediate adoption of pending legislation which will make it possible to carry out the program.

PLANNED ECONOMY SEEN WAY TO DICTATORSHIP—ONLY WAY TO PREVENT COMPLETE CONTROL FROM WASHINGTON IS TO ABOLISH PLANNING, OBSERVER SAYS

By Mark Sullivan

The article I am here writing is based, almost wholly, on a pamphlet written by Secretary of Agriculture Henry A. Wallace, entitled "America Must Choose." Mr. Wallace's statement seems to me to be, under the circumstances, one of the most important documents in the contemporary world. Certainly to Americans it is literally the most important.

The pamphlet is a discussion of what the Roosevelt administration is doing, especially about agriculture, together with some concrete forecast of future steps the administration is likely to take. The statement comes from inside the administration; it is written by a member of Mr. Roosevelt's Cabinet. Yet it is a much more dire prediction about the future than any critic outside the administration has made. Coming from Mr. Wallace, coming from within the administration, it must be believed. Coming from almost any other source it would be incredible.

It is incredible, yet there it is. These things that Mr. Wallace says will strike the average American as terrible, unthinkable. Yet these things will be done unless there is some demonstration of public opinion, or unless Congress reasserts its prerogative, or unless Mr. Roosevelt, for some reason, chooses to change his course.

HORRIFIED AT PORTRAYAL

It is with Mr. Wallace's statement that the present article by myself deals. Mr. Wallace's pamphlet is about 15,000 words long. My article is limited to less than 2,000 words. Therefore, I shall be obliged to condense and summarize what Mr. Wallace says, in addition to such quotations as I make. I shall try to do this with care to preserve the meaning. But I find myself thrown into a strongly controversial mood by what Mr. Wallace says. Indeed, I am little short of horrified at Mr. Wallace's cold portrayal of what is ahead for America if we follow the planned economy which Mr. Wallace and the administration have started. Because I feel this way, I shall attempt especial care to be accurate and fair.

But there is always risk of incorrect interpretation. For that reason, and also on the broadest grounds, I urge every reader of this article to get and read Mr. Wallace's America Must Choose. I urge this particularly upon newspaper editors; I cannot think that any editor or editorial writer can be fair to his task without having read this document. It should be read also by men in every community who take an interest in their country's future, men who are local centers of public opinion, men who engage in debate and discussion. Particularly it should be read by farmers, who will be enabled to see what Secretary Wallace has in store for them. I should like to see it read by literally every American. The pamphlet can be procured by sending 25 cents to the Foreign Policy Association, 18 East Forty-first Street, New York.

AMERICA MUST CHOOSE

To those who read Mr. Wallace's pamphlet I should like to give one warning. Mr. Wallace starts with an assumption, a premise. The premise is that America must have a planned economy, that all our agriculture and industry must be directed from Washington. If you choose your own premises, you can arrive at any conclusion you wish. So Mr. Wallace arrives at the conclusion that America must choose between two forms of planned economy, both terrifying.

I disagree with this premise of Mr. Wallace. I hope most who read the pamphlet will disagree with it. I say that America's choice is between a planned economy and no planned economy, between planned economy and liberty. I say that "planned" is the same as "controlled", and that "controlled" is the same as "dictated." And I think America can avoid dictatorship.

But I hope each reader of this article will get Mr. Wallace's pamphlet and read it.

AIM TO RAISE PRICES

Almost exactly a year ago Secretary of Agriculture Wallace and Assistant Secretary Tugwell, with, of course, President Roosevelt, adopted a policy and practice about farming, which policy and practice are now familiar to every farmer and nearly everyone else as A.A.A. Messrs. Wallace and Tugwell, with, I think, some of the young radicals, wrote the legislation.

The purpose of the measure, as stated in the preamble, was to raise prices of farm crops to "a level that will give (farmers) a purchasing power" equal to what they had in the pre-war period 1909-14. This purpose has not been attained. Moreover, this policy and the whole A.A.A. program is encountering serious difficulties. Crop restriction by voluntary action, paid for by the Government, is breaking down and compulsion is being introduced.

Under this condition Mr. Wallace writes his pamphlet. For the extraordinary thing that the pamphlet is, I surmise an explanation. But my surmise may be due to a critical spirit—the reader should get and read the pamphlet himself.

My surmise is this: At the end of a year Mr. Wallace finds his farm plan not a success, finds it breaking down disastrously. He wishes to try a new policy. Intent upon making his new policy seem good, he goes, without quite realizing it, to extraordinary lengths in condemning the policy he has been following for a year. Only on this surmise can he explain the spectacle of a member of the administration saying that Mr. Wallace says about steps which the administration, including himself, has taken, and about the future consequences of those steps.

INTERMEDIATE COURSE

The farm policy so far has looked toward "nationalism"; that is, toward restricting farm crops in the United States to just enough to supply our own domestic demands (plus, of course, some export of cotton, wheat, tobacco, and a few other crops). The farm policy which Mr. Wallace now proposes looks to raising a certain amount of additional surplus for export abroad. Mr. Wallace describes the new policy as partial internationalism, an intermediate course.

But Mr. Wallace is candid enough to say that the new policy he now proposes will not wholly save us from the terrifying consequences of the present one. He says the new policy may partially save us; "It would be unfair", he says, "not to point out that a steadfast national allegiance to any fixed course (national), international or intermediate, also requires a certain degree of regimented opinion."

In short, either of the two planned courses proposed by Mr. Wallace and the administration, whether the present course of nationalism or the proposed intermediate one—each involves results which most Americans regard as odious. He gives no thought whatever to the course America has followed in the past, the course of individualism and liberty. He insists on an agriculture planned and controlled from Washington, and he declares we must endure the consequences.

WALLACE QUOTATIONS

The following are quotations selected from Mr. Wallace's America Must Choose. They compose a picture of what is ahead if America continues on the course of the past year, the course of nationalism. And a large part of this is ahead, Mr. Wallace admits, even if we adopt the new policy he now proposes. In short, all of the following is ahead of us if we go on in the present course of nationalism and most of it is ahead even if we adopt Mr. Wallace's proposed new course. These are Mr. Wallace's words:

"Much as we all dislike them, the new types of social control that we have now in operation are here to stay. * * * By the end of 1934 we shall probably have taken 15,000,000 acres out of cotton, 20,000,000 acres out of corn, and about half a million acres out of tobacco, nearly one eighth of all the crop land now harvested in the United States.

"If we continue year after year with only 25,000,000 or 30,000,000 acres of cotton in the South instead of 40,000,000 or 45,000,000 acres, it may be necessary after a time to shift part of the southern population. We will find exactly the same dilemma, although not on quite such a great scale, in the Corn and Wheat Belts.

"If we finally go all the way toward nationalism, it may be necessary to have compulsory control of marketing, licensing of plowed land, and base and surplus quotas for every farmer for every product for each month in the year. We may have to have Government control of all surpluses, and a far greater degree of public ownership than we have now. It may be necessary to make a public utility out of agriculture. * * * Every plowed field would have its permit sticking up on its post.

DISCIPLINE NEEDED

"As yet, we have applied in this country only the barest beginnings of the sort of social discipline which a completely determined nationalism requires. * * * It is quite as serious a question whether we have the resolution and staying power to swallow all the words and deeds of our robust, individualist past, and submit to a completely army-like, nationalist discipline in peace time.

"Our own maneuvers of social discipline to date have been mildly persuasive and democratic. * * * Regimentation without stint might indeed, I sometimes think, go further and faster here than anywhere else. * * * Great prosperity is possible for the United States if we follow the strictly nationalist course, but in such case we must be prepared for a fundamental planning and regimentation of agriculture and industry far beyond that which anyone has yet suggested. To carry out such a program effectively, with our public psychology as it is, may require a unanimity of opinion and disciplined action even greater than that which we experienced in the years 1917-19. * * * It may require a great amount of governmental aid to take care of people formerly engaged in import and export businesses. It will mean the shifting of millions of people from the farms of the South. But these are minor considerations, in comparison with the extraordinarily complete control of all the agencies of public opinion which is generally necessary to keep the national will at a tensility necessary to carry through a program of isolated prosperity."

RUTHLESS IDEALISM

That is what Mr. Wallace says is ahead of us—all of it if we continue in the present course of nationalism, most of it if we take up Mr. Wallace's proposed internationalism. The deadly calm with which Mr. Wallace says it suggests the ruthlessness that is inherent in every reformer. Nearly every idealist is at heart an autocrat. All of them want to make the rest of us do as they say.

Incidentally, I should like to know whether Mr. Wallace knew a year ago, when he first adopted the present policy, that it would entail the consequences he now says it will entail. If he knew then, why did he not tell us then?

But of course there is a third course—Mr. Wallace does not like this third course and dismisses it with a brief paragraph. We can throw overboard this whole notion of a planned economy. After that, we might or might not reduce the tariff. But it is planned economy that entails the regimentation which Mr. Wallace predicts. With planned economy gone, we can dismiss Mr. Wallace's nightmare.

FREEDOM OF PRESS

Incidentally, the careful reader of Mr. Wallace's pamphlet will find something interesting about freedom of the press. In both the plans Mr. Wallace sets forth, the only plans he is willing to entertain, he says that regimented opinion is inevitable. Regimented opinion means, of course, suppression of freedom of the press.

I go further, I say that no such revolution as is now being carried out at Washington has ever been carried out in any other country except by abolishing freedom of the press. There is no free press in Italy, Germany, or Russia. And the present attempted revolution in America cannot be carried out fully except by first getting rid of freedom of the press.

To sum up, the picture described above by Mr. Wallace is infallibly ahead of us if we go on with the system the administration has been following for a year, the system of an agriculture planned, directed, and controlled from Washington. The steps he describes are the steps the planners will take—and Mr. Wallace knows, for, as respects agriculture, he and Professor Tugwell are the chief planners.

The only way to avert what Mr. Wallace describes is to abolish planning and control from Washington. And that Mr. Wallace declines to consider. We can only get rid of Mr. Wallace's system, and get back to individualism and liberty by some extreme demonstration of public opinion, or by a decision of Congress to resume its normal functioning, or by the election next fall of a Congress less subservient to Mr. Roosevelt than the present Congress is.

PROPOSED COPPER CODE

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a proposed code of fair competition for the copper-mining industry of the United States, prepared by the Arizona Copper Associations, together with an explanation and an analysis of the copper-mining industry of the United States and its relationship to the N.I.R.A., as presented at the copper-code hearing, Washington, D.C., March 12, 1934, by Mr. Hoyal A. Smith, of Warren, Ariz.

There being no objection, the code and explanation were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CODE OF FAIR COMPETITION FOR THE COPPER MINING INDUSTRY OF THE UNITED STATES

Requesting the President of the United States to—

1. Place a duty of 10 cents per pound on imported copper.
2. Embargo against foreign shipments of copper into the United States until production and consumption shall be equal.
3. Permit only current domestic production to enter into the current market of the United States.
4. Distribute production equitably among the copper States.

(Prepared and presented by Arizona Copper Associations, August 1933.)

CODE OF FAIR COMPETITION FOR THE COPPER-MINING INDUSTRY OF THE UNITED STATES

To effectuate the policy of title I of the National Industrial Recovery Act by providing a means whereby the copper-mining industry can be reopened, thereby giving immediate employment to the idle miners and other employees of industries dependent upon the operation of copper mining; to conserve the industry by providing safeguards that will regulate, stimulate, protect, and foster the industry in its discovery and development stages so as to maintain through the functioning of these departments of the industry a continued domestic supply of this essential metal; for the benefit of our people during times of peace and as an adjunct to our national defense in times of war, this code of fair competition is adopted.

ARTICLE I

Definitions

1. The word "copper", as used in this code, shall designate all that class of copper metal used in the fabrication of copper and its alloys in any form.
2. "Primary copper" is mined copper.
3. "Secondary copper" is that derived from reclaimed, used, or scrap copper, or come-back alloys containing copper.
4. "Effective date" is the date of the approval of the code by the President.
5. The word "persons" shall designate and mean natural persons, partnerships, associations, corporations, and receiverships of persons, partnerships, associations, and corporations engaged in the mining of copper.
6. "Productive quota" shall designate the percentage of production allowed persons, determined by ratio of capacity to that of the industry.

7. "Labor", as used in this code, shall designate employees of all branches of the industry, including labor performed for compensation in prospecting and assessment work, either by contract or day labor, but shall not include members of the executive, supervisory, technical, or engineering staffs.

8. "Domestic producing mines" shall designate persons engaged in mining copper within the boundaries of any of the States or Territories of the United States.

9. "International copper group" shall designate persons and/or their affiliates engaged in the domestic copper industry and either they or their affiliates having financial interests in the copper industry in one or more foreign countries.

10. "Development mines" shall designate that class of domestic copper mines which, through drilling operations or shaft and drifting operations, are in the development stage, but have not yet reached a commercial production.

11. "Prospecting mines" shall designate that class of the domestic copper industry made up of owners of copper-mining claims upon which annual assessment work is being annually performed and such patented or other claims which have not yet entered into the development-mines stage.

12. "Code committee", as used in this code, shall be the representatives to the code committees elected by the various group associations of the industry existing within the various States.

13. The word "group" shall designate persons engaged in the same branch of the industry.

14. "United States Bureau of Mines" shall designate the official Bureau of Mines as constituted in the Government of the United States.

15. "President" shall designate the President of the United States.

16. "Federal agency" shall mean the individual or individuals designated by the President of the United States to represent the President in his relation to the copper industry and in the administration of the act.

17. "Production" shall designate the act of producing primary copper.

18. The term "wages" includes only payment for labor performed in the industry.

19. The terms "hours of labor" or "hours of work" include only hours of labor or hours of work in the industry.

20. The term "the National Industrial Recovery Act" means the National Industrial Recovery Act as approved June 16, 1933.

21. The term "the code" means and includes this code and all schedules annexed hereto as originally approved by the President and all amendments hereof and thereof, and all amendments as subsequently made and approved by the President.

22. The term "average production" shall mean the average of copper produced by a mine during the normal years of 1924-28, inclusive.

ARTICLE II Organization

SECTION 1. The purpose of the code is to effectuate the policy of title I of the National Industrial Recovery Act into the copper industry of the United States.

Sec. 2. In order to secure adequate and full representation of all groups included within the copper-producing industry of the United States and in order that all such groups may have an opportunity to secure admission to membership in representative groups, and to protect the rights of members of each group against the elimination or repression of small enterprises, and in order to protect all groups against monopolies and monopolistic practices which are detrimental to the industry, the following organization is declared to be the organization of the code of fair competition for the copper-producing industry of the United States.

Sec. 3. The following groups of the copper-mining industry are recognized as the existing divisions of the industry:

- (a) Domestic producing mines group.
- (b) Development mines group.
- (c) International copper group.
- (d) Prospect mines group.

Sec. 4. The representation of groups a, b, c, and d shall be from organizations or associations representing persons in pursuit of that branch of the industry represented by the group.

Sec. 5. The qualifications for membership in the associations representing each of the groups shall be truly representative of the branch of the industry represented by such group organizations.

ARTICLE III Code organization

SECTION 1. Each State shall have a code committee, which shall be responsible to the President for the administration of the fair practice in its State and for the administration of the code laws in their respective States.

Sec. 2. The code committee shall be composed of representatives elected 1 from the domestic-mines group, 1 from the international-copper group, 1 from the development-mines group, and 1 from the prospect-mines group. These members when elected shall meet and choose from among the membership of the group associations a member who shall be the manager for all of the group associations in the State. The manager so elected shall be ex-officio member of the code committee. The code committee shall elect one of their members as chairman.

Sec. 3. In States having only a part of the various groups or group associations, the code committee shall be constituted from the representatives duly elected from the group associations existing in such State in accordance with the method provided herein.

Sec. 4. Each State code committee shall raise sufficient funds for its reasonable expenses by assessment in proportion to the tonnage production allotted to the persons producing copper in its State. All budgets shall be submitted to associations for approval.

Sec. 5. The State code committee shall allocate to the various producers in its State relative shares of production based upon their relative productive capacities.

Sec. 6. In the event of a new mine coming into production, the persons owning same shall apply to the Development Mines Association for a production allotment. After an investigation, said Development Mines Association shall report its findings to the State code committee. The code committee, by and with the consent of the Development Mines Association, shall then make an allotment to said new mine for the ensuing year to be charged against the State's quota. In no instance shall this allotment exceed 2,000 tons of copper. After the new mine shall have proven its ability to maintain its production, the State code executive committee shall report same to the official designated by the President for the national allocation among the various States, and such new production shall be included in the next allotment to said State in which said new mine is located.

Sec. 7. No allotment shall be made by the State code committee until all assessments levied shall have been paid.

Sec. 8. All rules and regulations of the code shall be enforced by the State code committee. Rules of fair practice within the State may be passed by that State by its State code committee, such rules being subject to approval by the President.

Sec. 9. The State code committee shall hear all complaints against unfair practices and shall decide same in accordance with the rules and regulations. Members may abide by such decisions, but in the event that such decisions are not accepted an appeal may be made to the courts as provided in the National Industrial Recovery Act or to the Federal agency.

Sec. 10. Upon the call of the President representatives of State code committees shall meet at such time and place for the transacting of such business as the call shall designate.

All State code committees, upon receipt of such call, shall elect from among their number one or more delegates to said meeting as is stated in the call.

Acts performed by such meetings, when approved by the President, shall be mandatory upon all State code committees and group associations.

The expenses of said delegates shall be paid by their respective State code committees.

ARTICLE IV Production

SECTION 1. The President is hereby requested, after such investigation and hearing as is prescribed by, and subject to the limitations contained in title I of the National Industrial Recovery Act, to limit imports of copper, copper products, ores, alloys, or articles containing copper to such quantities as when added to the volume of domestic production will equal the volume of domestic consumption and such quantities as may be permitted to enter the United States shall pay thereon an import duty of 10 cents per pound.

Sec. 2. During the existing emergency, in order to immediately reopen the copper mines of the country for the benefit of those dependent thereon, all sales of copper and all articles containing copper for domestic consumption must be secured from current primary production and secondary copper. The ratio of secondary copper, as allocated by the Federal agency, shall not exceed 20 percent of the total consumption.

Sec. 3. Required production shall be estimated at intervals by a Federal agency designated by the President. The required production shall be equitably allocated among the several States by the Federal agency. To ascertain the average productive capacities of the various States, the average production during the normal years of 1924 to 1928, inclusive, shall govern, except in those instances where mines have gone into production subsequent to those times. In those instances the average production during their period of operation shall be used as the basis of ascertaining their allocations.

Sec. 4. Nothing in this code shall be construed to mean that surplus primary, secondary copper stocks, and current domestic primary production may not at all times be available for exportation.

Sec. 5. After the President shall have declared the emergency no longer exists the State code committees in national convention assembled, at the call of the President, and by and with the consent of the President, shall provide a method for the disposition of the surplus stocks of primary and secondary copper.

Sec. 6. It shall be the duty of the State code committees to ascertain whether or not producing mines remain within the quota allotted to them and during the emergency to enforce the code provision that all sales made in the current market shall be allocated from current primary production. In instances where such rule is violated, any State code committee having knowledge of such unfair practice shall immediately report same to the Federal agency of the President. Persons found guilty by the President of such violations shall not be eligible to receive further quotas until reinstated to the eligible list by the President.

Sec. 7. Immediately upon the effective date of this code the Federal agency designated by the President shall allocate among the several States its allotment of copper production and shall designate the period of time for which the allotment shall cover. The allotments shall be made in accordance with section 3, article IV of this code. The State code committees shall, immediately upon receipt of the allotment from the Federal agency, allocate it among the various mines within its State qualified for production in accordance with the method herein provided.

Persons having reason to believe their productive quotas are not commensurate with their productive capacity may apply to the association of which they are a member for additional productive quota. After investigation said associations shall report same with their findings and recommendations to the State code committee.

The code committee may make further investigations and shall forward the report with their approval or disapproval to the Federal agency. Provided an increased productive quota is allowed, the Federal agency shall include same in its list of productive capacity for said State and take such increase into consideration when making the next allocation of productive quota for said State upon the same basis as is given for "average production" in the determination of the productive quota for the State.

The State code committee shall accept the decision of the Federal agency and list the increased capacity allowed the applicant and use same in future State allocations.

Sec. 8. Persons not filling their allocated quota within time specified shall be subject to investigation by the State code committee. If determined that such failure was due to refusal or neglect and resulted in serious unemployment, same shall be reported immediately to the Federal agency. The code committee may, by and with the consent of the Federal agency, reallocate to some other persons qualified to fill said allotment, and shall declare such refusal to be in violation of the code and of section 1 of N.I.R.A. and subject to the penalties of section (3-f) of said act.

Sec. 9. State code committees shall upon application issue productive quotas to members of the association belonging to groups c and d, article II. Such quotas shall not exceed 200 tons of copper per annum for each person and shall be charged against the State quota.

ARTICLE V

Prices

SECTION 1. In conformity with section 1 of the N.I.R.A. and to bring immediate relief to unemployment and populations in distress within the copper districts dependent upon the operation of copper mines, it will be necessary to do four things:

(1) Limit foreign copper shipments into the United States, as provided in section 1 of article IV of this code.

(2) Limit current market sales of copper to current domestic primary production as provided herein.

(3) Spread the allocations of current primary production equitably throughout the industry as herein provided.

(4) Establish such price for copper as will permit as large a percentage of the copper industry to reopen as will not entail a hardship upon the consumer.

For the 27-year period from 1903-30 the weighted average price received for all copper sold in the United States equals 16.6 cents per pound. According to table 49, page 71, of the official report of Production Costs of Copper, by the United States Tariff Commission, published as Senate Document No. 28 in 1931, 10.5 cents per pound would reopen 35 percent of the copper mines upon a cost basis; 13.44 cents per pound would reopen an additional 25 percent, or a total of 60 percent of the copper mines; 14.63 cents per pound would open 90 percent; and 17.5 would reopen 100 percent of the mines. It is hereby stipulated and agreed that the minimum price of copper shall be placed at 15 cents per pound. This price is fair to the consumer, as it is 1.6 cents less than the price received during the period of 1903-30 at a time when copper was upon the free list; it being understood that the said price is the minimum, and if during this period the market should rise to a higher price, nothing shall prevent the signatories herein from accepting such higher price.

ARTICLE VI

Reports

SECTION 1. Each State code committee shall compile and report to the Federal agency such reports as shall be demanded by the President. The code committees shall secure such data and reports needed by them in the conduct of the code from members of the industry.

Members of the industry shall prepare and file with the State code committee such reports as shall be arranged by the committee and shall file same within the time limits prescribed.

ARTICLE VII

Rights of labor

Employers in the copper industry shall comply with the requirements of the National Industrial Recovery Act as follows:

"SECTION 1. That employees shall have the right to organize and bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and shall be free from the interference, restraint, or coercion of employers of labor, or their agents, in the designation of such representatives or in self-organization or in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.

"SEC. 2. That no employee and no one seeking employment shall be required as a condition of employment to join any company union or to refrain from joining, organizing, or assisting a labor organization of his own choosing.

"SEC. 3. That employers shall comply with the maximum hours of labor, minimum rates of pay, and other conditions of employment approved or prescribed by the President."

ARTICLE VIII

Minimum wage and maximum hours

SECTION 1. On and after the effective date, and during the period of the emergency, the maximum number of hours of work for employees shall be 40 hours per week, except in case of accidents or emergencies, where the safety of the men or the preservation of property necessitates temporarily longer hours.

Sec. 2. On and after the effective date the minimum wages shall be at the rate as based on the scale of wages in use in the producing mines in the southwestern part of the United States May 1, 1921. The minimum rate of pay shall apply equally to all men employed, regardless of race, creed, or color, except to employees partially incapacitated through old age or physical condition for whom provision is made on a semipension basis and are not included in this list.

The minimum rate of pay shall be based upon a base scale, effective from May 1, 1921, to March 1932, when copper producing industry closed in the Southwest. For each 2-cent per pound raise in the price of copper averaged over a period of 3 months a 10-percent raise on the scale of wages paid shall become effective.

The base rate as established for 16 cents per pound of copper shall be the minimum rate of this code for the domestic copper producer.

ARTICLE IX

SECTION 1. This code and all the provisions thereof are expressly made subject to the right of the President, in accordance with the provision of clause 10 (b) of the National Industrial Recovery Act, from time to time to cancel or modify any order, approval, license, rule, or regulation issued under title I of said act, and specifically to the right of the President to cancel or modify his approval of this code or any conditions imposed by him upon his approval thereof.

ARTICLE X

SECTION 1. Such of the provisions of this code as are not required to be included therein by the National Industrial Recovery Act may, with the approval of the President, be modified or eliminated as changes in circumstances or experience may indicate. It is contemplated that from time to time supplementary provisions to this code or additional codes will be submitted for the approval of the President to prevent unfair competition in price and other unfair and destructive competitive practices and to effectuate the other purposes and policies of title I of the National Industrial Recovery Act consistent with the provisions hereof.

ARTICLE XI

List of unfair practices

For purposes of the code the following-described acts shall constitute unfair practices:

I. Procuring, otherwise than with the consent of any member of the code, any information concerning the business of such member which is properly regarded by it as a trade secret or confidential within its organization, other than information relating to a violation of any provisions of the code.

II. Discriminating, publishing, or circulating any false or misleading information concerning the business of any member of this code or to the conditions of employment among the employees of any member thereof.

III. Inducing or attempting to induce by any means any party to a contract with a member of the code to violate such contract.

IV. Aiding or abetting any person, firm, association, or corporation in any unfair practice.

V. Purchasing more copper for domestic consumption than is allocated by the code committee to any person.

VI. Selling for domestic consumption more copper than is allocated by the code committee.

VII. Jumping mining claims owned by another.

VIII. Filing false information with Government agents concerning the holdings of a member of this code or the giving to a Government inspector any false information concerning the value of, locations, claims, assessment work, or mineralization of a holder of a claim.

IX. The filing of a location either directly or through others or encouraging the filing of any claim upon the location of others until such time as the validity of the holdings of the possessor shall have been determined by the Government.

X. The maintaining of "gunmen" in the conduct of the business of mining.

XI. The use of private detectives or of "poison squads" in the dissemination of false propaganda or to affect with any corrupting influence members of this code or their business.

XII. The use of agents in the destruction of or hampering of drilling or development work, such as plugging or blasting discovery drill holes, breaking equipment, or destruction of necessary water supplies, or any other act that would hinder or injure the work of discovery or development.

XIII. The use of secret operatives and "stool pigeons" in framing against labor or small companies.

XIV. The guaranteeing of credit accounts to company or other stores based upon wages due in order to monopolize community trade and thereby hampering employees from purchasing in the open competitive markets where such markets exist.

XV. The coercion of employees in the exercise of their full franchise in public elections.

XVI. The distribution of printed or written ballots containing favored candidates in an attempt to influence election contests.

XVII. The secret instigation of public officials to harass and injure small competitors or to bring to them expensive litigation to weaken their enterprise.

XVIII. The instruction through employment agents and bosses or other representatives of how to vote at public elections.

XIX. The posting of notices directing men how to vote. Example: "Unless — is reelected — this plant closes the day after election."

XX. The intimidating of employees and the spread of fear among them to secure their cooperation in public or company affairs.

XXI. The discharging of employees for refusing to vote the company ticket or perform any other act out of line of duty.

XXII. The promise of jobs for electioneering or voting.

XXIII. The making of false surveys and the establishment of false claims or quarter corners in order to confuse and harass prospectors and claim owners.

XXIV. The placarding of mining claims located and owned by others setting up claims to them and using unfair pressure in order to force possessors to abandon their mining claims so they or their agents may relocate them.

XXV. The filing of scrip entries upon mining claims owned by others.

XXVI. The molesting of claim owners in their peaceful possession.

XXVII. Influencing inspectors, Government agents, of lands against the peaceful possession by claim owners.

XXVIII. The refusal of smelters, refiners, and other reduction works to accept for treatment production quota at fair prices upon a cost-plus basis. The profit shall be reasonable and shall be determined by the State code committee with the right of appeal to the Federal agency by either party. The decision of the Federal agency shall be final, and either party not abiding by such decision shall be declared unfair and subject to the penalties provided by law.

AN ANALYSIS OF THE COPPER-MINING INDUSTRY OF THE UNITED STATES AND ITS RELATIONSHIP TO THE NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY ACT, PRESENTED AT THE COPPER CODE HEARING, WASHINGTON, D.C., MARCH 12, 1934, BY MR. HOVAL A. SMITH, OF WARREN, ARIZ.

FIRST PART. PRESENTATION OF DATA

I. United States copper-mining industry

INTRODUCTION

Production records of copper mined within the United States reach back to 1845. During the 88-year period, 1845-1932, the mine output equals 46,035,600,000 pounds, having a value of $7,342,457,000, or 16 cents per pound.

The copper mined for the year 1845 equals 224,000 pounds, having a total value of $45,000, or 20.1 cents a pound.

The maximum annual production during the period 1845-1932 was in 1929, same amounting to 2,002,900,000 pounds, valued at $352,504,000, or 17.6 cents a pound.

The amount mined for 1932 equals 544,000,000 pounds, valued at $34,273,000, or 6.3 cents a pound. The copper production for 1932 equals 27.2 percent of the 1929 output, but its value was only 9.7 percent of the value for copper mined during 1929.

It is estimated that during 1933 the domestic-mined copper output will amount to about 20 percent of the 1929 poundage, and its value will only equal 9 percent of the 1929 production.

Consequently, we note that during the past 2 years the domestic copper-mining industry has received only about 9.4 percent of the value output for the year 1929. A continuous shrinkage loss in mine values of more than 90 percent during the past 24 months emphasizes that the domestic copper-mining industry has reached the point of extinction.

The purpose of this discussion is to point out the economic factors that have brought ruin to the vast number of American citizens dependent on the production of copper which is one of the most vitally essential metals during peace as well as war, likewise an effort will be made to show what must be done to revive the all-important domestic copper-mining industry.

A REAL DISTRIBUTION OF COPPER

We find during 1845-1932 that 78 percent of the domestic-mined copper came from the 11 Western States of Arizona, Montana, Utah, Nevada, New Mexico, California, Colorado, Idaho, Wyoming, Washington, and Oregon. These 11 Western States embrace 39 percent of continental United States and contain a population of about 12,000,000 citizens.

The 21-year period, 1913-32, mined 62 percent of all the copper produced during 1845-1932. The 11 Western States furnished 84 percent of the domestic copper mined during this 20-year period.

The value of mineral products produced within these 11 Western States for years past is greater than the value output derived from either the farm or animal products division. In turn the value of copper mined within these 11 States is the most important metal produced therein.

For the year 1929 these 11 Western States mined $310,000,000 worth of copper, same equaling 88 percent of the total domestic copper production.

The domestic copper industry for 1929 employed 44,502 wage earners, and it is estimated that about three quarters of a million citizens directly and indirectly are dependent on same.

The loci of the copper-producing districts within these 11 States that furnish about 90 percent of our domestic copper production lie about 1,200 miles westerly from the center of population for continental United States.

PRESENTATION OF DATA

In order to present concise yet sufficient details pertaining to the important domestic copper-mining industry, it was deemed most expeditious to offer the information in graphic form. Consequently, embodied herein will be found 10 charts, each of which will outline in the form of curves and tabulated data some of the essential factors pertaining to the copper industry.

The data used in compiling these charts were secured from the most authoritative source possible, principally United States Government publications.

Attention is also directed to exhibit A attached to this statement. It is entitled "American Copper Production" and was prepared by the writer at the request of the Arizona Copper Tariff Commission. Upon the motion of Senator ASHURST, February 5, 1932, it was made Senate Document No. 58, Seventy-second Congress, first session. This publication contains considerable data pertaining to the domestic copper-mining industry and should be read in connection with this statement in order to more fully understand the destructive factors besetting the industry.

II. Chart no. 1

Referring to chart no. 1 (omitted in RECORD) we find that data pertaining to domestic copper production in pounds, and prices for copper in cents per pound, have been plotted for the 66-year period, 1867-1932. This period embraces 99.6 percent of all the domestic copper mined during 1845-1932.

The percentage relationship of foreign copper production to domestic production is also shown on the chart for the 52-year period, 1881-1932.

This chart also shows the percentage relationship to domestic copper production of domestic copper exports and imports during the 66-year period.

Domestic copper consumption in percent of domestic production has been plotted for the 33-year period, 1900-1932.

A curve showing the percentage relationship that copper stocks bear to domestic production is also shown for the 28-year period, 1905-32.

Mention is also made on chart no. 1 (omitted in RECORD) of the various copper-tariff periods and the duty rate for ingot copper during the period 1864-1932.

PRODUCTION DETAILS

On chart no. 1 (omitted in RECORD) we note that the copper production for 1867 equals 22,400,000 pounds. We likewise observe a constant progressive increase in production to 1914. During the 4-year war period, 1915-18, production increased very rapidly. The post-war period, 1919-32, shows the production depression of 1921 and the high production period from 1923-29, likewise the diminishing production from 1930-32.

In order to more fully understand the relationship of production details the 32-year period, 1901-32, has been divided into three parts, the 4-year war period and the two 14-year post- and pre-war periods. The copper mined during 1901-32 equals 85.4 percent of the copper production for 1845-1932. The period 1867-1900 accounts for only 14.2 percent of the total copper mined during 1845-1932.

Analyzing the production for the 32-year period we find that the 14-year pre-war period, 1901-14, mined 28.8 percent of 1845-1932 production, the 4-year war period produced 15.5 percent, and the 14-year post-war period mined 41.1 percent of the 1845-1932 output.

We further find that the 14-year post-war period, 1919-32, mined 48.1 percent of the period production 1901-32.

It is evident from studying the production curve plotted on chart no. 1 (omitted in RECORD) that the uniform line of production increase during 1901-14 denotes the absence of depressive factors. It is likewise unnecessary in this discussion to dwell on the reason for the tremendous copper production during the war period, 1915-18.

In analyzing the production curve for the 14-year post-war period, 1919-32, we note its highly erratic course and bearing in mind that this post-war period mined about one half of all the copper produced during 1901-32, it should prove most interesting to study it minutely. Detailed domestic and foreign copper-production factors covering the period 1919-32 are shown on charts no. 2 and 2A (omitted in RECORD) and will be further discussed under that division.

PRICE DETAILS

In studying the copper price curve plotted on chart no. 1 we note its more or less horizontality, following the 15-cent line from 1883 to 1930, the exception being for the high prices existent during the 4-year war period, 1915-18.

The very observable horizontal equality of copper prices during the 12-year post-war period, 1919-30, with the 12-year pre-war period, 1903-14, as shown on chart no. 1 (omitted in RECORD), immediately emphasized the lack of a post-war commodity price for copper. As is well known the wholesale price index for all commodities averaged about 50 percent higher for the post-war period, 1919-30, when compared with the pre-war period, 1903-14.

In view of the fact that copper has failed to receive a post-war commodity price, a detailed analysis of copper prices for 1903-30, compared with the price details of other basic domestic products is submitted under chart no. 3 and chart no. 3A. (Omitted in RECORD).

EXPORT AND IMPORT DETAILS

An inspection of the copper exports curve from 1867-1932 on chart no. 1 (omitted in RECORD) shows a constant progressive increase to about 1895, its more or less horizontality from 1896-1924, and a decrease from 1924-32. This marked variation suggested that a detailed analysis be made of domestic-copper exports during the post-war period, 1919-32. These data will be found discussed under chart divisions no. 4 and no. 5 (omitted in RECORD).

Studying the copper imports curve from 1867-1932, as shown on chart no. 1 (omitted in RECORD), we note its variability from 1867-74. The high percentage of imports during 1871-73 was due to large imports of copper in manufactured form on account of the prevailing high domestic price for copper. The import curve from 1875-95 remained practically horizontal. We note a continuous rise in the import curve from 1896-1932. The post-war portion of the curve from 1924-32 shows such a marked increase; consequently, the post-war period, 1919-32, import details were analyzed and same will be found under chart divisions no. 4 and no. 5. (Omitted in RECORD.)

CONSUMPTION DETAILS

The copper consumption curve plotted on chart no. 1 is practically horizontal from 1900-1914. From 1914-32 the curve shows a most marked increase. A detailed analysis of consumption curve factors during 1901-32 will be found on chart no. 4 (omitted in RECORD) and a discussion thereof will be found under that division.

COPPER STOCKS

The percentage relationship that copper stocks bear to domestic copper production is also shown on chart no. 1 (omitted in RECORD). This phase has been plotted for the 28-year period 1905-32. The copper stocks' curve from 1905-17 is practically horizontal. We note the large increase from 1917-21 and its recession to about normal in 1925. From 1928-32 we observe a most unusual and persistent increase. Noting the curve symmetry between curve portion 1915-21 with that of 1926-32 they were superimposed, and this relationship is shown on chart no. 6 (omitted in RECORD). An analysis of copper stocks' details will be found under a subsequent subdivision titled "chart no. 6."

COPPER COMPANY PRODUCTION DETAILS

Various domestic and foreign copper production factors for 1915-32 pertaining to the Anaconda, Kennecott, and Phelps Dodge Copper Cos. are tabulated, likewise plotted, on chart no. 7. (Omitted in RECORD.) This chart was inadvertently numbered "7" instead of "9." Under division chart no. 7 will be found a discussion of the data outlined on said chart.

COPPER WAGE-EARNER DETAILS

Data were secured from United States Census publications pertaining to the number of wage earners engaged in the mining of domestic copper for various years from 1860-1929. These data and related details have been tabulated and outlined graphically on chart no. 8. (Omitted in RECORD.) A discussion pertaining thereto will be found under division chart no. 8. (Omitted in RECORD.)

ARIZONA COPPER PRODUCTION AND TAX DETAILS

In order to visualize the importance that the production of copper bears to total property valuations, such data were secured, tabulated, and plotted for the State of Arizona on chart no. 9. (Omitted in RECORD.) Arizona has been the leading copper-producing State for many years. By referring to chart no. 2 we find that Arizona produced 32.8 percent of all the copper mined during 1845-1932. Arizona has furnished 41.4 percent of all the domestic copper mined during the 14-year post-war period, 1919-32. Arizona likewise produced 41.5 percent of the total domestic output for the year 1929, said year being the one of maximum production during the 88-year period, 1845-1932. In view of the foregoing, it was deemed interesting to submit chart no. 9 (omitted in RECORD), and a further discussion of the data shown thereon will be found under chart no. 9 division (omitted in RECORD).

III. Chart no. 2

The data tabulated on chart no. 2 (omitted in RECORD) were secured principally from United States Geological Survey and Bureau of Mines publications. Data as to foreign production and world totals for certain years were secured from the A.B. of M.S. Yearbook for 1932.

In the upper left-hand table on chart no. 2 (omitted in RECORD) will be found an analysis of the copper production of certain domestic States for the period 1841-1930. The writer did not have time to rearrange this table and include the data for years 1931 and 1932. There is no appreciable difference whether domestic production is assumed to begin with 1841 or 1845. The period 1841-1930, as shown, mined 96.6 percent of the copper mined during 1841-1932; consequently, the factors outlined will approximate those for the latter period.

We find that United States, during 1903-30, mined 82 percent of the total production for 1841-1930. The combined production of the States of Arizona, Utah, Nevada, and New Mexico was 120 percent greater for 1919-30 than 1903-14. On the other hand, the production for Montana and Michigan showed decreases of 24 and 26 percent, respectively, when comparing the post-war with the pre-war period.

Under section B of said table we find that the combined production of Canada, Africa, and Chile shows an increase of 358 percent for the post-war when compared with the pre-war period, while the rate of increase for the United States only equaled 44 percent.

The foregoing indicates a remarkable percentage increase of mined copper within the foreign areas during the post-war period, a satisfactory increase within the four States mentioned and an alarming decrease for Montana and Michigan.

In order more fully to understand the variable production factors during the post-war period data for each year were tabulated for these States and foreign areas, and are shown in table C.

The data relationship set out in table C are more easily understood when outlined graphically; consequently it has been plotted as shown on chart no. 2A. (Omitted in RECORD.)

Table A and table B outline in detail production factors for various year spans within the period 1841-1930 for the aforementioned domestic States and foreign copper areas. A careful study of these two tables will enable one to understand general cyclical production changes within the most important copper-producing areas throughout the world during the past century.

IV. Chart no. 2A

The data used in plotting the curves shown on chart no. 2A were secured from table C, chart no. 2. (Omitted in RECORD.)

The curves visualize the variability of copper-production percentage factors for the leading domestic copper-mining States and foreign areas during the post-war period, 1919-32. This 14-year span mined 41.1 percent of the domestic production and 40.9 percent of the foreign copper output during 1841-1932. These curves therefore depict in graphic form the existent relationship for about one half of all the copper mined domestically and within foreign areas during the past hundred years.

The total United States curve beginning with 58.7 percent of the world's production for 1919 declined slightly in 1920 and reached the 41.1 point during the depression of 1921. It increased to 49.9 percent in 1922 and reached its post-depression apex in 1924 at the 54.7 point. The curve declined slightly to the 54.1 point in 1926 and from that year it fell rapidly to 1929 and precipitously thereafter to the 28 point for 1932.

The curve for the total foreign production is the reverse of that described in the preceding paragraph.

It is needless to dwell on the startling change that the two foregoing curves indicate. It is grippingly evident that so far as the United States is concerned it has since 1927 mined less than one half the world's copper output and during 1932 only produced 28 percent thereof. We have to go back to 1890, 43 years ago, to equal this record. It is very evident from the foregoing analysis and a careful study of chart no. 2A, that the domestic copper-mining industry has indisputably lost control of the world's copper market and in the future must necessarily rely on furnishing the total copper requirements of the home market.

The two foregoing curves are necessarily a composition respectively of the domestic- and foreign-area curve details shown below.

DOMESTIC-CURVE DETAILS

We note through following the Arizona production curve from 1919 to 1932 that it parallels quite closely the total United States curve. The Arizona curve for 1919 shows a production percentage about equal to the total foreign remainder output and nearly twice the combined production of Chile, Africa, and Canada for that year. For 1932 Arizona equaled about one third the foreign remainder and only about one quarter of the combined Chile, Africa, and Canada production. As shown, each of the last three named foreign areas produced more copper than Arizona during 1932. The world-production percentage of Arizona has declined steadily since 1925.

We also observe that the percentage rate for Michigan and United States remainder has declined steadily since the depression year of 1921. The decline for Utah and New Mexico began in 1924. Montana began its post-war decline in 1925, and Nevada in 1928.

The decline for the total domestic production began with the year 1924, as afore-mentioned. We find that the copper mined subsequent to this decline during 1925-32 equals 63 percent of the period production 1919-32.

FOREIGN-CURVE FACTORS

The combined percentage of Chile, Africa, and Canada for 1919 equals 14.8 percent of the world's production. For 1932 we find their combined production has increased to 39.2 percent.

The C-A-C curve as shown on chart 2A (omitted in RECORD) shows a continuously undeviating rise during the past 14 years. This curve starts 75 percent less than the United States total for 1919, yet by 1932 it ends 40 percent higher. Their combined production passed Arizona in 1921, the foreign remainder in 1923, and the United States total in 1931. The curve shows that whether in the depression of 1921 or 1931, the combined production of C-A-C continued to increase—never shared in the huge world percentage losses incurred by the domestic producers.

We observe that Canada and Africa increased their world production percentage rate about 500 percent during the 14-year period; that Chile's rate increased about 100 percent.

We also see that the foreign remainder production percentage shows a most marked increase since 1929, amounting to 50 percent by the end of 1932. The productions of the 10 countries embodied in this curve are rapidly expanding their rate of operations.

We find that since 1924, during 1925-32, this period mined 70 percent of the total foreign copper produced during 1919-32. The foreign production during 1925-32 exceeded the domestic production during that period by 18.4 percent.

Near the right edge of chart no. 2A (omitted in RECORD) will be found graphical details showing that the known foreign copper poundage reserves are about four times greater than the domestic reserves.

From the statement of facts within this subdivision we find that foreign copper production has shown a most marked increase since 1924 and through comparison of known copper reserves the foreign production percentage rate can be increased to care for the world requirements.

V. Chart no. 3

The purpose of this chart (omitted in RECORD) is to show the price relationship of copper with other important basic domestic commodities produced during the 12-year pre-war period, 1903-14, compared with those existent during the 12-year post-war period, 1919-30.

The data outlined on chart no. 3 (omitted in RECORD) set out the price ratio for the 14 most important domestic agricultural crops, namely, corn, cotton, hay, wheat, oats, potatoes, tobacco, cottonseed, barley, sweetpotatoes, rye, sugar beets, rice, and flaxseed. The total farm value of these 14 crops for the 28-year period, 1903-30, equals $172,110,000,000, and represents 73.5 percent of the total value of farm crops grown during said period.

The value of the nonmetallic products stated in chart no. 3, namely coal and petroleum, for the period 1903-30, equals $47,619,000,000, and represents 66 percent of the total nonmetallic value for that period.

The value of the metallic products, pig iron, copper, and lead, analyzed in said chart, amounts to $24,095,000,000 for the 28-year period, and equals 78 percent of the total value of metallic products.

Within the metallic subdivision for the 28-year period 1903-30, the value of copper is about 18 percent greater than the combined value of all the remaining nonferrous metals and twice the combined value of gold and silver. It was also ascertained that the value of copper for these 28 years equals about 40 percent of the total value of pig iron.

A series of pre-post-war period averages of R. G. Dun & Co. wholesale-price index for the United States is likewise shown on chart no. 3. This makes possible a comparison of approximate living costs with the price of the stated commodities.

PRICE COMPARISONS

The method of comparison of post-war and pre-war prices for the various basic commodities is fully detailed on chart no. 3, consequently it will be unnecessary to review that phase.

Of the 14 farm crops analyzed on the chart, namely: Tobacco, cotton, flaxseed, cottonseed, and potatoes received an average price 115 to 74 percent higher during the 12-year post-war period than the pre-war price. These farm products therefore received more than a commodity price when compared with the R. G. Dun & Co., total price index. Sugar beets and sweetpotatoes received 30 percent less; rice, corn, and wheat 40 percent less; hay, rye, oats, and barley from 60 to 85 percent less than the total price index afore-mentioned.

The nonmetallic products, coal and petroleum received 114 and 106 percent more, respectively, during the post-war than the pre-war period. These two nonmetallics secured 50 percent more than a commodity price based on the Dun total index.

Referring to the metallic elements stated in the chart, we find that although lead received 47 percent more in price during the post-war, nevertheless this was 36 percent less than the Dun index commodity price. The price of pig iron was 33 percent higher during the post-war years than in the pre-war period yet sold 55 percent less than the commodity price index.

COPPER PRICES

It is startlingly evident by referring to chart no. 3 that copper is the only one of all the basic commodities analyzed that has failed to receive any post-war increase whatsoever.

We note that the price of copper during the 12-year post-war period, 1919-30, which equals 14.87 cents per pound is about equivalent to 14.80 cents per pound paid during the pre-war period. The actual rate of increase amounted to only 0.47 percent. If copper had received a rate increase during the post-war period equivalent to the R. G. Dun & Co. total wholesale price-index increase of 74 percent, it would have sold at 34.8 cents per pound. The Dun index shows that metals received a 40-percent increase during the post-war period; consequently an equivalent increase for copper would have brought an average price of 20.7 cents per pound during 1919-30.

The value of the four leading farm crops—corn, cotton, hay, and wheat—equals 55.6 percent of the total farm crops value for 1903-30. These four important crops received an average price 48 percent greater during 1919-30 than the pre-war period, 1903-14. If copper had received a 48-percent increase, it would have sold for 21.90 cents per pound during the 12-year post-war period instead of 14.87 cents, as shown in chart no. 3.

The important nonmetallic products—coal and petroleum—which represent 66 percent of all the values produced within that division during 1903-30 received an average price 111 percent higher during 1919-30 than the pre-war period. If the price of copper had received a similar rate of increase, it would have sold for 31.2 cents per pound during 1919-30.

Within the metallic division, pig iron, during 1919-30, sold 33 percent above the pre-war average. The price of copper would have averaged 19.7 cents per pound during the post-war period through receiving an equivalent increase.

The nonferrous section of the metallic division shows that the price of lead was 47 percent greater during the post-war period than the pre-war period 1903-14. A similar rate of increase for copper denotes an average price of 21.8 cents per pound during 1919-30. Attention is directed to the fact that the total value of copper produced during 1903-30 is not alone about four times more than the period value of lead, but it is greater than the combined value of all the remaining nonferrous metals, including lead produced during the 28-year period.

It is very obvious in the light of the foregoing analysis of pre-war and post-war basic commodity price factors that copper has failed to receive a post-war commodity price. Copper has been subjected to a most vicious degree of economic discrimination during the period 1919-30. This 12-year period mined 39 percent of the total output during the 86-year period 1845-1930.

The Anaconda Copper Co. voiced the same degree of criticism that the foregoing paragraph recites. We find on pages 10 and 11 of the Copper Target, published in 1924 by the Anaconda Copper Mining Co., certain statements pertaining to pre-war and post-war price relationships of copper and certain other basic commodities. These data as reproduced are shown herewith and are marked "Exhibit No. 3."

Referring to exhibit no. 3 we note that copper should have sold at 23.9 cents per pound during August 1824 instead of the price, 13.2 cents, actually received. We likewise find that although copper only averaged 18.0 cents during 1920, it should have received 44.4 cents per pound when compared with the other basic commodities stated therein. We further note that the 1919 price of 19.1 cents per pound should have been 34.3 cents; the 1918 price of 24.7 cents should have equaled 35.1 cents; and the 1917 price of 29.4 cents should have approached 35.2 cents per pound.

VI. Chart no. 3A

Due to the delay in presenting data at a copper code hearing—instead of August 1933 the delay has carried us to February 27, 1934—it was deemed advisable to bring chart no. 3 (omitted in Record) or parallel data forward to the end of 1933. The writer submits herewith a somewhat different set of economic factors than those set out in the chart no. 3 discussion, but the end-stage analysis of these corroborate the tragic conclusions of the prior chart.

We find in chart no. 3A (omitted in Record), a table and curves, showing price-index number relationship of copper ingot and sheet prices; likewise, wages per hour, cost of living, all commodities, steel, lead, and zinc price details for the period of 1903-33.

The table contains data secured from the Bureau of Labor Statistics, United States Department of Labor.

Price-index numbers of wages per hour, cost of living, and all commodities, 1913=100. These factors were obtained directly from Bureau of Labor Statistics publications.

The basing average assumed for 1913, for the copper, steel, lead, and zinc factors, is the 12-year pre-war average, 1903-14. This basing average being deemed more accurate than merely the year 1913.

The copper ingot price index number is for the electrolytic copper ingot; 1913 equals the average for 1903-14. The hot rolled copper sheet differential price index number represents the price differential between the sheet and the copper ingot. The sheet being a manufactured product, it was deemed more satisfactory to compare the ingot price with the difference between the ingot price and the price for the sheet.

The bessemer steel billet price index is compared with the differential between the billet and no. 27 steel sheet. The price index for pig lead is compared with the price differential between it and lead pipe. The zinc slab price index is compared with the differential between slab and sheet zinc sheet prices.

The table factors discussed foregoing were plotted as shown in the curve division for the 31-year period, 1903-33.

We note the equality and parallelism of nearly every one of the 11 curve details during the 12-year pre-war period, 1903-14. The startling meteoric rise of all the curves during the 4-year war period, 1915-18, is clearly depicted. The post-war period, 1919-33, shows a wide diffusion of curve details compared with the pre-war period factors.

It is unnecessary to compare, analyze, and discuss herein all the many interesting facts these curve details suggest. The curve relationship that is of immediate interest is the one pertaining to copper.

The parallelism and equality of the copper ingot, and copper sheet-ingot differential curves during the pre-war period, are strikingly evident. This 12-year period was one of economic equality so far as the copper ingot, copper sheet-ingot differential, and all the other factors are concerned.

We also note that during the war period the copper ingot and the sheet-ingot differential curves paralleled one another and both approached the 200-point coordinate.

We note, however, at the very beginning of the post-war period, 1919, that the sheet-ingot differential factor was at 184 and the ingot at 128.

Continuing on through to 1933, we note a submergence of the copper-ingot curve below the pre-war level from 1921 onward, with the exception of 1929.

On the other hand, the copper sheet ingot differential curve averaged above 150 from 1919-28; about 186 during 1929-32; and at 165 during the depression year, 1933.

During the last 3 years, 1931-33, the copper ingot price index average is 47, whereas the same period average for the copper sheet ingot differential equals 184. In other words, the manufacturers' income detail was proportionately about four times the return accorded the copper miners' labor product.

We also find during the last 3-year period, 1931-33, that the cost-of-living average was about 138, some three times greater than the copper-ingot average.

The average price of all commodities for 1931-33 equals 97, about twice the copper ingot average rate for the 3-year period.

The union rate of wages per hour average during 1931-33 stood at 252; this price index is about five times greater than the copper ingot index average for the same period of time.

A résumé of the foregoing emphasizes that the domestic-copper miners' labor product, the copper ingot, has sold from one half to one fifth of all the foregoing comparative values. The copper miners' labor effort will only purchase a fractional part equivalently when compared to all the afore-mentioned economic factors.

The copper ingot, as can be seen by scanning table and curve factors, has been viciously discriminated against during the whole 14-year post-war period; this span of years embraces nearly one half of all the copper mined during the industrial life of our country.

This degree of industrial peonage has brought starvation to the human element within our domestic copper-mining districts and practically ruined one of the most important of our basic domestic industries.

It certainly is unnecessary to dwell on the perfectly obvious discrimination against the copper-miners' labor product which is so vividly shown in chart no. 3A—the thing to do is to correct this injustice immediately.

The only way that economic justice can be accorded the domestic copper miner is to make effective a rigid protective policy enabling him to secure a commodity price for his labor effort within the domestic market.

An equitable copper code will immediately aid the copper miner in his effort to rehabilitate his life's equities and likewise save the near extinct domestic copper mining industry.

VI. Chart no. 4

The factors outlined on chart no. 4 (omitted in Record) pertain to United States copper consumption and exportable surplus details for the 32-year period, 1901-32. This period embraces 85.4 percent of the copper mined within the United States during the 92-year period, 1841-1932.

New refined domestic-copper consumption for any year is the remainder after deducting the combined copper exported and stock at end of year from the combined total supply of new refined copper plus stock at beginning of the year. The method of arriving at the production of primary or new refined copper annually is to summarize the domestic refinery production of copper from domestic and foreign sources plus imports of refined copper.

The available exportable surplus as used in this discussion is the difference between the new refined copper withdrawn on domestic account and smelter production of copper from domestic sources.

Due to the interrelationship of copper exports and imports with consumption and available surplus it was deemed advisable to submit data pertaining thereto. This relationship is emphasized by referring to table C, where the available surplus and excess exports are about equal for the period 1901-32.

The four tables shown and the graphical details outlined on chart no. 4 (omitted in RECORD) make it unnecessary to discuss at great length the copper factors afore-mentioned.

In table C we find that the increase for period 1919-32 over 1901-14 was 42 percent for copper production; 93 percent for consumption; 36 percent for exports and 145 percent for copper imports. A decrease during the post-war period of 50 percent and 49 percent, respectively, for available copper surplus and excess exports is also stated.

Although the domestic copper mined during the post-war period showed an increase of 42 percent over the pre-war period, we find that the rate for domestic copper consumption increased much more rapidly than production. The consumption rate, which equals 93 percent, was more than twice the domestic consumption rate during the post-war period.

Copper exports increased 36 percent during the post-war over the pre-war period. This rate of increase was smaller than the production rate and only one fourth the rate of increase for copper imports. Copper imports increased 145 percent and copper exports 36 percent during the post-war period.

In other words, even though the rate of domestic copper consumption was twice that for production during the 14-year post-war period compared with 1901-14, nevertheless, the copper import rate increased 50 percent faster than the consumption rate and 4 times more rapidly than the export rate during 1919-32.

The copper import rate of increase during the post-war period was so startling that it immediately suggested a yearly analysis of the 14-year period, 1919-32. This detail will be found in table D.

A study of the various factors stated in table D will make clear the relationship of decreasing copper exports and increasing copper imports during the post-war period.

The yearly factors for the 14-year period were segregated as shown in two 7-year periods and their summaries compared.

For the period 1919-25 excess exports equal 1,638,000,000 pounds. The average yearly exports and imports for the period are, respectively, 791,800,000 and 557,800,000 pounds.

During the second half of the post-war period, 1926-32, the excess exports only amount to 751,200,000 pounds, which is 886,800,000 pounds less than the total for 1919-25. The yearly average rate of exports and imports for 1926-32 equal 829,300,000 and 722,000,000 pounds, respectively.

The foregoing analysis clearly shows that while the average yearly rate for exports remained about stationary during the two 7-year periods, nevertheless the average annual rate for imports during 1926-32 exceeded 1919-25 by 164,200,000 pounds. This tremendous increase in imports during 1926-32 which equals 1,149,000,000 pounds is unquestionably the contributing cause for the present huge domestic copper surplus. This phase will be discussed in more detail under chart no. 6.

The rate of increase for the 7-year period, 1926-32, over the period 1919-25, equals 17 percent for copper production; 20 percent for consumption; 0 percent for available surplus; 55 percent for excess exports; 4 percent for exports; and 29 percent for imports.

Comparing the data set out in the preceding paragraph with that stated foregoing when discussing table C factors, we find that where the import rate increase ratio was four times the export rate for the total period, 1919-32, we note the rate to be seven times greater during the last half of the period.

Continuing the break-down it was ascertained that, although both exports and imports were decreasing during the last half of 1926-32, the export rate decrease was twice as great as the import rate. This is strikingly evident when summarizing the excess export factors during the last 4-year period, 1929-32. During this period imports exceeded exports by 131,400,000 pounds. This situation clearly emphasizes that imports should have been excluded during the last half of the post-war period.

COPPER CONSUMPTION

The graphical details outlined on chart no. 4 clearly show the copper consumption factors for the period 1901-32. This 32-year period mined 85.4 percent of the copper produced within the United States during 1841-1932.

The 14-year post-war period, 1919-32, mined 41.1 percent of the production for 1841-1932, and 48.1 percent of period production 1901-32. Annual factors are shown graphically for 1919-32, this period having mined about one half of the total domestic production of copper during the past 32 years.

During this post-war period, as shown on chart no. 4, we find that 87.7 percent of the copper mined entered into domestic consumption and 12.3 percent was available for export. The consumption rate for 1919-25 equals 86.6 percent, and for 1926-32 equals 88.9 percent of the domestic production.

The last half of the post-war period, namely, 1926-32, consumed about 90 percent of the domestic copper production.

VII. Chart no. 5

Chart no. 5 (omitted in RECORD) shows United States copper import and export details for the 14-year post-war period, 1919-32. This post-war period mined 41.1 percent of the 1841-1932 output and 48.1 percent of period production, 1901-32.

Copper exports during 1919-32 equals 49.2 percent of total copper exported during 1901-32.

Imports of copper during the 14-year post-war period represents 61.7 per cent of all the copper imported during the past 32 years.

Consequently, chart no. 5 (omitted in RECORD) analyzes about one half of all the copper exported and about 62 percent of the total imports for the period, 1901-32.

COPPER IMPORTS

Table A on chart no. 5 (omitted in RECORD) gives the origin and pounds of copper imported into the United States during the 14-year post-war period, 1919-32. Summaries are also shown for 1929-32, 1925-32, and for the year 1932.

Six foreign areas, Canada, Chile, Mexico, Peru, Africa, and Cuba imported 93.7 percent of the total copper imports during 1919-32; 94.4 percent for 1925-32; 95.4 percent during 1929-32, and 99 percent for the year 1932.

None of the foregoing six copper-importing areas, except Canada, buy any appreciable percentage of our domestic copper exports, as is evidenced by scanning table B.

Comparing table A and table B we find that Canada during 1919-32 sold to us three times more copper than she bought from United States. During the last 4 years, 1929-32, Canada shipped to us five times more copper than our Canadian exports.

We note the glaringly vicious economic fact that Canada poured into United States 60 times more copper during 1932 than she bought from us.

The remaining five areas, namely, Chile, Mexico, Peru, Africa, and Cuba, are just as culpable as Canada when viewing the huge excess of copper imports over exports they have deluged the United States with the past 14 years.

A study of the curves showing the origin of copper imported into United States during 1919-32 amply confirm the foregoing statements. The almost vertical rise of Canada's curve from 1923-32 is spectacular. The Chile curve shows a great increase during 1925-32. Mexico's curve shows a most unusual advance for 1925-32. The Peru curve shows a persistent increase during 1925-32. The foregoing four countries have furnished 79.8 percent of the total copper imported into United States during 1919-32. African copper imports since 1926 have decreased due to diverting, temporarily perhaps, their output into European trade channels.

COPPER EXPORTS

Referring to table B, chart no. 5 (omitted in RECORD), we find set out the destination and pounds of copper exported from United States during the 14-year post-war period, 1919-32.

As aforementioned, this period mined about one half of the copper produced domestically since 1900.

A study of table A shows that none of the nine countries stated in table B, except Canada, imports copper into the United States.

We find that these eight nonexporting copper countries, France, United Kingdom, Germany, Italy, Belgium, Sweden, Netherlands, and Japan, bought 93.7 percent of United States copper exports during 1932, 84.9 percent during 1929-32, 86.4 percent during 1925-32, and 84.8 percent during the 14-year period, 1919-32.

As to Canada, we note that where she bought 2.7 percent of the total domestic production, or 4.6 percent of total domestic exports, during 1919-32, her purchases for 1932 were only 0.4 percent and 0.6 percent, respectively.

Curve factors based on percentage ratio between exports and United States copper production as stated in table B were plotted as shown. These curves show the destination of copper exported during 1919-32.

The export-curve data clearly show the persistent percentage decrease of United States copper exports to United Kingdom, France, Germany, Italy, Belgium, Netherlands, Japan, and Canada since 1924. These eight countries bought 86.3 percent of United States copper exports during 1919-32.

The foregoing discussion of the factors outlined on chart no. 5 (omitted in RECORD) clearly indicate that since 1925 United States copper import percentages have shown a phenomenal increase, while domestic exports have shown a persistent tendency to decrease. This destructive relationship is fully corroborated by referring to the discussion of exports and imports under chart no. 4 (omitted in RECORD).

VIII. Chart no. 6

The data outlined on chart no. 6 (omitted in RECORD) pertains to United States copper stocks for the 28-year period, 1905-32. The copper mined during these 28 years equals 80 percent of the production for 1841-1932.

There is also shown the graphical relationship between special percentage curve sections of copper stocks and copper exports and imports for 1915-32.

Due to the rather uncertain contributing causes which have resulted in creating and maintaining the present colossal surplus of copper stocks within the United States during the past 3 years, which in turn has depressed prices and production and caused untold misery to the hundreds of thousands of citizens dependent on the domestic copper-mining industry, it seems essential to outline and discuss all the pertinent facts pertaining thereto. A realization of these destructive factors will enable one to guard against their repetition in the future, consequently the following discussion is submitted with the belief that it demonstrates the cause and offers a solution for future guidance.

The copper-stocks curve sections for 1915-25 and 1926-32, superimposed as shown, were taken from copper-stocks curve shown on chart no. 1. The graphical parallelism between the two curves, as superimposed, during their initial 5-year period is very evident and confirms the statement made in connection therewith during chart no. 1 discussion.

The table shown on chart no. 6 (omitted in RECORD) gives the yearly poundage of refined copper, also blister and material in process of refining, likewise their percentage relationships to United States copper production for the 28-year period, 1905-32. Also tabulated is the export and import data for various years stated in percentages of United States copper production. The percentage ratios between the export and import percentages are also given.

It is comparatively easy to approximate trends of increasing or decreasing copper stocks, imports and exports through the medium of factors similar to those set out in the table and/or its graphical equivalent.

Referring to the graphical outline it will be seen that the lower curve is that portion of the copper-stocks curve embracing 1915-25. The upper curve is that part for the period 1926-32.

The copper stocks, imports and exports data in pounds will be found on the left side of the yearly vertical coordinates; similar data for the 1926-32 curve will be found plotted in pounds on the right side.

Connecting lines were drawn joining the top of the various export, import, and stocks pound column factors as shown.

Subsequently the graphical-area difference between the export and import connecting lines were hatched as shown. A comparison of the two dissimilar hatched areas gives a visual approximation of the excess exports or imports poundage volume factors between the two periods.

TABLE FACTORS

Copper-stocks data, as shown in the table on chart no. 6 (omitted in RECORD), are subdivided into refined and blister and other material in process of refining; likewise a total of these two subdivisions. These data, plus the other column factors, are stated for each year, 1905-32.

We also find that imports percent of exports percentages are shown for certain periods back to 1867. It is most interesting to note the minute percentages that prevailed during the copper-tariff period, 1870-94, and the persistent increase in imports of exports percentage rates to excessive heights during the free-trade copper era, 1895-1932. The high rate for 1870-73 was due to copper imported in manufactured form when the price of copper advanced to 36 cents per pound.

Summaries for six different subdivisions within 1905-32 are also given. Divisions A, C, and E represent annual averages for periods of minimum copper stocks. B, D, and F state annual averages for periods of maximum copper stocks.

Division A represents the annual average for 1905-6. This average shows that refined copper stocks equaled 6.6 percent; blister, etc., 13.6 percent; and the total stocks 20.2 percent of the average United States copper production for the 2 years. We also find that the annual average for 1905-6 of copper exports and imports equals, respectively, 55.8 and 24.1 percent. The imports percentage of the exports is 43.2 percent.

The preceding minimum-stocks period A was followed by the maximum-stocks period B. The annual average for division B states that total stocks equaled 36 percent of the average United States copper production, 1907-10; this shows a large increase over the 20.2-percent factor for division A. Division B average exports and imports were 64.3 and 28.5 percent, respectively, of the United States production, and the imports were 44.3 percent of the exports for that 4 years. We note that although the export and import percentage had increased for B over A, yet the imports percentage of the exports for the two divisions were nearly equal, being 43.3 and 44.3 percent, respectively.

The next, division C, is also designated a minimum-stocks period, although its factors exceed those for division A. Nevertheless its annual average-stocks percentage is less than that for division B. The annual average of total-stocks percentage for division C is 28.6 percent, compared with 20.2 and 36 percent, respectively, for divisions A and B. We also find that the imports percent of exports for C equals 47.2 percent is greater than the respective rates of 43.2 and 44.3 percent for A and B. We also note that, although the respective imports percentages of 28.5 and 28.2 percent, respectively, of C and B are nearly equal, yet the export-percentage rate for C is smaller than the B rate.

The division following C, namely, D, is classified as one of maximum copper stocks. The annual total copper-stocks average for D equals 60.7 percent. This rate is unusually high compared with the previous divisions. The imports percentage of exports for D, which is stated at 73.4, shows a most unusual increase over divisions A, B, and C. Attention is also directed to the 42.8 percent for imports in division D. This shows a 50-percent relative increase over the import rates for divisions C and B. We find, however, that the exports rate for D is less than the C and B rate.

Division E is termed "a period of minimum stocks." The annual average of total copper-stocks percentage equals 32.7 percent. This rate is only about one half the D rate, although larger than the rate for C. The imports percent of exports for E, which equals 69 percent, though slightly smaller than the D rate, is about 50 percent above the C and B rates. The imports percentage for E, which equals 42.4 percent, is practically identical with the D rate and about 50 percent greater than the C and B rates. We also note that the exports percent for E, 61.5 percent, is more than the D and C rates and less than the B rate.

LXXVIII—303

The final division F is a period of maximum copper stocks. The annual average of total copper-stocks percentage of United States equals 90.8 percent. This rate is 50 percent greater than the D rate and about three times the E, C, and B rates. The imports percent of exports equals 106.7 percent; this rate is about 50 percent greater than the rates for E and D, likewise more than twice the rates for C, B, and A. We also see that the imports percent rate of production, which equals 55.6 percent, is about 30 percent larger than the rates for E and D, also two times greater than the rates for C and B. The exports rate for F, namely, 52.1 percent, is less than the rates for all the preceding five divisions.

A résumé of the foregoing discussion of the six divisions indicates clearly a progressive increase in total copper stocks and copper imports and a persistent decrease in copper exports. This is vividly apparent when comparing the factors for initial year 1905 with final year 1932.

The total copper-stocks percentage for 1932 is more than 12 times greater than the rate for 1905.

Although the exports percentage for 1932 is 15 percent relatively less than the 1905 exports rate, nevertheless, the 1932 imports rate is 210 percent greater than the 1905 imports rate. We find that for the period when copper stocks are maximum the price of copper is at a minimum. When copper stocks are at a minimum the price of copper is at a maximum.

The summary of the minimum periods of copper stock, A, C, E (representing 51 percent of copper mined, 1905-32) show that the average copper stocks equal 29.3 of the domestic production. The copper-stocks percentage being a composition of 7.8 percent for refined copper and 21.5 percent for blister, etc. The annual average of copper mined equals 1,434,500,000 pounds.

As shown, the summary of the maximum periods of copper stocks, B, D, F (representing 49 percent of the copper mined), states that the average copper stocks equal 63.6 percent of United States production. This total being a summation of 33.6 percent for refined copper and 30 percent of blister, etc. The annual average of copper mined for the periods is 1,193,200,000 pounds.

A comparison of these two periods show that the minimum periods not only mined more copper than the maximum stocks periods, but that the annual average of copper produced was 20 percent greater. We further find that the maximum periods total-stocks percentage is 117 percent greater than the minimum periods. The blister, etc., percentage for the maximum periods is 40 percent greater than the minimum periods rate. Refined copper percentage for maximum periods is 330 percent in excess of the rate for minimum periods.

Consequently, a résumé of the factors set out in the table as discussed foregoing denote that due to the fact that the minimum-stocks periods not alone mined the major portion of the copper during 1905-32 and that its annual average rate of copper produced was 20 percent greater, likewise that higher copper prices prevailed during the minimum-stocks periods, it seems essential from a copper producer's viewpoint that the ratio of total copper stocks to domestic production for the minimum periods be a guide for the future. This means that total copper stocks should never exceed 30 percent of the domestic production, also that refined copper stocks should not exceed 8 percent of the domestic production and blister, etc., 22 percent thereof.

CURVE FACTORS

The graphical relationships shown on chart no. 6 (omitted in RECORD) are submitted primarily to compare the factors that brought about the large copper surplus as of December 31, 1920, and its reduction by one half as of December 31, 1922, with the huge copper surplus which existed as of December 31, 1931, and the failure to reduce same subsequent thereto.

SURPLUS FACTORS, 1917-21, COMPARED WITH 1928-32

In order to simplify the discussion there is submitted from the table on chart no. 6 the following factors:

Total stocks				Percent of United States production
Pounds		Percent of United States production		United States production		Exports		Imports		Imports percent of exports
1917-21	1928-32	1917-21	1928-32	1917-21	1928-32	1917-21	1928-32	1917-21	1928-32	1917-21	1928-32
525.0	537.0	27.8	29.3	1,886.1	1,825.9	59.9	61.5	29.4	43.0	49.0	69.9
742.6	806.0	38.9	40.3	1,908.5	2,002.9	39.1	49.9	30.2	48.7	77.2	97.6
904.0	1,065.0	70.1	76.6	1,286.4	1,394.4	40.0	54.2	33.3	53.3	83.2	107.6
1,124.0	1,272.6	92.9	122.0	1,209.1	1,042.7	51.6	53.5	40.5	56.3	78.5	105.2
742.0	1,382.0	146.7	254.0	505.6	544.0	124.3	60.4	68.7	72.1	55.3	119.4
807.5	1,012.5	59.4	74.1	1,359.1	1,361.9	53.7	55.3	35.3	52.3	65.7	94.6

The two 5-year period factors tabulated foregoing to show parallelly their comparative relationship affords ample evidence as to what was done in 1921 to correct existing copper surpluses, and the failure to reduce the huge surplus of 1931 during 1932.

The tabulation shows that total copper stocks for 1917 and 1928 are practically equal, likewise their percentage factors, also the copper produced and the exports percent of United States production. We note, however, that the imports rate for 1928 is relatively 46 percent greater than the 1917 rate. This emphasizes the very high percentage plateau to which copper imports had risen during the intervening years. The imports percent of exports for 1917 equals 49 percent, but the rate for 1928 had increased to 69.9 percent, a relative increase of 43 percent. This shows conclusively that imports during 1928 had increased enormously when compared with the 1917 imports rate, although exports for the 2 years were nearly equal.

When comparing the year 1918 with 1929 we find that copper stocks and copper-production factors are about equal and exceed those for the years 1917 and 1928. We note that the copper-stocks percentages for 1918 and 1929 are, respectively, 38.9 and 40.3 percent; likewise that the imports percent of exports for 1918 and 1929 are 77.2 and 97.6 percent, respectively—a very large increase over the 1917 and 1928 factors.

The year 1919 compared with 1930 shows that copper stocks and its percentages and copper production to be somewhat equal. Copper stocks having increased considerably, while production factors show a most marked decrease when compared with the 1918 and 1929 factors. The imports percentage of exports for 1919 and 1930 equal 83.2 and 107.6 percent, respectively. These two factors still show a progressive increase over those for the years 1918 and 1929.

Nineteen hundred and twenty factors compared with those for 1931 show considerable variance. We find the huge copper stocks for 1920 exceeded by those of 1931. The copper-stocks percentage for 1920 equals 92.9 and that for 1931 is 122 percent. The exports percentage is 51.6 for 1920 and 53.5 for 1931. The imports rate for 1920 equals 40.5 and for 1931, 56.3 percent. We also note that the imports percentage of exports for 1920 is 78.5 and for 1931 equals 105.2 percent.

Copper production for the years 1921 and 1932 are about equal. The percentage of copper exports for 1921 is 124.3 percent and for 1932 the rate is shown to be 60.4. These two factors compared with those for 1920 and 1931 show an enormous increase in the 1921 rate over that of 1920. A comparison of imports percentages for 1921 and 1932, which equal 68.7 and 72.1 percent, respectively, show a large increase over those from 1920 and 1931. When comparing the imports percent of exports for 1921 with that for 1920 we find a 30-percent decrease, while the 1932 rate compared with 1931 shows a 14-percent increase. Copper stocks for 1921 show a decrease of 382,000,000 pounds when compared with the 1920 total, whereas copper stocks for 1932 show an increase of 109,400,000 pounds over the total for 1931.

The annual average for the respective periods show the copper production for 1917-21 and 1928-32 to be nearly identical. Average copper stocks for 1928-32 are 25 percent greater than during 1917-21. We note that the copper exports for the two periods to be about equal. Copper imports, however, for 1928-32 show a 48-percent increase over the annual average during 1917-21. Imports percentage of exports during 1928-32 exceed the rate for 1917-21 by 44 percent.

The foregoing period annual averages therefore show about identical copper productions and exports. Copper stocks and copper imports, however, are 25 and 48 percent, respectively, greater for 1928-32, when compared with 1917-21; also, in view of the fact that domestic copper consumption for these two periods were about equal (1928-32 exceeds 1917-21 by only 7.8 percent), the deduction is inescapable that the huge copper-stocks surplus as of December 31, 1932, is directly due to excessive imports during 1928-32.

A résumé of the foregoing discussion of the two periods, 1917-21 and 1928-32, shows that with practically identical sequence production factors for the two periods—although no attempt was made to prevent excessive imports during 1928-32 in comparison with the much smaller import rate for 1917-21—total copper stocks were reduced by 1921, on the one hand, in 1 year by 382,000,000 pounds and increased 109,400,000 pounds during its comparative year, 1932, a difference of 491,400,000 pounds. The copper producers borrowed $40,000,000 in 1921 and took 400,000 pounds of refined copper off the market. This poundage reduction would equal about 60 percent of the refined-copper stocks as of January 1, 1921. Through this effort total refined-copper stocks (see table in chart no. 6) were reduced 433,000,000 pounds, a reduction of 67 percent, by December 31, 1922, down to a total of 216,000,000 pounds. An equivalent reduction within 2 years of 60 percent in stocks of refined copper which equaled 924,600,000 pounds December 31, 1931, would only leave about 370,000,000 pounds as of December 31, 1933, instead of the existing 1,000,000,000 pounds. Copper, which has averaged about 7 cents per pound during the past 2 years, would have taken 570,000,000 pounds off the market for $40,000,000, the amount used in 1921 to carry the 400,000,000 pounds.

CURVE FACTORS—1917-21 COMPARED WITH 1928-32

Referring to the graphical curve details in chart no. 6, we note two areas—one for the period 1915-25, and the second pertains to period 1926-32.

The important area portions to be compared in this discussion are 1917-21 with 1928-32.

CURVE PORTION 1917-21

As heretofore stated, the hatched area shows the excess of exports over imports or the reverse thereof. As for 1915-25, of which 1917-21 is a part, all the hatched area represents excess exports.

The annual average of copper exports for 1917-21 equals 730,000,000 pounds. Imports averaged 479,600,000 pounds and were 65.7 percent of the exports. The total excess copper exports during the period was 1,252,200,000 pounds.

An inspection of graphical section 1917-21 shows a precipitous falling of the export line and a continued rise of the import curve from 1917 to 1918; a continued sharp falling of the export curve and a lesser drop for the import curve from 1918 to 1919. The two curves rose slightly from 1919 to 1920. The export curve was about horizontal, but the import curve declined from 1920 to 1921.

The great constriction of excess exports by 1919 was due to the import curve failing to drop parallelly with the export curve; the consequence was that copper stocks increased from 525,000,000 pounds in 1917 to 904,000,000 pounds in 1919. Due to the constricted area persisting from 1919 to 1920 we find that copper stocks increased to 1,124,000,000 pounds as of December 31, 1920. The expansion of the excess exports area from 1920 to 1921 denotes a drop in copper stocks to 742,000,000 pounds by December 31, 1921. The continuance of this expansion area into 1922, even though both rose parallelly, resulted in a drop of copper stocks to 577,000,000 pounds as of December 31, 1922.

CURVE PORTION 1928-32

The hatched area for 1928-32 shows excess exports from 1928 to 1929 and into 1930. From 1930 to 1932 we note that the hatched area depicts excess imports.

The annual average of copper exports for 1928-32 is 752,600,000 pounds. Imports for that period averaged 711,300,000 pounds and were 94.6 percent of the exports. The excess copper exports for 1928-32 totals 206,500,000 pounds.

Graphical section, 1928-32, shows a continuous precipitous decline in the export curve from 1928-32. The import curve rose most abruptly from 1928 to 1929, while the export curve declined. We note the import curve crossing the export curve in 1930 and continuing to decline sharply and parallelly to the export curve to 1932.

The nearly total construction of the excess exports area 1929 was due to the abrupt rise of the import curve, and copper stocks as of 1928, which equaled 537,000,000 pounds, rose to 806,000,000 pounds as of December 31, 1929. The uninterrupted continuance of excess imports from 1930-32 resulted in copper stocks rising to 1,382,000,000 pounds as of December 31, 1932. It is evident that this huge copper surplus by the end of 1933, or thereafter, cannot be decreased in the absence of rigid tariff protection and controlled domestic production unless the import curve shows a most abrupt downward trend.

SUMMARY OF DISCUSSION

The detailed analysis submitted foregoing of the factors stated on chart no. 6 clearly demonstrate that the present huge surplus of copper is due to excessive imports of copper during 1928-32.

A repetition of future excessive stocks of copper can be prevented by excluding foreign copper imports and synchronizing domestic production with domestic consumption. Copper imports can be excluded through the medium of an adequate tariff and the regulation of production to meet domestic requirements is easily attainable by curtailing the past average 14-year production rate about 10 percent.

When the domestic market is supplied solely from domestic-controlled mine production it is certain that copper can be sold at a domestic commodity price.

The copper miner is entitled to receive a commodity price for the end stage of his labor effort and the only way this is obtainable is to rigidly exclude copper imports and regulate copper production to just meet domestic demand.

The regulation of copper-mine output is easily obtainable and can be adjusted to a most minute degree through proper State, district, and mine allotments based on past productive records.

The question of disposal of the existing huge copper surplus must be accomplished through Federal agencies. The failure of adequate import duties the past 5 years is the direct cause of this menacing surplus. It must be removed or rendered nascent immediately if the human element involved is to be accorded the right to earn a livelihood.

IX. Chart no. 7

Owing to the stress laid on copper-production ratio factors during the preliminary discussion of copper-code details, it was deemed informative to submit data not alone as to past production but also to designate the units that control the domestic copper-mining industry.

Past production data, based on actual output, would be the most reliable aid in estimating future domestic annual production ratios under the provisions embodied in the proposed copper code. Future allocations of State, district, and mine annual copper output ratios under the code should certainly not be left to hearsay, self-interest, or nebulous quotas, but should be based on actual annual past production factors averaged over a period of nondepression years.

In reviewing past domestic copper-production records, it was found that three domestic companies, namely, Kennecott Copper Corporation, Anaconda Copper Mining Co., and Phelps Dodge Corporation, had mined more than one half the domestic copper output during the past 18 years, 1915-32.

Consequently, there is herewith submitted certain detailed copper-production data pertaining to those three companies, hereafter termed the "KAP group", for the period 1915-32, during which time United States mined 56.6 percent of the total domestic copper output, 1841-1932.

Referring to chart no. 7 (omitted in Record), we find outlined thereon tables A and B, also certain graphical relationships pertaining to production factors for the KAP group during the 18-year period aforementioned. The data submitted has been systematized and made clear through explanatory notes, hence there is no need to enter into detailed explanations.

Yearly total production factors for each company of the KAP group have been plotted as shown. This annual data has been segregated as to domestic production into the major domestic unit and the remainder of domestic production, also as to foreign production.

KENNECOTT

Kennecott plotted factors show that its major domestic unit, namely: Utah copper mined 38 percent of the total for 1915, 21 percent during 1921, 26.6 percent for 1932, and the average for 1915-32 equals 33.4 percent.

The foreign production of Kennecott was 9 percent of the total during 1915, 23 percent for 1921, 44.5 percent during 1932, and the average for 1915-32 equals 23.4 percent.

The domestic remainder equals 53 percent for 1915, 56 percent during 1921, 28.9 percent for 1932, and 43.2 percent average for the period 1915-32.

The foregoing factors emphasize likewise their graphical relationship, that the low cost, Utah copper shovel-operated mine, production has remained constant percentage, and that the low-cost foreign unit (Braden) has increased rapidly.

The result being that the domestic remainder for 1932 was only about one half the 1915 percentage rate. This means that so far as Nevada Consolidated, Ray Consolidated, and Chino mines are concerned their production ratios have been sacrificed to advance Braden's output.

It will be noted that the graphical curve depicting Kennecott foreign production, which means Braden, cuts right across and ever upward during not alone the 1921 depression but also the 1930-32 depression. It is particularly interesting to note in table A that Braden's production during the depression of 1931 was 26 percent above its 1929 rate while Kennecott's domestic properties only mined one half of their 1929 output. During 1932 Braden mined 60 percent of its 1929 output compared with only 20 percent for the domestic properties.

Kennecott, for the 18-year period, 1915-32, obtained 76.6 percent of its total copper production from mines owned within the United States, the remaining 23.4 percent was mined in Chile. During the 11-year period, 1922-32, Kennecott secured 71.3 percent of its total output domestically, and 28.7 percent from foreign areas. For the 4-year period, 1929-32, Kennecott mined 67.3 percent of its total production within the United States, and 32.7 percent of the total output came from South America. Kennecott's copper production for the year 1932 discloses that 44.5 percent of its total output was mined in Chile, and 55.5 percent within our country.

From the foregoing it is evident that the copper-production ratios of the domestic mines controlled by Kennecott have been constantly reduced and conversely their foreign output has been persistently increased during 1915-32.

ANACONDA

Anaconda's most important domestic unit, namely, Montana, mined 86 percent of the total for 1915; 64 percent during 1921; 38 percent for 1932; and the average during 1915-32 is 42 percent.

The foreign production of Anaconda for 1915 equals 6 percent of its total output, 4 percent for 1921, 55 percent during 1932, and the average equals 40.5 percent for the period 1915-32.

We find that Anaconda's domestic remainder production during 1915 is 8 percent, 32 percent for 1921, 7 percent during 1932, and the average for the period 1915-32 equals 17.5 percent.

When analyzing the foregoing production factors and scanning their graphically plotted percentages, we note that Anaconda's most important domestic unit, namely, Montana, shows a reduction of 56 percent in production percentage for 1932 when compared with 1915. Montana's curve shows a most persistent uniform decrease during these 18 years.

On the other hand, we observe the startling increase in Anaconda's foreign-production curve during 1915-32. Starting with 6 percent in 1915, it reached 55 percent in 1932, a comparative increase of 900 percent.

During the rapid increase of Anaconda's foreign-production curve, 1915-32, we find that Anaconda's domestic remainder (Inspiration and Walker), which equalled 8 percent in 1915, expanded to 32 percent in 1921, has shrunk to 7 percent in 1932. We note that the constriction has been uniform from 1922-32 compared with the expanded area 1916-21.

It appears that Anaconda's foreign-production curve, which advanced so amazingly to 1929, seems poised ready to swing ever upward the moment its foreign production can be marketed, either domestically or abroad.

Montana has suffered a reduction in copper output of 24 percent during the post-war period, 1919-30, compared with the pre-war period, 1903-14. These two periods account for 56 percent of all the copper mined in Montana during 1841-1932. This disastrous reduction in copper output certainly emphasizes that the foreign activities of Anaconda during the post-war non-commodity-price period has not aided the State.

We also find that the maintenance of the uniform percentage rate of foreign production equaling 55 percent from the peak year, 1929, right through the depression period, 1930-32, is much different than the production conditions besetting Inspiration and Walker during this interim. Inspiration dropped 84 percent and Walker 93 percent from 1929 compared with 1932.

Anaconda, during 1915-32, secured 59.5 percent of its total production domestically and 40.5 percent from foreign areas. For the past 11 years, 1922-32, Anaconda obtained 50.3 percent of its production within the United States and 49.7 percent from abroad. During the last 4 years, 1929-32, Anaconda has only mined 44.7 percent of its total output within our country and derived 55.3 percent thereof from Chile and Mexico.

PHELPS DODGE

The Phelps Dodge Corporation production activities during the 18-year period, 1915-32, are clearly stated in table A. Its total copper output during the period only equals 13.5 percent of the total for the KAP group, therefore it need not be analyzed in detail.

We note during 1915-32 that 58.3 percent of its total production came from the Copper Queen unit; 21.4 percent was mined within the domestic-remainder area and 20.3 percent of the total copper output was secured from foreign sources.

The foreign production curve, starting at 18 percent in 1915, reached its apex, 27 percent, in 1923, dropped to 21 percent during 1925, then horizontal to 1930, then 13 percent for 1931, and to zero for 1932.

The Copper Queen curve shows a constant recession for the 18-year period.

The domestic remainder shows an expansion throughout due to the recession of both the foreign and Copper Queen production curves.

The Phelps Dodge Corporation is the only one of the KAP group that shows a slight increase in its domestic output ratio of the total production during 1915-32.

SUMMARY KAP PRODUCTION DETAILS

The summary details stated at the foot of table A show that for 1915-32 the KAP group mined 70 percent of its combined total copper production within the United States and 30 percent came from foreign countries.

An inspection of the first three subdivisional periods shows that the domestic-production percentages were 86.4, 65.7, and 59.1 percent, respectively, and the foreign percentages are 13.6, 34.3, and 40.9 percent. This denotes a progressive decrease in domestic-production ratios and conversely an increase in the foreign rate.

For the year 1932 the domestic ratio equals 57.3 percent and the foreign rate was 42.7 percent of the total combined KAP copper production.

TABLE B

Table B, first column, states the combined KAP domestic copper-production percentage of the total United States copper production for each year during 1915-32.

Averages for certain subdivisional year periods are also given.

The average for 1915-32 equals 53.7 percent. This means that the KAP group mined 53.7 percent of the total domestic copper production during the 18-year period, 1915-32.

The KAP group mined an average of 49.5 percent of the 1915-21 domestic production; 54.1 percent during 1919-32; 56.1 percent of 1922-32; and 57.8 percent during 1929-32.

The percentage of domestic copper production for KAP is plotted graphically by years as shown by the heavy solid meander line from 1915-32.

SECOND COLUMN

The second column of table B gives the combined KAP foreign copper-production percentage of the total Chile plus Mexico copper production, annually, for 1915-32.

Annual averages are likewise stated for various periods.

For the 18-year period, 1915-32, we note that the KAP group mined 72.7 percent of the total copper production of Chile plus Mexico.

We also find that the KAP group mined 41.1 percent of the Chile plus Mexico copper production during 1915-21; 77 percent for 1919-32; 82.2 percent during 1922-32; and 83.4 percent for 1929-32.

Forty-eight and eight-tenths percent of all the copper imported into the United States during the 14-year period, 1919-32, came from Chile plus Mexico. The poundage of these imports represents 60.6 percent of the total Chile plus Mexico copper output and is equivalent to 79 percent of total KAP, Chile, plus Mexico copper production during the 14-year period.

TABLE B SUMMARY

Comparing the combined KAP copper production for the United States, 1915-21, which equals 49.5 percent, with KAP production for Chile plus Mexico, 41.1 percent, we find the domestic rate to be 20 percent greater.

During the next 7 years, 1922-28, we note the domestic rate to be 55.3 percent and the foreign rate 81.4 percent; the latter is 47 percent greater than the former.

For the last 4 years, 1929-32, the domestic rate equals 57.8 percent, compared with 83.4 percent for the foreign area, showing a relative increase of 44 percent.

A comparison of the last period, 1929-32, with the first period, 1915-21, the domestic rate is respectively 49.5 and 57.8 percent; the foreign rate equals 41.1 and 83.4 percent. The domestic rate increased 17 percent when comparing the two periods, but the foreign rate showed a 103-percent increase for 1929-32 when compared with 1915-21.

The foregoing percentage increase of the combined copper-production rate for KAP domestically, which equals 17 percent, gave them domestic control, but the huge increase within the foreign area accorded KAP monopolistic ownership of the copper reserves within Chile and Mexico.

These two countries alone, during the last 14 years, 1919-32, have poured into our country one half of the flood of copper imported but have failed to absorb even a minute part of our exports.

X. Chart no. 8

An attempt has been made to outline on chart no. 8 (omitted in RECORD) data pertaining to the wage earner dependent on the domestic copper mining industry.

The chart is a graphical representation showing pounds and value of copper mined per domestic copper mine wage earner for various census years from 1860 to 1929, outlining particular details for the United States and leading domestic copper-producing States.

During the period analyzed, 1860-1929, we find that 99.9 percent of the domestic copper produced 1841-1932 was mined subsequent to 1860.

During the last two census periods covering 20 years, 1909-29, the average number of wage earners engaged in the domestic copper-mining industry equals 46,600. We also note that 71.6 percent of the total copper production, 1841-1932, was mined during 1909-32.

The number of copper wage earners and the domestic copper-production percentage for Michigan and Montana when 1929 is compared with 1909 show a decrease of about 50 percent.

We note, however, that the pounds of copper mined per wage earner for Montana and Michigan during 1929 is, respectively, 35 and 63 percent above the 1919 poundage for these two States.

The period 1919-32 mined 41.1 percent of all the copper produced during 1841-1932. Consequently a comparison of chart data within this period that accounts for about one half of all the copper mined domestically should give an approximation of the trend of operating factors.

Arizona, plus the combined production of Utah, Nevada, and New Mexico, represents 62.6 percent of the total domestic production for 1919 and equals 69.8 percent for 1929. A comparison of mine factors for Arizona with the three States, representing as they do about two thirds of the domestic production, should be of interest.

Most of the copper mined within Arizona comes from underground operations. On the other hand, the major part of the copper mined within Utah, Nevada, and New Mexico is shovel mined.

During 1929 Arizona secured about 87 percent of the total copper output from underground operations, while the three States hereafter termed "U.N.N." secured 88 percent of their copper production from shovel operations within open-pit mines.

The number of copper wage earners within Arizona for 1919 equals 14,237, compared with 15,564 in 1929, an increase of 9 percent. The copper-production percentages of the total domestic output for 1919 and 1929 are about equal. The power used per wage earner within Arizona during 1919 equals 11.1 and for 1929 is 12.4 horsepower, an increase of 12 percent.

As shown, the number of wage earners within U N N during 1919 equals 6,924, and for 1929 is 8,116, an increase of 17 percent. The copper-production percentage rate for 1919 is 20.9, compared with the rate of 28.3 for 1929, an increase of 35 percent. A comparison of the power used for U.N.N. during 1919 is 13.6 and for 1929 equals 24.9 horsepower, showing an increase of 91 percent during these years.

Shovel-mine areas within Utah, Nevada, and New Mexico, through increased mechanization alone, were able to increase their domestic-copper output percentage rate 35 percent by only increasing the number of wage earners 17 percent.

The underground mine operations within Arizona, even though the mechanization rate increased, had to add 9 percent more wage earners merely to maintain its past domestic-output percentage rate.

A comparison of the number of pounds of copper mined per wage earner for Arizona shows an increase of 40 percent for 1929 over the 1919 amount.

On the other hand, U.N.N. has a rate of increase equal to 80 percent for 1929 over 1919.

In other words, although the percentage rate of increase in the number of wage earners was about the same, nevertheless, the shovel-mine area percentage rate of copper mined per wage earner is twice the Arizona underground-mine rate.

We also find that where the shovel-mine States of Utah, Nevada, and New Mexico mined about 70,000 pounds of copper per wage earner for 1929, the average for the remainder of the United States is only about 35,000 pounds.

The maximum copper production for the shovel-mine area within Utah, Nevada, and New Mexico was in 1929 and equaled 28.3 percent of the total production, or about 565,000,000 pounds. In addition, there was mined about 108,000,000 pounds of copper during 1929 within the open-pit mines of Arizona. This gives a total of 673,000,000 pounds of shovel-mined copper, and equals 33.7 percent of the United States production for the year 1929.

XI. Chart no. 9

STATEMENT

This chart is submitted in order to show the relative economic importance of the copper-mining industry within Arizona, which for years past has been the leading domestic copper-producing State.

Arizona has mined 15,087,300,000 pounds of copper having a value of $2,414,000,000 during 1845-1932. Arizona's production during this 88-year period represents 32.8 percent of the domestic output.

For the year 1929 the 11 Western States mined about 90 percent of the total domestic-copper output. Arizona alone mined nearly one half of the copper produced within these 11 Western States during 1929.

Arizona during 1929 mined about as much copper as the combined production of Montana, Utah, Nevada, and New Mexico. During the 14 years, 1919-32, Arizona mined more copper by 338,000,000 pounds than the combined production of Montana, Utah, Nevada, and New Mexico.

In consequence of the major position occupied by Arizona as a copper-producing State, it was deemed important to submit the generalized data within chart no. 9 (omitted in RECORD); in turn this information should reflect proportionately conditions existent within the other important western copper-producing States.

ARIZONA

Chart no. 9 (omitted in RECORD) outline curves showing tax percentage relationships within Arizona for mining property and other taxable subdivisions.

There is also shown a graphical representation of Arizona annual copper-production values during the 33-year period 1900-32. Tables are also submitted pertaining to the plotted factors.

The value of copper mined within Arizona during 1900-1932 equals about 90 percent of the total mineral-value output. In addition, the silver and gold byproducts from the copper mined during 1900-1932 equals about 5 percent of the total mineral value.

Consequently, the value of copper and its associated silver and gold equals about 94 percent of the total mineral output value during 1900-1932.

Economic factors indicate that during 1919-32 copper provided about 63 percent of Arizona's industrial income. Farm crops and animal products furnished, respectively, about 20 and 17 percent during said period.

The tables show that 94.4 percent of Arizona's total copper production has been mined during 1900-1932, the period outlined on chart no. 9 (omitted in RECORD).

COPPER VALUES

Arizona, during 1919-32, mined 41.4 percent of the total domestic-copper output. In 1929 Arizona produced 41.5 percent of the total copper mined within the United States.

Within the last 14 years, 1919-32, Arizona produced 51.9 percent of all the copper mined during her industrial life. This output equaled 7,831,100,000 pounds and was valued at $1,120,630,000.

During the 12-year period, 1919-30, Arizona mined 7,229,700,000 pounds of copper, having an average yearly value of $89,590,000. Arizona mined 829,200,000 pounds of copper during 1929, having a value of $145,940,000.

Arizona's industrial problem can never be solved until her copper mines are allowed to reopen and furnish her part of the national consumptive demand at a domestic commodity price.

XII. Copper wages

The Arizona copper miner wage detail for the period 1921-32, is set out in the Arizona Code, exhibit D. Miners received a minimum of $4.50 and muckers $4 per 8-hour shift. A 10-percent raise in wages was accorded for each 2-cent per pound raise in the price of copper above 16 cents per pound. No one was employed underground that did not receive at least 50 cents per hour.

The underground wage detail for the Butte, Mont., copper mines was about equivalent to the Arizona copper miner wage schedule, discussed foregoing.

Referring to exhibit no. 21, we find that air-drill runners in the 6 open-cut copper mines therein mentioned received from $3.30 to $5 per 8-hour day. We also note that common laborers, who were mostly Mexican, Japanese, Chinese, and Papago Indians, received from $2.42 to $3.10 per 8-hour day.

We find in exhibit no. 4 that the Anaconda Copper Co. paid an average of $5.74 per day to the men on the hill during 1923. We also note that about one half of the cost expenditure represents wages. Furthermore, that Anaconda, during the 10-year period, 1914-23, employed an average of 14,841 men in their Montana operations.

In exhibit no. 25 we find data pertaining to wages paid copper wage earners throughout the United States for the period 1909-29, and that about 50 percent of the principal expenses went directly to copper wage earners. Page 245, of said exhibit, shows that the wage earners cost percentage of value of products for 1929 is 37 percent for Montana, 33 percent for Michigan, 24 percent for Arizona, and 17 percent for Utah, Nevada, and New Mexico. The low cost for the open-pit mines of Utah, Nevada, and New Mexico is one half that of the underground mines of Montana and Michigan.

The writer estimates that about one half the price paid for copper during the past 30 years, or 8 cents per pound, has gone to pay dependent labor within the western copper districts and adjacent service areas.

The wages paid the domestic-copper miner during all these years does not embody the loss suffered through occupational diseases like miners' consumption or tuberculosis.

The whole wage structure of the copper miner will have to be readjusted when the end stage of his labor effort, namely, the copper ingot, is accorded a domestic commodity price.

The copper miner must not alone be paid for the arduous and skilled work he performs, but likewise should receive compensatory benefits for the hazards constantly confronting him and the certain danger of contracting occupational diseases.

XIII. Copper costs

Detailed copper-cost discussions can be found in exhibits A and B, attached hereto. A résumé of cost details set out in exhibit A, page 67, shows that about 49 percent of the domestic-copper output during the average post-war year, 1928, equals 9 cents, and 51 percent about 12 cents per pound. In other words, that a cost price of 12 cents per pound must be assumed provided the domestic industry is to function as an entity.

In exhibit B, page 71, table 49, without depletion or interest, we find that 60 percent of United States copper production cost 8 cents and the remaining 40 percent 10.9 cents per pound. This denotes that a cost price of at least 11 cents per pound must be secured in case the domestic copper-mining industry is to operate as a unit.

Referring to exhibit no. 7, we find that Anaconda copper costs, within Montana, during the 10-year period, 1923-32, equals 13.7 cents per pound. We further find from exhibit no. 5 that Anaconda lost $13,652,121 on its Montana operations during the 5-year period, 1919-23. The average price of copper during 1919-32 equals 13.6 cents per pound. Consequently, so far as Anaconda's Montana copper-mining operations are concerned, the company failed to show a profit during the 14-year post-war period, 1919-32. A reference to exhibit no. 3 affords ample evidence that Anaconda was most critical when copper failed to receive a commodity price, saying nothing about the then prevailing low price of 13.2 cents per pound. Exhibits no. 2 and no. 4 also vividly describe the cost difficulties encountered by Anaconda within Montana in comparison with the cost details enjoyed within its Chilean mine areas.

A review of exhibits no. 11 and no. 12 discloses that the average per-pound cost for about 23 Michigan copper mines from 1909-18 was about 13 cents.

Exhibit no. 15 outlines with great detail subdivisional per-pound costs for 85 copper mines covering the year 1918. We note that the average cost for all companies reporting equals 16.2 cents per pound. The percentage cost of mining for Montana and Michigan is about twice the average mining cost of the Arizona, New Mexico, Utah, Nevada, and California copper mines. Furthermore, the mining cost percentage of net cost per pound of copper is about three times greater for an underground copper-mining State, like Montana, when compared with the cost of mining within the open-pit copper States of Utah and Nevada.

In exhibit no. 16 we find domestic copper cost details for the 12-year period, 1909-20, covering 13,915,000,000 pounds of copper, equals 11.35 cents. The copper output analyzed equaled 85 percent of total domestic smelter production for said 12 years. Domestic copper mined during 1909-20 represents 36 percent of all the copper mined during 1841-1932.

It is very evident from the data submitted foregoing that the minimum domestic cost that can be safely assumed in order to permit the copper-mining industry to function as a unit is 12 cents per pound. This cost does not embody a reasonable exploratory cost detail, neither does it care for increased wages to copper miners to compensate for the hazards of their profession.

It is, of course, dangerous from a national-defense standpoint not to have a continuous maximumly functioning domestic copper-mining industry from ore to ingot stage during time of peace so that adequate quantities of copper shall be immediately available when war overwhelms us.

XIV. Copper prices

The failure to receive a commodity price for copper during the post-war period, 1919-30, was discussed in chapter V. The copper price details submitted in charts no. 3 and no. 3A unquestionably demonstrates that the end stage of the domestic copper miners' labor, namely, the copper ingot, failed to receive a commodity price throughout the whole post-war period. The failure to accord a domestic commodity price for copper during this 14-year post-war period is a most vicious form of economic discrimination.

We find in exhibit no. 18, bottom of page 259, the following:

"The copper price index, based on pre-war conditions, is only a little more than half that of labor and other commodities. This condition is resulting in the exhaustion of one of the country's basic wasting assets, at a price that will purchase hardly more than one half its equivalent in other commodities. Obviously both the country and the investor must ultimately suffer as a result, and national economics and conservation demand that the situation be remedied."

The foregoing quotation is from United States Mineral Resources, 1922; consequently the lack of a commodity price for copper was well understood 12 years ago. An inspection of chart no. 3A (omitted in RECORD) chapter V, shows that the copper ingot price index based on pre-war conditions, for 1922, is only about one half of the labor and commodities factors. We likewise note that this discriminatory condition begins with 1921 and continues uninterruptedly for 8 continuous years until 1929. The copper ingot curve rose for the year 1929, but immediately fell thereafter to its present abysmal level. For the year 1932 we note that the copper ingot price index is still only one half of the commodities price index and one sixth the U.R. wages index. In other words, the copper miners' product for the past 12 years has been sold at a price that will only purchase one half its equivalent in other commodities, likewise only make possible the payment of a fractional wage detail. It is certainly obvious that this trade discrimination be remedied forthwith, both from a national economic and conservation standpoint.

We likewise note in exhibit no. 19, from United States Mineral Resources, 1923, that "the producers who have been producing copper at a loss during the post-war years cannot go on indefinitely depleting reserves of ore and capital." In order to correct this situation "has caused some of the copper producers to feel that a tariff on copper would solve some of the perplexing problems with which producers have had to deal during the period of low prices. It is largely this condition that has caused the agitation among high-cost producers for a tariff on copper, resulting in the introduction in May 1924, of a bill in Congress by Representative JAMES, of Michigan, providing a duty of 6 cents a pound on copper imported."

In exhibit no. 3 we note that the Anaconda Co., discussing the price of copper in 1924, states "prior to the World War the average price was 15 cents per pound. Since the war it has been hovering around 13 cents." In answer to the query if this condition was peculiar to copper, it replies: "It is. Here is the only raw material produced in large quantities in the United States which is not selling at a price equaling or exceeding the pre-war average." Anaconda then goes on to verify this by data submitted by the Harvard Economic Service. This data is set out in tabulated form and shows that if copper had been granted the same equivalent average commodity price accorded sugar, corn, wheat, hogs, cotton, wool, petroleum, coal, pig iron, and steel, then copper should have sold for 34.3 cents in 1919 instead of the actual price of 19.1 cents; 44.4 cents in 1920 instead of 18 cents and 23.9 cents in August 1924 instead of 13.2 cents actually received. Anaconda still complaining, states: "The World War raised the prices of 11 basic commodities, including copper; that in spite of the depression following the war, none of these commodities are now as low as the pre-war price level, with the exception of copper, which is now about 16 percent lower in price than before the war. And this is not all. The costs of producing a ton of ore are now 50 percent higher than in pre-war times." Anaconda, still lamenting, states: "Of the six important Montana commodities in the list, copper is the only one that is selling below its pre-war price. Corn, wheat, hogs, wool, and petroleum all show prices that are 13 percent to 97 percent higher than pre-war. Compare that with copper, which is selling 16 percent lower and then ask yourself if it is logical to burden this industry with additional taxation."

Referring to exhibit no. 14, page 370, United States Mineral Resources, 1924, we find the following: "In May 1924 Representative JAMES, of Michigan, introduced a bill in Congress providing a duty of 6 cents a pound on copper imported. Congress took no action on this bill. In years since the war the producers of copper have had to accept a lower scale of prices than those current for other commodities, and therefore a large number of them have made records in lowering costs of production. The efficient organizations that have been built in response to the necessary cutting of costs will enable producers to make money by selling at prices that would not have yielded profits in the past." A situation such as last described leads one to suspect that lowered costs were the result of rawhiding labor and high-grading the ore reserves.

Exhibit no. 19A, page 564, United States Mineral Resources, 1926, has the following: "The ore reserves of the Americas could take care of the world's requirements for some years to come, but to these have been added recently the large deposits of Africa of high average grade. Being now in course of development, with an ambitious program of production, the possible effect of the coming of copper from these new sources upon the price of copper, the profits of producers, and the stability of established agencies of production has undoubtedly been a psychological factor affecting the price of copper."

A résumé of the foregoing certainly emphasizes that political economists, congressional Representatives, technical publications, and major domestic copper producers, even since 1921, have repeatedly pointed out the economic discrimination directed against the copper miners' labor product.

The copper ingot has been subjected to such an unusual degree of persistent vicious discriminatory legislative neglect during all these years that it certainly is fortunate that some other way is now available to rehabilitate the domestic copper-mining industry, through according its product a domestic commodity price.

XV. Copper reserves

Referring to pages 55 and 56, exhibit A, we ascertain that the domestic copper reserves, as of 1929, equal about 39,760,000,000 and the foreign reserves about 145,770,000,000 pounds. In other words, the foreign copper reserves are three and seven-tenths times greater than the domestic. We likewise note that the foreign ore grade is two and six-tenths times richer than the domestic copper ore grade. A summary on page 57 states: "That the foreign competitive copper poundage is three and sixty-six hundredths times greater than our domestic poundage, and can be laid down at New York City at a transportation cost of about 40 percent of the domestic cost." On pages 71, 74, and 75, exhibit A, estimates are given indicating that this foreign-copper poundage can be delivered domestically at a cost varying from 3.835 cents to 5.565 cents per pound. It seems advisable from a domestic copper miners' standpoint, to assume that ample quantities of foreign cheap-labor copper can be laid down at any or all domestic tide-water points at a cost of 4 cents per pound.

Foreign copper competition is not a new menace. It has existed ever since 1921 as exhibit no. 3A clearly portrays. We find constant reference to this foreign-copper menace starting back in 1923, as stated in exhibit no. 19. We find voluminous references thereto during the year 1924, as evidenced by exhibits nos. 2, 3, 4, 5, 9, 10, and 14. The statistical data embodied in exhibit no. 1 and exhibit C were largely prepared in 1925. Exhibit no. 19A emphasizes the growing menace of foreign-copper resources as of 1926, 1927, 1928, and 1929.

It certainly is obvious from the foregoing that rigid protective precautions must be taken immediately to exclude, once and for all, the flood of cheap foreign copper that has brought ruin to the domestic-copper miner during the post-war period.

It is likewise evident that drastic and immediate steps must be taken to segregate the present huge domestic-copper surplus which is due directly to excessive copper imports from foreign-copper areas during 1928-32, as stated in chapter VIII. This surplus which is due to legislative neglect, cannot be blamed on the dependent human element within the domestic-copper areas; can only be solved expeditiously through an adequate copper code.

The domestic-copper miner can never receive a domestic commodity price for his labor product unless foreign copper is rigidly excluded and domestic production is synchronized with domestic consumption.

XVI. Copper production

By referring to chapters III and IV, detailed information is available as to copper poundage mined within the various domestic States during 1841-1932.

Exhibit no. 8 is a United States map showing the location of 217 domestic copper-mining districts scattered throughout 19 States.

The location of 206 copper districts and electric power details within 11 Western States are shown in exhibit no. 8A.

We find detailed copper production statistics for the year 1917, within 52 United States copper districts, in exhibit no. 13.

Exhibit no. 21 contains a map showing the location of the open-pit copper mines within the United States, as of 1929.

A reference to exhibit no. 19A gives the copper mined during the year 1929, within 36 of the leading domestic copper-producing districts. The year 1929 is the one of maximum domestic-copper production during 1841-1929, same equaling 2,002,863,135 pounds, having a value of $352,504,000. This is equivalent to about $500 for each of the three quarters of a million people directly and indirectly dependent on the domestic copper-mining industry.

Within exhibit no. 8B will be found for the year 1930 the centers of domestic population, manufactures, cereals, farm values, corn production, wheat production, and the approximate center of copper production. We note that the center of copper production lies only about 900 miles west of the center of farm values, 1,200 miles west of the center of population, and 1,400 miles west of center of manufactures.

Ninety percent of the copper mined within the United States during 1929, having a value of $315,000,000, came from the 11 Western States. About one half of this, or about $160,000,000, was spent locally for wage details. It is quite evident that the domestic farm value center, which lies only 900 miles easterly, should be vitally interested in maintaining so valuable an industry. This wage outlay was twice as valuable as all the domestic meat products exported during 1929; it was about four times more valuable than leather exports; also more than five times more valuable than oil cake and meal exports; and it was only 20 percent less than the total value of wheat, including flour, exported during 1929. The maintenance of a maximally functioning domestic copper-mining industry on a domestic commodity-price basis will absorb vast quantities of the domestic agricultural surplus. Domestic agricultural control factors should do all in their power to build up and maintain the buying power of the domestic copper-mining districts. It is a certainty that the foreign copper-mining areas of Africa, Canada, and Chile will buy only minute quantities of domestic agricultural exports.

The writer noticed a newspaper item quite recently which mentioned the liquidation of domestic copper districts. To those entertaining such a desire, irrespective of the actuating motive, their attention is called to exhibit no. 24. In table no. 5 we note that the value of copper during 1929, is only exceeded by the colossally valuable coal-mining industry. The value of copper was about 50 percent greater than the value of iron ore. Copper was valued at about twice the combined value of lead, zinc, gold—lode and placer—silver, and minor metals during the year 1929. We likewise note in table no. 6 that percent of increase, 1919-29, for copper was plus 56.4, whereas iron ore shows a decrease of 9.6 percent. We also note that the rate of increase was greater than the lead rate.

The anthracite industry only showed an increase of 5.7 percent while the bituminous division suffered a decrease of 15.6 percent. The foregoing mine value factors demonstrate that the copper industry showed the maximum percentage value increase 4 years ago; consequently it is absurd to seriously consider the liquidation of this century-old industry unless the intent is to totally abandon all our major domestic metal-mining industries.

The according of a domestic commodity price for copper will at once neutralize the propagandic suspicions of noneconomic unit terminology, so gratuitously and volubly directed against the domestic copper miners' labor product.

The domestic copper-mining industry has now about 25 years of copper blocked out to meet domestic copper consumption requirements. An unending and unfailing supply of domestic copper can be made available during the year to come, provided a constant domestic commodity price is accorded same.

XVII. Copper explorations

Ore explorations within the 217 domestic copper-mining districts during the 14-year post-war period have been virtually abandoned. The only accretionary copper poundage added to the domestic-copper reserves since the war has been due to the extension of known ore areas and increased mining, metallurgical, and power efficiencies.

We note in exhibit no. 15, that back in 1918 criticism was voiced that "development had been neglected."

Referring to exhibit no. 16, we find that during 1920, when copper was selling at 18.4 cents a great amount of development work was done during 1920.

Exhibit no. 17, covering the year 1921, when copper was selling at 12.9 cents, states: "companies forced to mine their highest grade ore."

For the year 1922, when copper sold at 13.5 cents, we find in exhibit no. 18, "National economics and conservation demand that the situation be remedied", namely, that copper be accorded a price index comparable with all other commodities and labor price indices.

During the year 1923, copper sold at 14.7 cents. In exhibit no. 19, covering 1923, we find: "Producers who have been producing copper at a loss during the post-war years cannot go on indefinitely depleting reserves of ore and capital."

In exhibit no. 14, reviewing the year 1924, when copper sold at 13.1 cents, we find: "Copper fails to receive a commodity price."

An inspection of the copper ingot price index curve shown in chart no. 3A (omitted in RECORD), demonstrates conclusively that copper has failed to receive a commodity price during the 14-year post-war period.

In view of the foregoing statements, it is perfectly obvious that the failure to develop new domestic copper ore reserves during the post-war period, was due to the prevailing low domestic price for copper.

It is likewise perfectly obvious that no new copper ore exploratory work can or will be carried on in the years to come unless a domestic commodity price is paid for copper.

Domestic copper costs during the post-war period have not included adequate ore exploratory costs any more than they embodied items covering occupational diseases.

It is vitally essential that continuous and unremitting efforts be directed to place in sight ample copper-ore reserves to care for national defense purposes and to provide a livelihood for hundreds of thousands of our citizens who are dependent on a maximally functioning domestic copper-mining industry.

The only way that the foregoing vital phase can be cared for is through according a domestic commodity price for copper.

XVIII. Copper uses

Data regarding the use of copper within the United States during recent years was secured from the 1932 A.B. of M.S. yearbook.

The use of copper by percentages was plotted as shown in exhibit no. 20, sketch A.

We note that the 10-year plotted period, 1923-32, embraces 32.6 percent of the copper mined during 1841-1932.

Of the 13 subdivisional channels of copper consumed the electrical manufactures section absorbed about one quarter of the total.

Eight of the consuming channels lie between the 5- and 15-percent coordinates.

The remaining four lie below the 2.5-percent line.

There are no violent breaks in any of the 13 curves shown. The increases as well as decreases of the curves are gradual and follow parallelly the general trade tendencies of the decade.

The electrical manufactures division actually increased its percentage consumption of domestic-copper production from 1928-32, and during the last 2 years shown, 1931 and 1932, the consumption was at its maximum percentage rate for the 10-year period.

We also note that the percentage increase of copper consumed by the light-and-power lines was greater in 1932 than in 1924; this is likewise true for other uses, buildings, castings, refrigerators, radio-receiving sets, and wire cloth.

There was a percentage decrease in copper consumed during 1932 when compared with 1929 within the automobile, telephone and telegraphs, and railway-equipment subdivisions.

The manufactures for export rate for 1932 (6.3) is about equal to the 1929 rate (6.5).

In other words, we find that the subdivisional industries that showed percentage copper-consumption increases for 1932 when compared with 1929 represent 76.8 percent of the 1932 total, whereas 16.7 percent declined and 6.3 percent remained stationary. This means that even during a depression year like 1932 the percentage use of copper within about 80 percent of the industries stated was above normal; and although the remaining portion, namely, automobiles, telephones and telegraphs, and railway equipment, showed a decrease, yet these during the last half of 1933 and during the first part of 1934 show marked consumptive increases over 1932.

The foregoing analysis emphasizes that the percentage use of copper during the depression period, 1929-32, has more than held its own proportionally when compared with the other industries, and it is safe to predict that the use of copper in the months and years to come will show a most satisfactory increase.

XIX. Copper smelting and refining

The details discussed in this chapter are the number of wage earners, values, and plant-distribution factors connected with the domestic copper smelting and refining industry.

Exhibits nos. 26, 27, and 28 outline United States census details for the copper smelting and refining industry within the United States from 1899 to 1929. A careful study of these exhibits is suggested in connection with this review.

Exhibit no. 26 shows that the smelting and refining of metals from primary sources during 1929 employed 30,981 wage earners, compared to 5,065 wage earners connected with the secondary subdivision. During 1914 we find the ratio to be 34,733 wage earners in the primary and 3,041 wage earners within the secondary. In other words, the average number of wage earners employed during the past 25 years in the smelting and refining of metals, about eight times more were found within the primary than the secondary division. We further note that in the primary division the number of wage earners employed in the copper smelting and refining industry has averaged about one half of the total engaged.

Referring to table 1, page 1085, exhibit no. 28, we find that during the past 20 years, 1909-29, the average number of wage earners engaged in the domestic primary copper smelting and refining industry equals about 15,000. The exact number for 1909 is 15,628 and equals 14,544 wage earners for 1929. We note, however, that the wage detail has lagged behind the value added by manufacture.

Comparing 1919 with 1929, we find wages decreased 6.9 percent, while the value added by manufacture for 1929 was 11.6 percent greater than 1919. The foregoing percentage relationship shows a most marked decrease when 1909 is compared with 1919. For instance, the percentage increase was 92 percent in wages and only 47.3-percent increase in value added by manufacture.

In table 2, page 1086, exhibit no. 28, we find, for 1929, that of the 14,544 wage earners employed in the primary smelting and refining industry, 3,730 were in New Jersey and about 1,000 in Maryland and New York. In other words, about 70 percent of the smelting and refining wage earners were within the domestic copper-producing areas and only about 30 percent in the eastern tidewater, copper importing, smelter, refining section. Arizona alone, during 1929, employed 3,711 smelter wage earners compared to 3,730 wage earners employed in all the smelter and refining plants within New Jersey.

We find in tables 1 and 2, exhibit no. 27, a mass of details pertaining to the smelting and refining of secondary metals other than gold, silver, or platinum, not from the ore. In table 1 we note that 4,134 wage earners were employed in the United States during 1929, 2,167 in 1919, and 2,147 wage earners were at work during 1909. This indicates that an annual average of about 3,000 wage earners have been employed in the domestic secondary smelting and refining metal industry, not from the ore, during the past 20 years.

In table 2, exhibit no. 27, we find that the aforementioned 4,134 wage earners employed in 1929, were scattered throughout 106 establishments, or an average of 40 wage earners per plant. This table also states that Illinois led, with 25 establishments, employing 1,153, or a plant average of 46 wage earners. Pennsylvania was second, with 14 establishments and 783 persons, or an average of 56 wage earners. New York came third with 11 plants and 272 persons or an average of 25 wage earners. New Jersey was fourth with 7 plants employing an average of 30 wage earners. Indiana fifth, with 4 plants averaging 44 wage earners. Ohio sixth, with 10 establishments, averaging 15 wage earners. The remaining 35 establishments, employing an average of 40 wage earners, were scattered throughout 15 additional States. From the foregoing it is very obvious that the domestic secondary smelting and refining metal industry, not from the ore, is a very diffused aggregation of very small business units.

As a résumé, it may be said that, due to the lack of a profitable foreign copper-export market and the development of large quantities of cheap electric power within the western copper areas (see exhibit no. 8A), the tendency henceforth will be to refine the blister copper output at or near the shelter site. Whereupon the refined electrolytic copper ingot can be shipped direct to centers of population and manufacturers (see exhibit no. 8B), thereby saving the long haul to eastern tidewater refining and fabricating areas, and return.

The secondary smelting and refining metal industry, not from the ore, can always continue to function domestically irrespective of the original source of the junk material they recondition.

XX. Secondary copper

In order to simplify the presentation of data pertaining to the domestic consumption of refined copper from secondary sources, the same is outlined in graphic form as shown in sketch B, exhibit no. 20.

The data presented covers the 23-year period, 1910-32. This period mined 69.2 percent of the total copper produced during 1841-1932.

Referring to sketch B, we note that whereas the domestic consumption of refined copper from primary sources equals 80 percent of the total of primary and secondary for 1910, it recedes quite rapidly to the 57 percent point by 1922. We then note a gradual rise to the 64-percent line in 1924, then to the 57-percent point again by 1931. In other words, the decade 1922-31 shows that the relationship of primary and secondary copper was in equilibrium at or near the 60-percent point.

There is also submitted curve relationships between refined primary and secondary copper consumed in percentage of United States copper production.

We note the gradual rise of the primary copper-consumption curve from the 67-percent point in 1910 to 95.5 in 1932. The intervening apex, as of 1921, was due to the near cessation of mine production during that year.

The secondary curve begins at the 18-percent line in 1910 and rises approximately parallel to the primary curve until 1931, when it jumps abruptly from the 66-percent to the 91-percent point as of 1932. We note a similar abrupt rise in the secondary curve during the depression of 1921 and its recession by 1924, upon the then reduction of surplus and increased domestic consumption. The secondary curve will again recede to normal parallelism to the primary curve when the existing huge surplus copper stocks of 1928-34 are removed and domestic consumption again becomes normal.

We find that the scrap-metal problem during a depression, when surplus stocks tend to increase due to diminished consumption, is the same in the iron, lead, and zinc industries just as it is in the copper industry. The foregoing mentioned metals, except copper, have been rigidly protected for many years, whereas copper has been on the free list. The domestic iron, lead, and zinc industries are burdened with their scrap-metal problem during this depression, which is serious enough, but it would have been infinitely worse if they were further submerged by the dumping of huge foreign surpluses.

The domestic copper-mining industry will in the future be able to meet its scrap-metal problem during times of depression without undue hardship provided foreign copper is rigidly excluded.

XXI. Copper manufacturers

The domestic copper fabricating and manufacturing industry can function whether they use domestic or foreign copper. The controlling factor with them is solely one of cost. The domestic copper fabricator will certainly continue to use the cheap-labor foreign product just as any and all other manufacturers eagerly seek to secure their basic materials at minimum prices.

Attention is directed to the fact that the principal primary purchaser or consumer of the domestic copper-miners' labor product, the copper ingot, is the fabricating and manufacturing industries. The electrolytic copper ingot is not purchased direct by the ultimate copper consumer. The copper ingot is sold to the ultimate consumer in the form of fabricated articles or delivered electric power by the manufacturers and public utilities.

As matters are now framed, and have been for many years, the domestic-copper miner is absolutely at the mercy of the domestic fabricator so far as receiving a commodity price for his ingot.

The past 14-year, post-war period affords ample evidence of failure of the copper fabricator and manufacturer to voluntarily pay a domestic commodity price for the domestic copper-miners' labor product. A vastly different and more equitable way must be made effective henceforth, thereby compelling the highly protected manufacturer and fabricator to pay a commodity price for the domestic copper ingot.

Exhibit A, attached hereto, is replete with vociferous and moving pleas made by the domestic copper fabricator when it comes to asking for special and prohibitive protective tariff rates, thereby ensuring him a super domestic commodity price for his manufactured copper article.

We note particularly the long and detailed protective petition submitted by 15 of the leading domestic copper manufacturers in 1921 to the United States Senate Finance Committee.

This petition has been reproduced and is attached hereto as exhibit no. 22.

We find in exhibit no. 22 that with copper selling at 13 cents the petition states that the price of copper and brass mill products will sell at a minimum of 20 cents up to a maximum of $4.60 per pound. Specific duties asked by them will in no case exceed an equivalent of 40 percent ad valorem on American valuation. They specifically state that duties asked will not shut out imports. They also say that present capacity is three times normal requirements. That domestic competition will keep down prices of brass and copper products. Cannot compete with cheap foreign labor costs. A well-equipped copper and brass industry absolutely necessary for military preparedness. In closing their plea "they ask only for such protection that will enable them to continue to pay liberal wages to their employees, secure a fair return on the capital invested, and retain the American market for American institutions."

In answer to the foregoing, the past 13 years emphasizes that there have been no foreign imports of manufactured copper or brass products. The rates established in the Fordney-McCumber bill, 1922, and carried verbatim into the Smoot-Hawley Act of 1930, in compliance with the petition request aforesaid, have been notoriously prohibitive.

The protective rates established for the manufactured copper article all these years, while the copper ingot was left unprotected, has resulted in all our leading copper miners becoming copper fabricators.
